Government amendment No. 117 is a drafting amendment that simply deletes the redundant words "if any" from clause 84(2)(c). That subsection would then simply provide that an order under clause 84 would be able to modify the constitution of a cross-border public authority. One cannot amend the constitution of an authority that does not have one.

A draft of the order that would be made under clause 83 was placed in the Library on 29 July. Examples of bodies include the Forestry Commission, the Meat and Livestock Commission, the British Waterways Board and the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce.

It will be useful if I also put on record an explanation of the context of clause 83. The policy is that it should be for the Scottish Parliament to decide whether cross-border public authorities should continue to operate after devolution as they do at present. The Government envisage, however, that the Scottish Parliament will, generally speaking, wish existing arrangements to continue to operate to take advantage of sharing knowledge and expertise, and of the greater efficiency in the use of resources. The provisions of clauses 83 to 85 give effect to that policy.

Public bodies, Government Departments, office-holders or offices that meet the criteria set out in clause 83(6) may be specified as cross-border public authorities under an Order in Council made under that subsection. If an authority is so specified, certain provisions of the Bill are disapplied in respect of functions of, and functions specifically exercisable in relation to, the authority in question.

The amendments, which are genuinely technical, seek only to improve the Bill passed in the other place and are certainly worthy of support.

The auditing of cross-border public authorities was dealt with in the previous group of amendments. We seek to provide that only one auditing authority need be involved, even though there is a cross-border public body that straddles the reserve devolved function. The reference to auditing and the control of expenditure is clear, but to try to minimise the amount of auditing, it is better that one Parliament takes responsibility for that, rather than having dual auditing.

Mr. Dalyell: I am not trying to be difficult, but those could be complex matters. Is there to be a lead authority, depending on which had or was thought to have the greater share of the business?

Mr. McLeish: Essentially, the order provides for cross-border public authorities to be established. That is important. These are matters for which the Scottish Parliament could in future decide to have its own body, rather than be part of a UK set-up. In the interim, we are trying, first, to avoid dual auditing, which makes sense. Secondly, it could fall to the National Audit Office to perform the task, according to discussions that will take place. Determining the auditing authority will be a matter of common sense.

When we refer to cross-border public authorities, we are referring to the relationship between the United Kingdom and Scotland, but that also takes cognisance of the fact that Northern Ireland and Wales are part of the set-up. The Bill tries to clarify that, so that when we set up bodies, regardless of whether Scotland decides to set up its own bodies, we have a working system that eases the transition to a new system that will work efficiently.

Dr. Fox: What the Minister is saying about avoiding dual auditing is self-evidently sensible. Will there be a voluntary code of practice? Will he write to us and tell us what consultation the Government have had with what are envisaged to be cross-border bodies and what representations have been made? We might then at least have an idea of the opinions of those groups. Although the amendments are technical, it would be helpful for us to know for future reference what is the Government's thinking on the numbers of groups involved and the balance of opinion on the question of audit.

Mr. McLeish: That is also a fair question. There have been extensive discussions with all the organisations because it is important that we get it right. When clause 84 orders are made in relation to specific bodies, specific auditing requirements will be defined. As to specific orders under clause 84, we want to ensure that each body is taken care of and has its proper procedures established so that there is no confusion as to who is taking the lead role in any particular aspect of a body's work.

Mr. Letwin: The Minister described the amendment as "technical", and I accept that. However, I am not sure that his answer was technical—if it was, it was so technical that I did not understand it. I press him once more on this point for the sake of clarity. Under amendment No. 113, the application of proposed sections 107 and 108 is disapplied when dealing with a function "which is specifically exercisable in relation to a cross-border public authority".

However, proposed sections 107 and 108 are also disapplied when we are dealing not with that but with "any function of such an authority".

I do not understand—and I do not see how a judge will understand—the difference between those two phrases. Could the Minister provide a concrete example of that difference?

Mr. McLeish: I can describe Government amendment No. 113, which is straightforward, but technical. It deletes the reference in clause 83 to the disapplication of clauses 107 and 108 in respect of the functions of cross-border public authorities. The amendment is purely consequential on amendment No. 180, which was debated in the previous group. Amendment No. 180 amends clause 107 to make it clear that the functions of cross-border public authorities are not Scottish functions for the purposes of that clause and clause 108. Therefore, there is no need to continue to disapply clauses 107 and 108 in relation to the functions of cross-border public authorities.

New clause

Lords amendment: No. 132, after clause 91, to insert the following new clause—Human rights—

".—(1) This Act does not enable a person—

(a) to bring any proceedings in a court or tribunal on the ground that an act is incompatible with the Convention rights, or

(b) to rely on any of the Convention rights in any such proceedings, unless he would be a victim for the purposes of Article 34 of the Convention (within the meaning of the Human Rights Act 1998) if proceedings in respect of the act were brought in the European Court of Human Rights.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to the Lord Advocate, the Advocate General, the Attorney General or the Attorney General for Northern Ireland.

(3) This Act does not enable a court or tribunal to award any damages in respect of an act which is incompatible with any of the Convention rights which it could not award if section 8(3) and (4) of the Human Rights Act 1998 applied.

(4) In this section "act" means—

(a) making any legislation,

(b) any other act or failure to act, if it is the act or failure of a member of the Scottish Executive."

Mr. McLeish: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker : With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 133, 134, 136 to 138, 279 to 285, 299 and 300.

Mr. McLeish: Amendment No. 132 deals with the compatibility of the Scotland Bill and the Human Rights Act 1998; amendments Nos. 133 and 134 deal with the legislative power to remedy ultra vires acts; amendments Nos. 136 to 138 would ensure that the appropriate law officer is informed if a court intends to exercise its powers to vary retrospective decisions; amendments Nos. 279 to 283 refer to the definition of devolution issues; amendments Nos. 284 and 285 relate to a number of court procedural issues, including the requirement that intimation be given to the Advocate General and the Lord Advocate if a devolution issue arises in any proceedings; and amendments Nos. 299 and 300 refer to an amendment to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 to take account of devolution issues.

That group of amendments basically comprises technical ones to clauses 92 and 93 and schedule 6 to ensure that the arrangements for judicial scrutiny are appropriate and work properly. I should remind the House about the systems put in place by the Bill for dealing with legal questions about the extent of the Parliament's powers.

The Bill creates a carefully thought through process for settling questions about the boundaries of the devolution settlement. What we propose will ensure that any legal disputes about those boundaries can be resolved consistently and authoritatively. Schedule 6, in particular, sets out the definition of "devolution issues" and the process for resolving any legal questions that arise about them. The arrangements will provide a solid foundation for developing a common understanding of the detailed extent of the powers of the Parliament and the Scottish Executive as time passes. They form a key part of our proposals.

Mr. Letwin: I draw the Minister's attention to amendment No. 132, which again deals with the question of judges and litigation. My suspicions were aroused slightly when the Minister described it as a technical amendment.

The Opposition strongly welcome what we understand to be the purport of amendment No. 132—I hope that the Minister will confirm whether we are correct. Namely, the amendment would prohibit class actions on behalf of people who are vaguely affected by some act—I am comforted to see the Minister nodding—when it could be argued loosely that they were affected by a convention right under clause 28. If that is the amendment's intention, we strongly welcome it. I should add in passing that the noble Lord Mackay of Drumadoon first pointed that out in another place, and we all owe him a debt.

Can the Minister clarify his interpretation of the critical term "victim" as it applies in this case? How does he expect that that will relate to a convention right not to be covered under clause 28, given amendment No. 132? Can he also enlighten us about how he envisages individuals pursuing those matters in the courts? Does he expect that it will be possible, nevertheless, to bring an action against Parliament or will it inevitably be against the Executive? If it is against Parliament, does anything in any of the amendments create a constitutional precedent that could have implications for this place?

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Like my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), I am prepared to accept the Minister's description of "technical" amendments. However, when he refers to a "technical explanation" of amendments, one might—with the greatest respect to the Minister—read "convoluted".

It might be useful to have some practical examples of the effects of amendment No. 132 and the previous group of amendments. They appear to bring the Bill into line with the Human Rights Act 1998, but it would be useful to have some tangible examples of the difference that they will make, and a fuller explanation thereof. I accept that the amendments are technical and I have no wish to delay the House unnecessarily, but we need an explanation, by way of example, of the difference that the amendments will make.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): I do not think that amendment No. 132 is a technical amendment. I believe that it is a fairly important amendment—although I suspect not a controversial one. It seeks to bring the scope of the Bill into line with the Human Rights Act 1998, but I ask the Minister to clarify why this change has been inserted into the legislation at a late stage when we debated the matter at considerable length when it was first brought before the House. It was made quite clear then that there would be the right of challenge under the scope of the human rights convention and the Bill as then drafted. That does not appear to me to be a technical matter. The amendment introduces a considerable change—albeit a change that is in line with the House's intentions when the matter was first brought before us. I seek clarification on that point because it is important that the two pieces of legislation should match up correctly.

Mrs. Laing: I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) that this is a late stage for the Government to introduce an amendment that the Minister describes as a "key part" of their proposals. If they are so important, why have we not examined those matters before? They refer to the way in which the proceedings of the Scottish Parliament coincide with or work alongside the proceedings of not only this Parliament but other quasi-judicial and quasi-parliamentary bodies—of which there seems to be an increasing number—to which we are affiliated or connected in some way. The amendment relates to important parts of the Human Rights Act 1998, which we scrutinised and considered in this place for many hours. I do not believe that I am being unduly critical by asking the Minister to explain why, if the amendments are a key part of the Government's proposals, they are being proposed now.

It is also a matter of concern that the amendments are described as technical ones. Given that the amendments cover page after page, and if they are technical, is the Minister admitting that many of the points that Conservative Members raised when the clauses were debated in Committee had been overlooked at the time and have had to be considered since?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We cannot go into the history of the Bill. The motion before us asks whether we agree with the Lords in their amendment. It is a question of agreeing or disagreeing, not wondering why we got here.

Mrs. Laing: I was seeking to clarify some points about the amendments so that I could consider whether we should agree or disagree with the Lords amendments. Thank you for your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Hayes: It would help those with less acute minds than your own, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if the Minister would clarify the point by citing an example. We accept that the amendments are technical, but we should be grateful if the Minister illustrated that by citing an example. My hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset asked for examples when we debated the previous group of amendments; he did not get them. By providing practical examples, perhaps the Minister will satisfy those of us who have reservations about the interface between the two pieces of legislation.

Mrs. Laing: I thank my hon. Friend for reminding me of that point, which I should have made. I am sure that the Minister took the note of my hon. Friend's observation.

Once again, I seek clarification to enable us to consider whether the clauses have been properly scrutinised by the House before we can decide whether to agree or disagree with the Lords amendment.

Mr. McLeish: Setting aside the bit of melodrama at the end of the hon. Lady's speech, I point out that our aim is consistency. The matter is technical. The amendments have been debated; they make sense, and we ask the House to support them.

Technically, the Scottish Parliament will be a public authority under the Human Rights Act 1998, but in most cases we would expect the Executive to be the subject of any actions on that. Government amendment No. 132 ensures that the Scotland Bill and the Human Rights Act 1998 are consistent in terms of title and interest and the award of damages. Only those with title and interest—that is, Law Officers or anyone who would be a victim in terms of section 7(6) of the Human Rights Act 1998—could bring proceedings about the alleged contravention of the convention rights, about whether an action is incompatible with those convention rights.

It is intended to restrict the members of the public who can mount a challenge involving such questions to those who can bring proceedings against the public authority under section 7(7) of the Human Rights Act 1998. That ensures consistency between the Scotland Bill and the Human Rights Act 1998 about who can bring proceedings. Scots law would probably already have the effect that only such victims would have had title and interest. We are making a straightforward attempt to achieve consistency.

Hon. Members asked for examples. I should like to respond fully and give some illustrations, but the key points are that the amendment is technical, that it makes sense, and that there should be no suspicion that the matter has not been properly considered. The amendment will improve the Bill; that is the purpose of all the amendments that we are discussing tonight.

POWER TO MAKE PROVISION CONSEQUENTIAL ON ACTS OF THE SCOTTISH PARLIAMENT.

Lords amendment: No. 139, in page 45, line 4, at end insert

("or made by legislation mentioned in subsection (2).

(2) The legislation is subordinate legislation under an Act of Parliament made by—

(a) a member of the Scottish Executive,

(b) a Scottish public authority with mixed functions or no reserved functions, or

(c) any other person (not being a Minister of the Crown) if the function of making the legislation is exercisable within devolved competence.")

Mr. McLeish: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 140 to 146, 152, 157, 158, 160 to 169, 174 to 179, 184 and 286, Lords amendment No. 286, and amendment (a) thereto.

Mr. McLeish: I am reluctant to say that the amendments are technical, but we do have a technical amendment to Lords amendment No. 286.

This large group of amendments deals with various powers under the Bill to make subordinate legislation. Among our aims is to clarify the scope of the power to split ministerial functions under clause 97.

We also aim to split quantitative obligations under clause 97. The amendments provide that, where the power in clause 97 is used to split a European Community or international obligation which is expressed in quantitative terms so that part of it can be transferred to Scottish Ministers, the order will not be made unless they have been consulted.

The amendments in the group also ensure that the Secretary of State's powers of intervention in clause 54 can be used to ensure that the Scottish Ministers' share of a quantitative obligation is met.

The general provisions about subordinate legislation have been redrafted to make them easier to use and to take on board recommendations of the Delegated Powers Scrutiny Committee in another place that subordinate legislation under the Bill which amends primary legislation should be subject to affirmative resolution procedure.

The amendments also deal with the transfer of property to Scottish Ministers, the Lord Advocate and the Scottish parliamentary corporate body.

Finally, the amendments deal with the making of provision consequential on Acts of the Scottish Parliament.

Dr. Fox: The Minister will be pleased to hear that I accept that most of the amendments in the group are purely technical. However, I shall probe him on one or two areas—not least on Lords amendment No. 146, which is fairly substantial.

My questions mainly concern the quantitative relationship. We could all think of many areas where such a relationship might apply. In such areas, the working relationship between the Westminster Government and the Scottish Parliament—the Scottish Executive—will be extraordinarily important.

By what mechanism will consultation take place? Given that international obligations are involved, and given that quantitative distribution is involved—say environmental examples, such as on carbon dioxide emissions, where Scotland would be expected to play its part in fulfilling Britain's international obligations—how will the process work in practice? Is this to be among the areas where there will be a concordat? Will the matter be set down on paper? Shall we know in advance how it will work? Or will it simply be left to good will?

The Minister says that no Westminster Government would give a quantitative responsibility on an international obligation to the Scottish Parliament without consultation. I believe that it is legitimate to ask what that consultation will consist of. Will it be a full written and clearly delineated consultation exercise, according to a procedure about which we shall know in advance? Or will there simply be a telephone call to say, "By the way, we have agreed that that is what it's going to be; now you have been consulted. That's it. Thank you very much"? There is a world of different between those two extremes.

Mr. Thomas McAvoy (Comptroller of Her Majesty's Household): How could you suggest such a thing?

Dr. Fox: When the hon. Gentleman has spent as long in government as the Conservatives did, he will know how such a situation can come about—although I hope, for the benefit of the rest of us, that he does not gain that experience.

What will the proposals mean? They make a difference. Earlier in the Bill's passage we said that, where there is potential for conflict between Westminster and the Scottish Parliament, we must consider what would happen in a worst-case scenario. I am not being flippant. A conflict might arise if the form of the consultation process had not been set out far enough in advance and we did not know the mechanisms according to which it would occur.

All I want is for the Minister to tell us the Government's thinking. The Secretary of State said that we must consider the worst-case scenario—that is what I am asking the Minister to do. What would happen if a Westminster Government were putting on to a Scottish Parliament what the Scottish Parliament thought was a disproportionate element of a quantitative international obligation? There does not seem to be a mechanism for resolving disputes. Subsection (4) of amendment No. 146 contains the words

"Scottish Ministers have been consulted", but we know no more about that. The Minister should tell us what that means.

6.30 pm

Amendments Nos. 160 to 169 represent a substantial rewriting of the Bill. We would argue that as a result of work done in another place, there has been a significant improvement in the Bill, compared with the original drafting that came to this House. However, as there has been such substantial rewriting and so many new points have been added, one wonders why that was not in the original Bill presented to the House.

Furthermore, given that substantial rewriting was required for a Bill that received an enormous amount of drafting time, and given that it was done in the Chamber to which those on the Government Front Bench are instinctively hostile, does not that reinforce the case for a revising Chamber? If ever there was such a case, it is made by these 10 amendments. The Government considered that there were so many flaws in the structure of their flagship legislation that they had to go back to the drawing board and draft it again.

It is surely legitimate for us to ask what would happen if this were a piece of Scottish Parliament legislation and there were no revising Chamber. What would the Government do then? In the new, improved form of this section of the Bill, hon. Members on both sides of the House have much to be grateful to the other place for. Without that revising Chamber, what would we have done?

Mr. Dalyell: I realise that we are short of time, but my curiosity overcomes me. Do hon. Members on the Conservative Front Bench want a revising Chamber?

Dr. Fox: In all the previous stages of the Bill we have recognised that the lack of any revision mechanism would be a serious deficit in the procedures of the Scottish Parliament. The hon. Gentleman will know that in the other place we tabled amendments to try to introduce time lags in the Bill as a substitute for a separate revising Chamber, so that those who had doubts about the contents of and procedures in a Bill would have time to make representations. That, of course, has disappeared.

The Minister speaks of the improved drafting of the Bill and the amendments that the Government tabled. The Government could not have done that under the procedures in their own Bill. The irony is not lost on us. Let us hope that the deficiencies do not cause poor legislation to be introduced in the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): I agree with my hon. Friend about the desirability of the revising Chamber and the way in which that is highlighted by the amendment. No doubt the Minister would reply that the deficiency is made up for by extensive reliance on pre-legislative scrutiny, but that depends heavily on the public and on public and professional bodies doing their work. That is a largely uncharted course and unproven—but I digress.

My question is simple, and it arises from reading the Bill with an untrained mind—certainly not a legal mind. Is it the purpose of the amendment to bring about a formal consultation of Scottish Ministers in matters where the United Kingdom Government will deal with our international obligations?

Mr. Hayes: Will my hon. Friend add to that the implications of the amendment for the relationship between Scottish Ministers and the new constitutional arrangements? We spend a great deal of time speaking about the relationship between this place and the new Parliament, but I am interested in what my hon. Friend and the Minister believe the amendment suggests for the relationship between Scottish Ministers and the new Parliament. Does the amendment affect other aspects of the Bill; and can that be explained during this evening's proceedings?

Mr. Swayne: My hon. Friend anticipates me. I intended to ask the Minister for his views. It is inevitable and desirable that the Scottish Executive should be consulted and its views sought and understood. However, this House will rightly continue to contain a large number of Scottish Members of Parliament, who remain in this place to scrutinise Government activities in those spheres. To what extent does consulting the Scottish Executive have implications for their role in this House?

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I refer to amendment No. 286, which inserts a new schedule in the Bill and sets out certain types of procedure for subordinate legislation. That is a welcome step forward for clarification, but on even a brief reading we find that if paragraph 3 applies, instead of Type F procedure, Type A procedure shall apply, and so on. For further Bills, would flow charts meet statutory requirements? I welcome the efforts that have been made to simplify the legislation, but flow charts might be the ultimate in simplification.

Mr. McLeish: They might lead me to understand the measure more than I do, which could be a hindrance in some circumstances.

I shall deal first with amendment No. 146, then with subordinate legislation and the new schedule in amendment No. 286. Amendment No. 146 amends clause 97 in two ways. First, in the new subsections (4) and (5), it provides that, where the clause 97 power is used to split a European Community or international obligation that is expressed in quantitative terms so that part of it can be transferred to Scottish Office Ministers, the order will not be made unless they have been consulted. That is important. Secondly, new subsection (6) will ensure that the Secretary of State's powers of intervention under clause 54 can be used to ensure that the Scottish Ministers' share of a quantitative international obligation is met.

Examples of international obligations and obligations under European Community law that will fall within the scope of these amendments are likely to include EC quotas for livestock subsidies, and the United Kingdom's obligations under the Kyoto protocol on climate change and related Community law to achieve certain targets for the reduction of greenhouse gas emissions.

All parts of the UK will be required to meet a fair proportion of such obligations, not least to ensure that unfair burdens are not placed upon business in one area compared to another. Where it is possible for the Scottish Ministers to contribute to the achievement of the obligation through the exercise of their powers, it is obviously right that they should be apportioned a share of the obligation. An order under clause 97 will enable that to be done. The order will be made by a Minister of the United Kingdom Government or by Her Majesty in Council on the advice of such a Minister, and will be subject to procedure at Westminster only.

The amendment sets out the procedure to be pursued. Consultation will be required, but it would be impossible to define at this stage what that will mean. A framework will be defined for such consultation. The final order will be processed in this House.

Dr. Fox: I am less reassured than I was at the beginning. This is an area where there could be litigation over devolution. We need certain information in this debate, not least the minimum definition of consultation that satisfies the legality of the Bill. The Minister says that there will be some form of consultation, but what will that mean? When the matter goes to court, as it surely will, what is the Government's legal advice on what constitutes minimum acceptable consultation under the terms of this part of the Bill?

Mr. McLeish: It is absurd to suggest that we can clarify and define that this evening. The changes that we are suggesting should be set against a background of important European and international obligations. It makes sense that a process should be established that will deal with quantitative obligations. That is the first major point. Obviously the Government will continue to work within the context of the Scotland Act, which I hope the measure will become after this week, and that of the Scottish Office. Our purpose will be to work out specifically what will be involved in consultation. I do not think that it would be appropriate this evening to try to speculate on what, in the Opposition's eyes, inadequacy would be.

Mr. Grieve: I appreciate that what consultation may or may not be is a difficult thing to define. However, it would be helpful if the Minister spelt out the reality of who calls the shots. United Kingdom Ministers will decide, after having consulted, how the quotas will be allocated, and that is the end of the matter. I am sure that he will confirm that to the House.

Mr. McLeish: First, we accept that there is a serious attempt by the Westminster Parliament to discuss obligations with the Holyrood Parliament. However, we have discussed before European Community and international obligations and the need for the Holyrood Parliament to be consistent in its application of these obligations. We are talking about a further situation where we have not qualitative but quantitative considerations. It seems elementary and straightforward that if there is a process of consultation to be defined, it will clearly flow, as a framework, from the amendment that we shall agree this evening and from the Bill when it is enacted and becomes law.

Mr. Letwin: I must ask the Minister to answer the question that my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) put in an earlier intervention. Would United Kingdom Ministers, following consultation, lay down what the quotas are to be, and that would be the end of the matter?

Mr. McLeish: That is not what we have said. As for international obligations, Scotland will be able to go much further on the basis of the devolution settlement than Scottish Office Ministers can now. We are saying that we must take international obligations very seriously. Scotland is obliged to implement these obligations. That is not to say that Scotland will want to do something else.

First, we are talking of obligations that have been placed on the United Kingdom, so there must be a process to deal with them. That is elementary. Secondly, if that process is to work, there must be a basis upon which we consult. That is put into the Bill by the technical amendment that we are considering. If a debating point is being made, it will not wash. We know that international obligations are vital and we are ensuring that when we consider quotas, in respect of the environment or anything else, there will be proper discussions between the two Executives in proceeding to implement international obligations. I think that it is very straightforward.

Mr. Dalyell: I hardly expect Ministers to endorse the perspicacity of its choice of individual to do it, but the fact is that Heriot-Watt decided, wisely or unwisely, to ask me to give the Lothian lecture on Friday on the subject of devolution, science and technology and the environment. The Government Whip gives a wry smile but that is the position that I am in.

I am asking for some guidance. Am I wrong in thinking that at the end of the day these delicate questions of quotas—not only fish but carbon dioxide emissions—depend on what the Government must call good sense and good will, and that there is no legal framework on which to allocate responsibilities? We must all hope that the good will is to be found. Is there anything other than good will for deciding these matters?

Mr. McLeish: That is just not true. The 190 hours that we have spent dealing with the Bill have been about creating a legal framework that will enable us to debate and discuss issues and process and implement decisions that are applicable both to Westminster, if that be necessary, and Holyrood. I can reassure my hon. Friend. I shall write to him with the full back-up of the framework with which we are dealing. It is right to say—I shall make what I hope is the final point—that written into the Bill is consultation in respect of European and international obligations. From that will flow the framework that will make that consultation work.

Dr. Fox: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way once again. We agree that there must be a mechanism for dealing with quotas. We also agree that there has to be consultation. However, in the event of disagreement, who makes the final decision about the allocation of quotas within the United Kingdom? On whom will that legal responsibility and power actually fall?

Mr. McLeish: To repeat a point made earlier, I said that such matters would be dealt with in this House after due consultation.

The fact that is missing from Opposition arguments is that we need to have a fixed and agreed position on international and European Community obligations. That means, rightly so, the necessity for dialogue and consultation. Is it too radical to suggest that the Opposition might see that as sensible and straightforward? I repeat again that a framework is outlined in the Bill that will take us forward on these issues. There is nothing terribly surprising before us. However, the Opposition always want to try to recreate a bit of interest about matters that have been discussed during various stages in the other place and in this place. There is nothing dramatic before us this evening. We simply have a consultation process built into an existing clause.

Mr. Grieve: Just when one felt that the debate on the Bill was coming gently to its end, it is interesting how matters are reawakened and we return to the central principles and the difficulties in the operation of this proposed legislation. The Minister says that we are failing to understand the spirit behind the proposed legislation but I understand that spirit very well. I understand also its limitations. It is—[Interruption.] Does the Minister want me to give way to him?

Mr. McLeish: No, I am just breathing.

Mr. Grieve: If we consider the way in which the proposed legislation will operate in practice, it will be a fertile area for dispute. What is said to be consultation is all part of the happy-clappy inclusiveness which the Government serve up to us. Everybody can be happy, clappy and inclusive as long as everyone agrees with the decision that the Government will make.

I fail to see how the consultation process, as it is added in by the amendment, will serve any purpose if it is spelt out statutorily if, ultimately, Ministers in Whitehall will have to take the final decision—under considerable pressure, one may suspect, from the electorate south of the border as much as that north of the border. The debate has served to bring that out.

I am worried not that the Minister has presented the amendment and asked us to approve it but by the slightly mealy-mouthed way in which he tries to avoid spelling out the truth behind the amendment. All these things get dressed up. Instead of telling the House, "This is the position, there is a consultation mechanism but at the end of the day Whitehall Ministers will have to decide how allocations are implemented fairly on a United Kingdom basis", the process is dressed up. At the end of the day it is suggested that by the mechanism that has been put before us those north of the border will have an input on a statutory basis into the way in which the formulae are arrived at. That is not correct.

Mr. Hayes: I am hesitant to interrupt my hon. Friend's Anglo-Catholic sermon. Perhaps the Minister can deal with the issue best by adopting the course that we have asked him to follow when discussing previous groups of amendments and using illustrations. We look for some tangible and practical illustrations of how the process would work in practice. In my judgment it is all very well to talk about technical amendments but unless we translate them into practicalities, it is rather hard for us to make judgments about them.

Mr. Grieve: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I am not sure about the Anglo-Catholicism of my speech—it may be Anglo-Scottish for all I know. As I have often said to the Minister, I hope that the legislation works. However, it is incumbent on the Opposition to point out areas in which it may prove to be deficient.

Mr. Syms: The Minister alluded to the proposed subsection (5) under amendment No. 146, which says:

"defined by reference to a quantity (whether expressed as an amount, proportion or ratio or otherwise)".

That leaves a lot of room for misunderstanding. Will this matter be set out in a concordat between the Scottish Executive and the Government so that people know the ground rules in respect of areas of policy, or will it be an ad hoc arrangement—

Mr. McLeish indicated dissent.

Mr. Syms: The Minister shakes his head. That is very important because there might be differences over consultation, not only over what people should be consulted about but over what weight should be given to respective consultations.

The Bill seems to be moving towards some kind of formula whereby people would know where they stand on these issues. I welcome that because it diminishes the potential for disputes. It would be extremely helpful if the Minister would reassure us that that matter will be negotiated between the Scottish Assembly and the Government.

Mr. McLeish: I can give the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) total reassurance on an extremely well made point.

Clause 100

REGULATION OF TWEED AND ESK FISHERIES

Lords amendment: No. 153, in page 46, leave out lines 12 and 13 and insert

("or in connection with the conservation, management and exploitation of salmon, trout, eels and freshwater fish in the Border rivers.

(1A) An Order under subsection (1) may—

(a) exclude the application of section 49 in relation to any Border rivers function,

(b) confer power to make subordinate legislation.

(1B) In particular, provision may be made by such an Order—

(a) conferring any function on a Minister of the Crown, the Scottish Ministers or a public body in relation to the Border rivers,

(b) for any Border rivers function exercisable by any person to be exercisable instead by a person (or another person) mentioned in paragraph (a),

(c) for any Border rivers function exercisable by any person to be exercisable concurrently or jointly with, or with the agreement of or after consultation with, a person (or another person) mentioned in paragraph (a).")

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. McLeish.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 154 to 156, 192, 195 and 209.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick–upon–Tweed): I shall deal first with amendments Nos. 153 to 156, which cover ground that was debated hastily, under urgent timetable pressure, earlier in the proceedings. We now have from the Lords a much expanded definition compared with the original. However, it is quite complex and I hope that the Minister will explain it a little further.

The essential principle that concerns my constituents and me is that what happens in England should not be decided merely by the Scottish Parliament without reference to my constituents' representations, which will be made through this House. [Interruption.] Those who suggest that adjusting the boundary could solve the problem had better have another look at the atlas, because it would be a fairly substantial boundary adjustment.

If the Scottish Parliament decided to allow Sunday fishing on the River Till—a considerable distance south of the border—which would add to pressure on river stocks, current UK legislation would preclude it. However, if the Scottish Parliament became enthusiastic for such a change, or for such a change on the entire Tweed river system, my constituents would have a legitimate interest in resisting that change.

One could imagine other changes, especially as the clause includes environmental aspects that could be significant. If legislation passed in the Scottish Parliament required the removal of various kinds of cauld that exist on the river system now, landowners would be involved in significant expense. We therefore need to be clear that there would then be an effective process of representation through this Parliament, and that any orders made would have regard to that.

What will be the position on commencement day? Will we have to wait some time for an order under clause 100? If so, what will be the position in the mean time? Will the legislation be accompanied by an immediate order under clause 100, or will there be a significant period in which all those matters will be dealt with by Westminster? I do not understand what happens in that interim period. I should be grateful for the Minister's reassurance on both those points, which affect the property and livelihood of a number of my constituents.

Amendments Nos. 192, 195 and 209 define the "Scottish zone" and an order will subsequently amplify the definition. Will that be done immediately, or will we wait for a long time before we have a definition? What happens if we wait for a long time? Will the order introduced under clause 112(2), to which amendment No. 195 refers, create a new definition of the "Scottish zone" and the boundary between Scotland and England out to sea? That is an intriguing prospect, as nobody has produced a satisfactory definition thus far and there are sharp differences of view as to where that boundary should lie.

Of more immediate significance to my constituents are the references to Scottish fishing boats because many boats fishing from ports in my constituency are registered in Scotland. The effect of these amendments appears to be that the fishing activities of a Scottish-registered boat fishing in the English zone would be regulated by the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. McLeish indicated assent.

Mr. Beith: The Minister agrees that that is the correct interpretation. It is easy to understand the logic that, if a vessel is registered in Scotland and its owner fishes in Scottish waters, he has accepted obligations to Scotland which make it appropriate that he should be regulated by Scotland. It is slightly more questionable when, for historical or other reasons, a vessel is registered in Scotland and its owner fishes off Seahouses or Amble and is nevertheless regulated wholly by the Scottish Parliament. Has the Minister thought about that; and will he clarify the position?

Dr. Fox: The question of the River Esk was raised in the other place on several occasions. Will the Minister give us some quick clarifications? As the House knows, the management of the River Esk and the right to its source has been claimed by the North West Water authority, the National Rivers Authority, and now the Environment Agency. When it comes to the question of management, exactly how will joint authorities work together, and what will their relative responsibilities be? If the Minister cannot answer now, I should be grateful if he wrote to me explaining exactly how that will be worked out. I hope that the details of this specific example, as opposed to the generic one that we discussed under the previous group of amendments, have been sorted out because it is a very practical issue that has caused many problems.

May I make a plea for anglers? What is the current position in the Bill regarding rod licensing? That matter was raised in the other place and we did not quite get an answer then.

It may be appropriate to finish discussion of this group of amendments and the Bill by asking about a fixed boundary in the Solway Firth. Given that the centre of the channel moves, how will that come about? Are we to attempt to restrict and fix in legislation something that is wholly flexible and movable in nature? Let us hope that our attempt to do that is better than our attempts in some other parts of the Bill.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus): I do not want to oppose the amendments, but I should like to congratulate the Minister on his efficient and, as ever, competent dispatch of business.

It is appropriate that consideration of the Bill is ending with amendments relating to the River Sark and the River Tweed. This whole saga started in 1974—that long saga is coming to an end as far as the House is concerned, but for Scotland a new story is beginning.

7 pm

Mr. McLeish: I shall be brief, and I think that I can satisfy all the points that hon. Members have raised.

[Mr. McLeish]

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) referred to the Tweed and the Esk. Clearly, these will be matters for both Parliaments, so I cannot predict when decisions will be made. There will be no change to the status quo in the interim, and it will be up to the Parliament, along with Westminster, to define its priorities and what changes will be put in place.

In providing for fisheries to be devolved, the Government have always recognised that special arrangements would be required in respect of the two border river systems which straddle the boundary between England and Scotland. It is universally accepted that fisheries management needs to be approached on a whole-river basis. In doing so, however, anyone responsible for fisheries management for a river system which lies in England and Scotland would have to operate under the law of both England and Scotland. It is necessary, therefore, that the laws for regulating fisheries should be same on both sides of the border.

Our task in respect of the Bill, therefore, is to enable both Parliaments to approve such laws, but in a way that ensures that they both approve the same laws. The Government amendments to clause 100 are intended to allow much the same approach to be taken for the two border rivers between Scotland and England. In effect, we are providing for the legal framework for each of those rivers to be established by Orders in Council—which would be prepared by the Fisheries Departments in both countries in co-operation—and for such Orders in Council to be capable of addressing the wide range of tasks involved in fisheries management.

Such Orders in Council should also be flexible enough to offer a wide range of legal mechanisms for fisheries management, much as would be open for each Parliament if it were acting independently. We have to get it right on both sides of the river, and we have established in the Bill a framework for making sure that that is the case.

On sea fisheries, Government amendments Nos. 29, 192, 195, 209 and 252 relate to the devolution of functions in respect of the regulation of sea fishing. In the White Paper "Scotland's Parliament", the Government made clear their intention to devolve functions relating to sea fisheries, subject to suitable co-ordination arrangements to ensure effective discharge of United Kingdom obligations. The devolution of functions exercised at sea has raised for the Bill particular questions which have required careful thought, and the amendments are the product of that further thought. They are intended to ensure effective devolution.

As hon Members will understand, the exercise of ministerial and other functions in relation to the regulation of sea fishing will often mean that functions are being exercised outside Scotland. I should remind the House that, for the purposes of the Bill, Scotland includes the 12-mile territorial seas around Scotland, as provided in clause 112.

When such regulatory functions are exercised outside Scotland, there will need to be clear connections to Scotland to justify action being taken by the Scottish Ministers, and for Scottish courts to recognise jurisdiction in trying offences under Scots law. At sea, however, it is possible to envisage various possible connections to Scotland that might be thought to satisfy the condition "as regards Scotland".

I am conscious that the requirement to implement devolution for sea fisheries has raised a number of problems for legal advisers and, indeed, for United Kingdom Fisheries Ministers, who remain determined to ensure that United Kingdom obligations to manage fisheries under the common fisheries policy are implemented effectively.

Scottish Ministers will be responsible for managing fisheries within the Scottish zone, and for managing Scottish boats. Ministry of Agriculture Ministers will be responsible for managing fisheries within the waters adjacent to England and for managing English boats. The responsibilities of the Welsh and Northern Ireland Ministers and Assemblies will be a matter for their own legislation.

That overlapping set of responsibilities, which arise because of the need to regulate in respect of sea area and fishing boats which may operate in various areas, opens up a possibility that United Kingdom fishing boats may have to operate under the authority of separate licences issued by the fisheries administration. That is not on the horizon at present. The question of the zone is being considered and discussed, and that consideration will be published when that point is reached. Again, decisions on that will be taken by the new Parliament.

Mr. Beith: Do I understand the Minister to have expressed concern at the confusion that could arise if two boats fishing in the same part of English waters happened to be registered one in Scotland and one in England—even though they were both operating out of the same English port—and that the discussions have some time to go to find a satisfactory resolution?

Mr. McLeish: I can confirm that that is the case. This is an area of regulation that we want to get right, and it will be dealt with.

I hope that this is the last time that the Bill is considered by the House. I should respond to the point made by the hon. Member for Woodspring, which showed the spirit in which the Bill has been considered—it has been a highly technical discussion. He referred to the definition of freshwater fisheries management in the Solway firth.

Under the current legal definition of the Esk, the estuarial limit is drawn to include all the inner Solway firth. There are significant salmon fisheries in that part of the firth, and there are distinctive practices and regulations governing those salmon fisheries in England and Scotland. The relevant management bodies have drawn to our attention the fact that significant difficulties arise for enforcement of salmon fisheries regulations as a result of the fluid nature of the boundary between England and Scotland in the Solway firth. That is at the heart of the point that has been made.

The boundary in the Solway firth has, for many purposes, been taken to be the medium filum of the Esk, and then the combined Esk and Eden rivers at low tide. Things are not getting much simpler as we move through the Bill. The topography of the inner Solway firth is such that that channel can move considerably, and it is difficult to demonstrate to the satisfaction of a court where the channel may have been at any point in time. That has been a frustration for enforcement agencies in that area—not for many years, but for many generations.

The good news is that the Government are considering that issue to come up with some final legal resolution to that on-going conundrum.

Dr. Fox: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As this may be the final time that we discuss the Bill, may I, on behalf of the Opposition, thank you, the other Deputy Speakers and, through you, Madam Speaker, for the way in which procedures have been conducted, especially the long stages in the middle of our consideration?

May I also, through the Minister, thank his civil servants for the information with which we were supplied during consideration of the Bill? Without that, it would have been impossible to come forward with constructive opposition. The Bill is much improved, although, as the Minister noted, we have finished with a debate which has been as clear as mud.

Mr. Wallace: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I associate the Liberal Democrats with the remarks of the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox)? We thank you, your fellow Deputy Speakers and Madam Speaker, as well as Ministers and officials.

If the Minister and his colleagues show flexibility on the one matter that we have referred back to the other place, this may indeed be the last time that we have to debate the Bill on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): There is no need for me to comment on those kind points of order.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCIES BILL
[WAYS AND MEANS]

7.9 pm

The Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning (Mr. Richard Caborn): I beg to move,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Regional Development Agencies Bill, it is expedient to authorise the imposition of charges to corporation tax by provisions relating to the taxation of persons who are transferors or transferees in relation to schemes under the Act for the transfer of property, rights or liabilities.

I shall say a few words by way of explanation of the resolution standing in the name of the Financial Secretary. The Bill returned from the other place includes a new clause before clause 38 on corporation tax. The clause is designed to achieve tax neutrality, in that transfers under the Bill should not trigger a charge to tax. The need for ways and means cover arises because the effect of that may, in principle, involve a change in the incidence of tax as between the transferor and the transferee.

Regional Development Agencies Bill

Lords amendments considered.

CONSTITUTION

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 2, line 4, after ("area,") insert—

("( ) such persons as appear to him to represent the interests of those who live, work or carry on business in rural parts of the agency's area,")

7.10 pm

The Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning (Mr. Richard Caborn): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

The Bill, as we sent it to the other place, provided a general list of the types of people whom the Secretary of State must consult before making an appointment. The list included representatives of local authorities, employers, employees and others. Each heading in the list could be said to encompass rural interests no less than non-rural interests. I can confirm that that is how we have proceeded.

None the less, we are a listening Government, and we have been happy to listen to those who have said that their concern about identifying board members with rural expertise will persist unless the Government put it beyond any doubt that rural interests will be consulted about appointments now and—what seemed to cause most concern—in the future. We were happy to table the amendment in the other place to do just that. I commend the amendment to the House.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South): This is a minimalist, grudging amendment that has been brought about by effective Conservative opposition. The Minister says that he wants to place it beyond any doubt that the Government are concerned about rural interests. That has been in doubt for a long time, particularly during the passage of the Bill, and it remains in doubt to this day.

The amendment goes some way towards meeting the Conservative party's point about rural representation. In the other place, a similar amendment was rejected, on the odd ground that it was not appropriate for London. That amendment proposed that a representative who was an expert or had some involvement in rural interests should sit on the development agency.

We accept that this amendment ensures that rural interests will be consulted. Our concern is that pressures grow, and it will be all too easy for urban interests to dominate debates inside the development agency. The amendment does not fully alleviate that concern, but it provides some consultation of rural interests, and as such we are happy to support it.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): The Liberal Democrats are grateful that this matter has been considered and an acceptable form of words has been found. Many of the divisions in our society between urban and rural areas are based on misconceptions. It was important to address this issue, and it has come back before us today. Many people in rural areas will feel more satisfied that their voice will be heard under these new structures.

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): I, too, am relieved that some element of rural representation has been accepted in the amendment from the other place. As the representative of a rural area in West Sussex, I have two concerns outstanding. The RDAs will, in effect, clearly take the lead on transport policy, and, in practice, may take the lead on structural planning. Those are two key rural issues, and I express the great concern of my constituents from all parties that the powers of county councils, particularly rural county councils, will be emasculated.

Mr. Caborn: I can clarify the position for the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight). Planning and transport powers will not be assigned to regional development agencies.

Lords amendment agreed to.

POWER TO ALTER REGIONS

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 13, line 20, leave out from ("instrument") to end of line 21 and insert—

("(8) No order shall be made under this section unless a draft of it has been laid before and approved by resolution of each House of Parliament.

(9) An order under this section which would, apart from this subsection, be treated for the purposes of the standing orders of either House of Parliament as a hybrid instrument shall proceed in that House as if it were not such an instrument.")

7.15 pm

Mr. Caborn: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Clause 25 deals with the Secretary of State's powers to alter the regions of RDAs by order. In the Bill sent to the other place, the order was to be subject to the negative resolution procedure in both Houses, following consultation with interested parties and, where appropriate, a public inquiry.

Amendment No. 2 provides for orders made under clause 25 to be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure rather than the negative resolution procedure, as provided for in the Bill as drafted. That reflects a recommendation from the House of Lords Delegated Powers Scrutiny Committee, which the Government were content to accept.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Clause 35

POWERS IN RELATION TO THE COMMISSION

Lords amendment: No. 3, in page 16, line 6, at end insert—

("( ) make provision conferring on the Commission functions with respect to the provision of services of any description to regional development agencies,")

Mr. Caborn: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 4 to 6.

Mr. Caborn: These amendments are purely technical. Amendments Nos. 3 and 5 allow the Secretary of State to specify, by order, that English Partnerships and the Rural Development Commission may provide services to the RDAs. We have in mind the provision of IT services in particular, so as to ensure that the expertise and the IT systems of EP and the RDC are available to the RDAs in the early days, to enable them to become established quickly and seamlessly. That is without prejudice to the wishes of the RDAs to consider their long-term strategies.

Amendments Nos. 4 and 6 relate to the making of schemes to transfer staff and assets from EP or the RDC to other public bodies, other than RDAs. Throughout the Bill, transfers of staff and assets from EP, the RDC or Government offices to RDAs are effected by transfer schemes to be approved by the Secretary of State. The amendments make it clear that transfer schemes relating to transfers from EP and RDC to other public bodies can be prepared in a similar way, separate from the orders made under clauses 35 or 37. I commend the amendments to the House.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 4 to 6 agreed to.

New clause

Lords amendment: No. 7, before clause 38, to insert the following new clause—Corporation tax—

".—(1) The following provisions apply for the purposes of the Corporation Tax Acts.

(2) Any trade or part of a trade transferred under a transfer scheme is to be treated as having been, at the time of its commencement and at all times since that time, a separate trade carried on by the transferee.

(3) Where any trade, or part of a trade, is transferred under a transfer scheme, the trade carried on by the transferee after the date of the transfer is to be treated as the same trade as that which, by virtue of subsection (2), it is treated as having carried on before that date.

(4) All property, rights and liabilities transferred under a transfer scheme are to be treated as having been, at the time when they became vested in the transferor, and at all times since that time, property, rights and liabilities of the transferee.

(5) Anything done, in relation to property, rights and liabilities transferred under a transfer scheme, by the transferor is to be deemed to have been done by the transferee.

(6) Where any property, rights and liabilities transferred under a transfer scheme became vested in the transferor by virtue of a transfer made by a company in which, at the time of the transfer, the transferor held an interest, that interest is to be deemed to have been held at that time by the transferee.

(7) Where any property, rights and liabilities transferred under a transfer scheme became vested in the transferor by virtue of a qualifying transfer, or two or more successive qualifying transfers

(a) subsection (4) has effect as if the reference to the time when the property, rights and liabilities became vested in the transferor were a reference to the time when they became vested in the original transferor (that is to say, the transferor under the qualifying transfer or, as the case may be, the first of the qualifying transfers), and

(b) if the property, rights and liabilities became vested in the original transferor by virtue of a transfer made by a company in which, at the time of the transfer, the original transferor held an interest, that interest is to be deemed to have been held at that time by the transferee under the transfer scheme.

(8) The previous provisions of this section are subject to such apportionments of unallowed tax losses and of expenditure by reference to which capital allowances may be made as may be specified in the transfer scheme concerned.

(9) This section has effect in relation to accounting periods beginning after the final accounting period.

(10) In this section—

"capital allowance" has the same meaning as in the Tax Acts;

"final accounting period" means the last complete accounting period of the transferor under the transfer scheme concerned;

"qualifying transfer" means a transfer made to one of the following bodies by another such body—

(a) the Development Commission,

(b) the Urban Regeneration Agency,

(c) a regional development agency;

"transfer scheme" means—

(a) an order under section 25 which includes provision for the transfer of property, rights or liabilities, and

(b) a scheme under any of sections 34 to 37 for the transfer of property, rights or liabilities;

"unallowed tax losses" means any losses, allowances or amounts which, as at the end of the final accounting period, are tax losses within the meaning given by section 400(2) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988."

Mr. Caborn: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I inform the House that this amendment involves privilege.

Mr. Caborn: This is a technical amendment, to ensure that the transfer of assets in schemes made under the Bill is neutral for the purposes of corporation tax. The amendment follows a similar provision contained in the Electricity Act 1989. It provides that the body receiving the assets stands in the shoes of the body from which they have been transferred, so that, for tax purposes, it is as if the assets had not changed hands. That is particularly important in the case of assets transferred to the RDAs from English Partnerships.

Part of English Partnerships' work is to reclaim land for redevelopment. When the land is sold, English Partnerships is liable to pay tax on the proceeds, but can offset against that the cost of reclamation and other work. The amendment will allow an RDA to offset against tax expenditure incurred by English Partnerships before the land was transferred to the RDA. Without it, the RDA would be liable to pay tax on the whole of the increased value of the land, regardless of the fact that much of that would be due to the money that English Partnerships had invested in reclaiming it.

The Corporation Tax Act 1988 provides for similar arrangements in the case of companies in common ownership; but, as "common ownership" is defined there in terms of share capital, we need specific provision in the case of non-departmental public bodies in the common ownership of the Secretary of State.

I commend the amendment to the House.

European Parliamentary Elections Bill

Lords Reasons for insisting on certain of their amendments to which the Commons have disagreed and for disagreeing to the Commons amendment to the Bill in lieu, considered.

Lords Reason:

The Lords insist on their Amendments in page 2, lines 1, 2, 15 and 18, to which the Commons have disagreed, for the following Reason:

Because electors should be able to vote for the individual party candidate of their choice.

7.20 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): I beg to move, That this House insists on its disagreement with the Lords in their amendments, but does not insist on its amendment in lieu.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss the further Government amendment in lieu of the Lords amendments, in page 3, line 46, at end insert—

'Review of electoral system

.—(1) The Secretary of State shall appoint one or more persons—

(a) to review, in accordance with subsection (2), the operation of the system of election provided for by section 3 of the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978 as substituted by section 1 of this Act, and

(b) to make a report to the Secretary of State within six months from the day of appointment.

(2) The review shall consider, in particular, how the ability of electors to vote for particular persons on a party's list of candidates might affect the results of an election.

(3) The Secretary of State shall carry out his duty under subsection (1) within one month from the date of the first general election to the European Parliament which takes place after the coming into force of section 1.

(4) The Secretary of State shall lay a copy of any report received under subsection (1)(b) before each House of Parliament.'.

Mr. Straw: This is the fourth time that I have had to invite the House to approve the election system for the European parliamentary elections, and the third time that I have had to ask this elected House to override their unelected Lordships.

The arguments against the proposals from the other place are, on their merits, overwhelming; so are the arguments in favour of the closed or simple-list system that we have advanced. The so-called open-list system is not more democratic than the closed-list system, but less democratic. If it were implemented, the result would be anger and incredulity on the part of the electors, directed against those who had instigated it. The electors would feel that an elaborate confidence trick had been played on them. Let me explain why.

The essence of a democratic election system is that those who win the most votes win the most seats: winners win, and losers lose. Under this Conservative system, the winners may lose and the loser may win. The Conservative party claims to support first past the post—it claims to be united on that, if on nothing else. This, however, is not first past the post, but last past the post. Although the proponents of the system on the Opposition Benches here, and in the other place, understand this only dimly, their system is so flawed that a candidate from, for example, the Conservative party who receives 500,000 votes may not be elected, while a candidate from, say, the Liberal Democrats who receives 350,000 votes may be elected in his place. Is that the result that Opposition Members want? Do they understand the nature of the system that they propose? What explanation would they offer their candidates and their party—let alone the public—if that happened? It is the politics of the absurd; and the fact that the Tory party has chosen this of all propositions on which to manufacture a battle between the Lords and the Commons shows the extent to which good judgment has now departed the leadership of the Conservative party.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): If the Home Secretary considers the arguments in support of the closed list to be so overwhelming, why did 36 Cross-Bench peers vote against the Government, and only one with?

Mr. Straw: I must say, with all due respect to the Cross Benchers in the House of Lords, that most of them are also hereditary peers, and I do not believe that they understand the arguments any more than the Front Benchers.

Let us be clear about this. I tried it to help the hon. Gentleman on the last occasion. When Conservative Members engage in complexities, they usually end up making a complete dog's breakfast of their suggestions, and that is what is happening now. The unavoidable truth of the so-called open system that the Conservatives propose is as I have spelt out: candidates receiving more votes may not be elected, while candidates receiving fewer votes may be elected.

Mr. Lansley: Will the Home Secretary give way again?

Mr. Straw: No.

The Conservatives have synthetically manufactured this battle. What gives the lie to their claims that they are defending some grand democratic principle against a dastardly new Labour scheme is the fact that they, as a Government, were the first to use the closed list. I know that they do not wish to be reminded of that—I have watched them squirm every time we remind them—but the system that I am now recommending to the House, for the fourth time, is the same in every particular as the scheme that the Conservatives recommended to this House and the other place in 1996. If the closed-list system is so bad in principle today, why was it not so bad two years ago, when the Conservatives suggested it?

The only excuse to which the Conservatives resort—a threadbare excuse—is that they proposed a closed list for Northern Ireland. What kind of argument is that, especially from a party that was once proud to have "Unionist" as part of its name? The former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon

(Mr. Major), did not say that Ireland needed the closed-list system because it had particular problems. Speaking of the very same system that we are now discussing, he said:

"I believe that this is a fair and balanced system that will produce a representative outcome."—[Official Report, 21 March 1996; Vol. 274, c. 498.]

In Committee on the same Conservative Bill, proposing closed lists, the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram)—the Conservative party's constitutional expert, and its chairman—said:

"The strength of the system that we are proposing is that, for the voter, it requires only one cross to be put against one party. We must make sure that the voter understands that when he goes into the polling booth and is faced with the ballot paper. I think that what we are proposing is the best way to achieve that."—[Official Report, 23 April 1996; Vol. 276, c. 283.]

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): The Home Secretary is making a terrible case for his measure—even worse than usual. Does he not concede that the former Prime Minister made it clear that that position was being adopted only in the context of Northern Ireland? [Interruption.] The right hon. Gentleman laughs. Will he not also concede that his Prime Minister, then Leader of the Opposition, said:

"As I am sure that the Prime Minister"—

my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major)—

"would agree, the solution on the election process is certainly not ideal"?—[Official Report, 21 March 1996; Vol. 279, c. 499.]

Mr. Straw: If the right hon. Gentleman had bothered to read the debate properly, he would know that one of the reasons why my right hon. Friend said it was that what was proposed was a combination of the single transferable vote and the closed list. We never objected to the closed-list system at that stage, and—this is more to the point, as it is they who are now objecting to it—neither did the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues.

What the right hon. Member for Devizes said about the strength of the system as it applied to Northern Ireland must also apply to the rest of the United Kingdom. After all, it is the same system. As I said in the House last week, it is extraordinary that the Conservative party should now propose one of the most complicated of the alternatives—leaving aside its other defects—given that one of its many objections to the Jenkins proposal related to its complexity.

If the right hon. Gentleman will not take advice from me, he might be wise to take advice from one or two of his noble Friends, particularly those who are standing for the European Parliament under the closed-list system. There was a fascinating letter in The Daily Telegraph today from Lord Bethell, who was MEP for London North-West until he lost his seat in 1994 under the old first-past-the-post system. He now stands as No. 3 on the Conservatives' closed list, and plainly hopes and expects to be elected. Having gone through a ritual congratulations to the Opposition in the Lords, he said—I quote directly from the letter:

"I wonder, though, if the Conservatives want the elections to be fought on the fully 'open list' system. If so, they will run into problems. The open list offers a choice so wide as to be confusing, especially since hardly any of the several hundred candidates whose names will be put forward have any public profile. Ballot papers will carry 50 or more names. Hardly anyone will know of them. Voters will mark their crosses at random."—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Some hon. Member has an electrical device that is sounding off in the Chamber. Madam Speaker takes an extremely strong line on these matters. Members must either ensure that they have properly switched them off, or leave them outside the Chamber.

7.30 pm

Mr. Straw: You are right, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to upbraid the Conservative who had failed to turn his pager off. The same thing happened on Second Reading of the Bill on 25 November last year.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) rose—

Mr. Straw: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman when I have finished reading Lord Bethell's excellent letter. Lord Bethell goes on with this sage advice to his party:

"A change to the open list will also cause conflict between candidates of the same party, who will be competing as much against their colleagues as against their adversaries. One advantage of the closed list is that in London, for instance—where I hope to stand—all 10 of us Conservatives are in the same 'job lot'. A vote for one is a vote for us all."

I would have thought that, these days, some mechanism that ensures some Conservative unity would be welcome to the Conservative party.

Mr. Swayne: My understanding is that Lord Bethell voted against the Government on the issue, but did the right hon. Gentleman see the article on the opposite page by Daniel Hannan, placed fourth in the list for the south-east? If he did not, I commend it to him.

Mr. Straw: I did read Mr. Hannan's article. I have marked it up and have it here. By the way, although I have a high regard for Mr. Hannan, whom I know, he erred. He said:

"In Britain, where democracy preceded parties".

Tories often make the error of believing that the development of representative government that we had in this country over many centuries up to the end of the previous century was democracy; it was not. We did not get around to establishing a properly democratic franchise until this century, so Mr. Hannan, on that key point, is in error.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid–Bedfordshire): Did the Home Secretary read Lord Bethell's speech of 12 November at columns 862 and 863? If so, he would have recognised that Lord Bethell was not just speaking against closed lists, but recommending a different system.

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman shows the degree of confusion in the ranks of the Tory party. I have read out what Lord Bethell wrote in The Daily Telegraph today. I assume that, like quite a number of other Conservatives, he now has a touch of the panics. He realises the considerable problems that will arise to the Conservative party if the leadership of his party and the Conservative Whips in the other place continue this process.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I am listening carefully. I hope that we will not hear too much of Lord Bethell because, although he is a dear man, he once marched around a kibbutz and said solemnly to the young man in charge, "Wouldn't it be better run by private enterprise?" I have never had quite the same faith in his judgment since.

Mr. Straw: None of us will vote for Lord Bethell, even if we are presented with the opportunity to do so, but his words speak for themselves. He makes the point that I have been making to Conservative Members for many months: to have a so-called open list with 50 or more names on the ballot papers, where hardly any of them—says a candidate who is pretty well known himself—is known, will lead to voters marking "their crosses at random".

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): I am following the Home Secretary's observations with close interest. Is he aware that Lord Bethell, who is an estimable individual, is also a constituent of mine residing in Brill in the Buckingham constituency? Is he further aware that Lord Bethell is a lifelong opponent of centralism and deeply disapproves of the thoroughly undemocratic, Stalinist fashion in which the Labour party wishes to select its candidate for the European elections?

Mr. Straw: My party is a lifelong opponent of centralism as well. We do not need any lectures about centralism from the Conservative party. Some of us remember when the Conservative party was in power, and the Stalinism of Conservative central office knew no bounds.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): Does the Home Secretary agree that, under the system that is proposed by the Conservatives in their amendment, the single biggest factor in whether Lord Bethell got elected was whether he was listed as Bethell, Lord or Lord Bethell?

Mr. Straw: That is likely to be the case, but even though Lord Bethell has the advantage of being at the top of the alphabet, a problem from which I have suffered all my life, being near the bottom of the alphabet—look where it has got me—he is firmly against the so-called open list.

The suggestion that the closed list is anathema to our British way of politics is synthetic nonsense. All of us were selected for closed lists—one party, one candidate. That is how it works. A Tory in Sutton Coldfield, a Liberal Democrat in Berwick-upon-Tweed and a Labour supporter in Blackburn have no choice whatever of party candidate. It is take it or leave it. It is no good saying that that is an inherent characteristic of single-member constituencies; it is not. It would be feasible to devise a system for single-member constituencies where each party had to offer two or three candidates, and the voter separately chose the winning candidate from the winning party. Is that what the Conservative party now wants for Westminster? That is the logic of its position.

As to how the closed-list system works out in practice, although we believe—I have made this clear—that it has inherent advantages over any other variant, we do not suggest that this debate should be Parliament's last word on the subject. It was for that reason that, last week, I moved that there should be inserted in the Bill an amendment stating that a statutory review should be carried out into the new system.

I think that that proposal had general approbation, but questions were raised about the review. One was as to who should conduct it. A second was as to whether the review could deal with the principle of closed lists, as well as their operation.

On the first question, I undertake that there will be consultations with the Opposition parties about who should undertake the review. The amendment makes it clear that, formally, the appointment will be a matter for the Secretary of State, but I recognise that the review will be far better if there is agreement on who should undertake it.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): May I re-emphasise the issue that I raised last week on the review? Will there be a role for the Scottish Parliament and a Welsh Assembly, because the lists for the European elections are separate? Will there be a determination to ensure that there are representatives of those bodies on that review?

Mr. Straw: I understand the hon. Lady's concern. I undertake to consult her about that. We have not made decisions yet about how many people should conduct the review, but I accept her point that there should be a proper input from Scotland and Wales. I think that the review will have to take place in advance of the formal establishment of the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh Assembly, but I take her point and I hope to meet it.

On the second question, the amendment proposed last week spoke of the "operations" of the new system. I told the House that I took that to include the principle behind the system, but the new Government amendment makes that clear beyond doubt. Subsection (2) states:

"The review shall consider, in particular, how the ability of electors to vote for particular persons on a party's list of candidates might affect the results of an election."

Overwhelming though the arguments are on their merits against the open list, and in favour of the closed list, this issue has now gone beyond that. It is now about Lords versus Commons, about whether a Labour Government, elected just 18 months ago with one of the strongest popular mandates this century, should be blocked from meeting one of their promises to the electorate by a Conservative Opposition who suffered their greatest defeat this century. It is about whether democracy should be defeated by aristocracy—by the in-built majority of hereditary Conservative peers appointed to the other place not because of their own merit but because of the accident of their birth.

I think that the public will find it extraordinary that, for a Conservative party seeking to modernise itself for the next century, Tory Whips in the other place are dragging out hereditary peers to stop the Government securing the clearest of manifesto commitments. For Lord Cranborne to argue—as he did yesterday—that we did not say exactly which list system we would use is to take sophistry to its extremes. It was highly probable that we would use a system used by most voters in the European Union—the closed-list system—and inherently improbable that we would fetch up with the Conservatives' strange alternative of last past the post. Moreover, I have no recollection of any Tory, at any stage during the general election campaign, ever raising the issue—perhaps because fresh in their minds was the memory that they had used the closed-list system in Northern Ireland.

As long ago as 1791, in "The Rights of Man", Tom Paine said:

"The idea of hereditary legislators is as inconsistent as that of hereditary judges, as hereditary juries; and as absurd as an hereditary mathematician, or an hereditary wise man; as absurd as an hereditary Poet Laureate."

There is no rule of politics or history stating that political parties are bound to survive, however distinguished may be their past—as is the Tory party's. Last Friday, the Adam Smith Institute and MORI published the results of a detailed survey of the attitudes of young voters—of the so-called "millennial generation"—who will reach the age of 21 around the turn of the century. The survey made dismal reading for the Conservative party. Only 12 per cent.—one in eight—of those questioned said that they would support the Conservative party.

If Conservative Members want some explanation of the reason why they are regarded as irrelevant to Britain's future by so many of those who are Britain's future, they need look no further than the unedifying pantomime of their party's behaviour on the Bill, in which they seek to use an undemocratic and unelected institution that is locked in the 18th century to block the will of the elected House.

Sir Norman Fowler: As the Home Secretary said, this is the fourth time that we have debated the subject. I think that everyone who has listened to our previous debates will think that the Home Secretary's speech today is easily the weakest one on the subject that he has made so far. The most extraordinary claim he has made so far is that there are overwhelming arguments in favour of closed lists. The arguments are so overwhelming that he has failed to convince anyone except Ministers. He has certainly not convinced Labour Back Benchers, the press or the public, which is why he was so glad to move on to the party politics of Commons versus Lords, and to get off the substance of this debate.

The Home Secretary seemed to suggest that there was some type of constitutional problem with the Bill. For the reasons that Lord Shore—who is not a Conservative—gave in the other place when he voted once more against the Government, I believe that that is an exaggerated claim. The point that the Home Secretary avoids is that, if there is a problem, the man who is responsible for the problem is the Home Secretary himself. He chose closed-list voting. He cannot shuffle that responsibility on to anyone else. It is because of his blunder and his mistake that we are debating the issue yet again.

The Home Secretary also cannot claim that he was not warned of the consequences of going down the closed-list route. In the very first speech that he made on the Bill, 12 months ago, on Second Reading, he was challenged directly on closed lists. He was challenged not only by Conservative Members but by Labour Members. The hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) said quite bluntly:

"many of us will not be persuaded by the argument that closed party lists on a regional basis are the right horse for this course."

The hon. Gentleman suggested that it would be appropriate to give the House a choice of proportional systems.

Replying, the Home Secretary said:

"Today we are implementing a manifesto commitment on which all Labour Members stood."—[Official Report, 25 November 1997; Vol. 301, c. 807.]

However, the Home Secretary knew as well as we know that Labour Members did not have a manifesto commitment on the closed list. Although they had a commitment to proportional representation in the European election, that is not the issue in this debate.

I make it clear yet again that Conservative Members would infinitely prefer a first-past-the-post system. Much of this prolonged debate has simply confirmed that belief—which I suspect is shared by my hon. Friends. However, that is not the issue in this debate. The Government have forced through the PR system and forced through regional lists. The only remaining issue is whether the public shall have the right to elect their Members of the European Parliament on a named candidate basis—on an open list—or be confined to voting for only one party on a closed list.

Mr. Ivor Caplin (Hove): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether he accepts the principle that the closed-list system that the House is considering is identical to the systems used in Germany and France?

Sir Norman Fowler: Even if it were identical to the system used in Germany and France, I am not sure where that would take the argument.

Mr. Caplin: It is the same.

Sir Norman Fowler: Where does that take the argument on democracy in the United Kingdom? If the hon. Gentleman wishes to argue that the system advances democracy, I very much hope that he will make a speech on the subject. I very much hope that he will make a speech on it also because we have not heard one Labour Back-Bench speech in favour of closed lists. We have not heard one serious speech by a Labour Back Bencher in favour of the system. Although I am not sure that a speech by the hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin) could meet my definition of a serious one, I look forward to hearing one from him, if and when it comes.

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Gentleman—

Mr. Caplin: He has lost the plot.

Mr. Straw: Yes. The right hon. Gentleman should refresh his memory about the debates on Second Reading. My hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham,

[Mr. Straw]

Northfield (Mr. Burden), for Stroud (Mr. Drew), for Wyre Forest (Mr. Lock) and for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey) all supported the Bill as published, which included closed lists.

Sir Norman Fowler: I now understand why the Home Secretary is such a good lawyer. It is perfectly true that there were such arguments—I have read them—on Second Reading. It is true also that the Home Secretary won for the Bill a majority of votes on Second Reading. However, can he name one Labour Back Bencher who has spoken in favour of the Government's proposals on closed lists? I shall give way to the right hon. Gentleman. The fact is that they all voted, but none of them spoke in favour of closed lists. The Home Secretary is squirming, and he knows that he is squirming. He should perhaps let the debate proceed.

Everyone—regardless of party allegiance—agrees that the closed-list system gives power to the party. It must do that; that is what it is all about. Virtually everyone agrees that, under the system, the Member of the European Parliament will become responsible to the party and not to the public. The whole point of closed lists is to transfer power from the public to the party bosses. However, despite all the arguments, the Home Secretary has persisted in proposing a voting system that has been almost universally condemned in both Houses of Parliament.

As I said, not one Back Bencher—not only in the House, but in the other place—has spoken in the debates of the past two or three weeks in favour of the closed-list system. Even last Thursday, when two or three Labour peers were at last rolled out to support the Government, they were at pains to distinguish their case from the argument on the closed list.

Lord Barnett, in his first sentence in support of the Government, said:

"I should make clear that I prefer the open list system."

Lord Richard, also supporting the Government, tackled the problem in a slightly different way. He said:

"I am not concerned about the issue of open lists and closed lists".

Lord Evans who, in the previous debate, had been an abstaining rebel, this time voted with the Government, but ended his speech with the warning:

"I shall continue to oppose closed lists. I shall take up, through my party's machinery, the absolute necessity of getting rid of the appalling methods we have used to select candidates."

However, he added that that was a matter for future debates, as he sought to explain his change of mind. I watched the debate and was glad to observe from the response that the Lords can spot a bogus reason when they see one.

The debates are positively littered with examples of Labour Members and Labour peers attacking the Government. In the debate to which I just referred—it is only the latest one—Lord Shore, who is not exactly a Conservative peer, said:

"The issue is about the open list against the closed list. It is about an open democratic list against a closed party management list. It is about accountability to the electorate, to the voters, against accountability to a party committee".

Lord Stoddart, who was provoked to speak by Lord Barnett, rather against the interests of Lord Barnett and those on the Government Front Bench, said that he had been accused of being a leading Eurosceptic, which he was, but that had nothing to do with his motives. He said:

"Indeed, as a leading Euro-sceptic, it would suit me very well to support this legislation because it divides and separates even further the Euro MPs from the electorate . . . The fact of the matter is that I believe that this legislation is bad because it removes the link between the electorate and the elected."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 12 November 1998; Vol. 594, c. 851-61.]

So far, the argument that the Home Secretary believes is overwhelming does not appear to be going altogether his way. Perhaps the press has been kinder to him. However, the leader in The Times on Saturday does not lead to that conclusion. It said:

"The Government should not continue to defend the indefensible. There is almost no Member of either House of Parliament who has any sincere enthusiasm for closed lists. It is not enough to conduct a review of a rotten exercise after it has happened. This could only challenge the legitimacy of those who are elected. Mr. Straw should make the most of the unwanted opportunity that their Lordships have thrust upon him. He should drop this dubious proposal entirely."

That is exactly what the Home Secretary should do. The system that the Home Secretary is proposing is basically without friends. We all know that.

If the Home Secretary wants a constitutional issue, I suggest that he examine the speech made in the House on Tuesday last week by the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek). In taking up the argument of another Labour Member, the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), who also criticised the closed list and who I see is in his place, the hon. Gentleman said that his hon. Friend had "argued, with good grounds, that there is no majority in favour of the closed-list system in the parliamentary Labour party. Yet, he also argued that the Government would have a large majority tonight. I ask the House to think about that contradiction. If there is no majority in the Labour party, but the system is such that the Whips and the Patronage Secretary can dragoon members through the Lobby—and I admit that I will be dragooned when the time comes—what legitimacy does the elected Chamber have in comparison with the unelected Chamber whose Members may, by and large, vote according to their own judgment on the right course of action for the country?"—[Official Report, 10 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 226.]

That was a Labour Member speaking only a few days ago, and surely he asked the question that we should be asking.

We are being asked to accept a voting system that next to no one wants, yet the Government are forcing it through against opinion in their own party, against that of the Conservative party and against the vote in the House of Lords. Let us not pretend that it is a great test of the democratic process. The issue is not the House of Lords carrying out its right and proper function, but Labour Whips forcing support for a voting system which the Labour party, left to its own devices, would reject.

As for the Lords, it is certainly true that hereditary peers helped to vote down the Government amendment, but so did Labour peers like Lord Shore and Lord Stoddart and, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) pointed out, the vast majority of Cross Benchers. I am no more convinced now than I was before that the votes of some of the Labour placemen who have been put into the House of Lords are in some ways superior to those votes. The Home Secretary will find it very difficult to establish overwhelming support for the Government's proposals.

Even a Liberal Democrat broke ranks last week. Up to now, the Liberal Democrats have exhibited what is, even for them, the most extraordinarily pathetic attitude to the issue. They have argued for the open list but voted for the closed list. That is not being cruel—it is simply a fact. To his great credit, Lord Russell this time voted against the Government. He ignored the threat that he would be sacked from the Liberal Democrat Front Bench. As far as I know, he has not been sacked. Of course, it would have been terrible had it happened, but the Liberal Democrats can no more make up their mind about sacking a spokesman than they can about anything else. In any event, it exposes the terrible sham of the Liberal Democrats in opposition, and can be explained only by their new coalition with the Government.

This is the third time that we have debated the amendment regarding the open list and the Government's opposition to it. The Government's latest amendment makes no concession and is not intended to do so. The Home Secretary does not expect us to be persuaded by a review which, by definition, will take place after the European elections. His arguments are increasingly unconvincing, and the most unconvincing of all is that which he uses about the closed-list system in the exceptional circumstances of Northern Ireland.

I took the trouble to confirm the position in Northern Ireland with my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon, the former Prime Minister. He confirms that when it was used for the election for a deliberative forum in Northern Ireland, it was to meet the special circumstances there, and was so explained. That was not what the Home Secretary said tonight.

My point is confirmed by the statement made by my right hon. Friend the former Prime Minister on 21 March 1996. Speaking of the list system, he said that the solution was "not ideal". He used those words because the then Leader of the Opposition, now the Prime Minister, had began his questioning by saying:

> "As I am sure that the Prime Minister would agree, the solution on the election process is certainly not ideal".—[Official Report, 21 March 1996; Vol. 274, c. 499.]

Yet it is that "not ideal" voting system that we are now to have for the European election. How does the Prime Minister defend that? Apparently, he says that it is simpler. That shows a deeply patronising attitude to the British electorate. It is saying that it is all rather complex for the public, so the Government will help them or, in fact, decide for them.

I am most unconvinced by the Home Secretary's analogy with the election of Members of Parliament to Westminster. There is a fundamental difference. I leave aside cases in which the public have rejected the candidate in spite of the party label or in which people have resigned the party label to challenge the party, sometimes successfully—for example, Dick Taverne. Most of us in this House regard our first duty as being to the public and to the people who elected us. Under the closed-list system, the representatives' first duty can easily become a duty to the party because it is the party that selected them. That is a fundamental difference.

There is one straightforward issue in this debate. It is the difference between the closed list, under which the public vote not for a candidate but for a party, and the open list, under which the public may choose a named candidate who will represent them. That is the choice we face.

The Home Secretary attacks the House of Lords and the role of a second chamber. He is as unconvincing in those attacks as he is in all his other arguments. He avoids the real criticism that the argument against the system that he has proposed is that it is basically anti-democratic. He cannot raise a flag proclaiming "power to the people" when the system that he proposes will give power to the parties. However, he seeks to do just that.

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Norman Fowler: No, I will not. I am just finishing. [HON. MEMBERS: "Go on."] Well, I will if they wish it.

Mr. Stunell: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. At the start of his speech, he said that he infinitely preferred the first-past-the-post system. Does he accept that if he succeeds in retaining that system for the European elections, there will in fact be a closed list for each individual European constituency?

8 pm

Sir Norman Fowler: That shows the value of giving way to the hon. Gentleman. I shall learn from that for the future. The hon. Gentleman is a bit slow on the uptake so I shall take him back a little. We are not debating the first-past-the-post system.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick–upon–Tweed): Oh yes we are.

Sir Norman Fowler: Oh no we are not. I shall not be rude to the right hon. Gentleman, but he is mistaken. I could put it more strongly than that.

We are debating what kind of voting system will be used under the type of proportional system that the Government are forcing through. Will we have an open-list system, or a closed-list system? I find the attitude of the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) extraordinary, hypocritical and baffling in every way. He argues for an open-list system, but he will vote tonight for a closed-list system. That is the hypocrisy of the Liberal Democrats.

The Home Secretary's proposals take power from the electorate, and give power to the party bosses. That is our fundamental criticism of his system. It takes power from local people, and transfers power to the centre. It is no surprise that the Home Secretary's proposals have been almost universally condemned as there is no serious justification for them. For those reasons, the House should reject the Home Secretary's latest amendments.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I have not participated previously in debates on this matter. I have abstained until now, and I have not voted for the Bill as I think it a very bad Bill. I hope that I can be acquitted of having any sympathy for the House of Lords. To be invited to disagree with the Lords on any matter is to be tempted to do so, but the arguments against the closed-list system are absolutely overwhelming. Indeed, those arguments are the same as the arguments against the House of Lords itself for its Members all got in on a closed list. The Prime Minister draws up a little closed list, and he puts all its members into the House of Lords. If we get rid of the hereditary peers, which I would welcome, we shall have nothing but a closed list in the Lords. They will all be the Prime Minister's friends. My objection to the Bill is, therefore, the same as my objection to the House of Lords.

Is there a mandate for the Bill? No one came up to me during the general election campaign to say, "Tony, we will vote Labour only if you promise that we cannot vote for an individual candidate in the European elections." No one said any such thing, and I did not know that that was the policy. I have dealt with many Members of the European Parliament who are conscientious, who work with local Members of Parliament and who become known over a period in their constituencies, although that task is difficult as they cover nine parliamentary constituencies. They go to Brussels and Strasbourg to take up local cases, and they are as conscious of their constituency link as we are. I have reservations about the European Union, but that is another matter. If we must have an EU, and a European Parliament, the best way in which to elect that Parliament is to do it in the way that we do here. People are elected to speak for their constituents, and their constituents can, in the end, dispose of them.

The House will forgive me for quoting five democratic questions that I have developed during my life. If one meets a powerful person—Rupert Murdoch, perhaps, or Joe Stalin or Hitler—one can ask five questions: what power do you have; where did you get it; in whose interests do you exercise it; to whom are you accountable; and, how can we get rid of you? Anyone who cannot answer the last of those questions does not live in a democratic system. I am alarmed that any party should seek to impose candidates.

I served for 34 years on the national executive of the Labour party, and I was often responsible for decisions when contested parliamentary selection conferences came up. The rule that we followed was simple. If the procedure adopted to select a candidate was correct, the national executive always endorsed that candidate.

Mr. Beith: Always?

Mr. Benn: Yes. That was the principle involved. Liberals refer to closed lists under the first-past-the-post system, but the lists are not closed when the constituencies choose the candidates. Candidates are chosen by a selection process within their constituencies. The party should do no more than indicate whether it accepts that that is a valid principle on which to operate.

If we get away from that principle, MEPs will always look to the party leader, not to their constituents. There is a difference between being employed by one person and being employed by everyone. During last week's debate on proportional representation, I drew attention to the fact that we are employed by our constituents, and not by our parties. The idea that Members of Parliament or MEPs are simply local managers for the national party is absolutely contrary to everything for which people fought over many centuries as they argued for representative government.

The Liberal Democrat view puzzles me. That party has always been a great public advocate of being free from party hacks. I know why the Liberal Democrats are accepting the Bill; they have been given a job. I can see members of a Cabinet Committee as I look across the Floor of the House. Part of the deal is that they should go along with the Government, and they will be given a bit of useful work. That is what the whole thing is about, and everyone knows it. No traditional Liberal would look twice at the Bill. Of course, when the Liberal Democrat party was set up, there was a split, and a real Liberal party still exists, which keeps writing to me.

Mr. Beith: A small one.

Mr. Benn: It may be small, but the Liberal Democrat party has had that problem itself on occasion. Better to be small and right, the Liberal party might argue, and I take that view myself.

I believe that the Bill is a test run for parliamentary elections. New Labour—a completely new party, as the Prime Minister has regularly reminded us—has a plan. The new system will be tested in Europe, and applied to the House of Commons. We shall all be worried then, not only about our Whips, but about the leaders of our parties and about our national executive, rather than about our constituents. That would destroy democracy.

One distinct effect would be a much lower turnout. Funnily enough, candidates of all parties become known and quite well liked in their constituencies; they would not be elected otherwise. Parties are not particularly popular. If I go round in the European election campaign and tell people to vote Labour, they may say that they rather like so-and-so. I will have to tell them that they cannot vote for him or her, and must vote Labour. That could well lead to a much lower turnout. A lower turnout undermines the legitimacy of the election process. In a way, I might welcome it if no one voted in the European elections. Part of me might say that that would be an early run of the referendum on the single currency. However, I do not believe in not voting. People should vote.

A further effect will be that Labour will lose a lot of seats. Everyone knows that the closed-list system will give us fewer MEPs than last time.

Mr. Beith indicated assent.

Mr. Benn: The right hon. Gentleman is nodding in such a friendly way because he knows that that will happen. We are selling out the party that won the election to other people under a system that has never been specifically endorsed by the electorate.

Mr. Beith: The right hon. Gentleman stood on a Labour manifesto that specified that there would be a system of regional proportional election for the European Parliament. Does he recognise that low turnouts have occurred in previous European elections—particularly the record low turnouts of by-elections—and that the first-past-the-post system simply does not give a fair representation of the votes that are cast?

Mr. Benn: That is a general argument about proportional representation. The idea that every Liberal voter is a Liberal is wrong. To take a case from my constituency, a leading Liberal councillor voted for me because he did not like the Liberal candidate. I rather agreed with him. The Liberals went around the constituency saying that the only way to beat me was to vote Liberal, so the Tories voted Liberal.

To give another example against myself, a man told me after the general election that he had joined the Labour party on polling day. I said, "Fine. Who did you vote for?" He said, "I voted for the Liberals.". The idea that every voter is seeking proportionality is wrong. Every voter is seeking to be represented. The choice may well be a tactical one. I do not have to tell the Liberals that. They have been saying, "Vote tactically", for years, to keep the Tories or Labour out. Occasionally, they have argued their own case as well, although that has never been very successful in the final outcome. I have heard Liberals make the Liberal case; when they make it, I have always found it attractive and historically interesting.

The Home Secretary is in a jam with the House of Lords; they are for the chop, so they have nothing to lose. I was disappointed that we did not abolish the Lords last year in the first Queen's Speech. If we had, we would never have had the problem at all. If the Government had had the guts to deal with the Lords straight away, we could have had an election for the House of Lords by last Christmas and an election of any sort we liked in the European elections. The Government cannot do anything about it.

It does not please me that the Lords are likely to win. I sat through the age of consent debate when the Home Secretary pleaded with the House not to lose the Bill by insisting on an age of consent at 16. He argued that we must face reality. I thought that that was what new Labour was all about. The reality is that if the Lords vote the Bill down next time, we will be back to the old first-past-the-post system. All the lists will be scrapped. God knows what will happen in party headquarters when it is discovered that people can vote for the candidates that they like again. It will cause panic in Millbank tower and perhaps in the Liberal headquarters as well. There is no power for the Government to enforce their will on the Lords because they did not tackle the Lords early enough.

For all those reasons—I know that they are complex—I base myself on the simple principle that democracy will be destroyed if people cannot vote for and remove candidates, and if candidates are simply instruments of whatever may be a party's majorities and machinations when an election comes.

Parties change. I have known parties change from left to right. The Liberal party dissolved itself into the Liberal Democrats; it disappeared. It was one of the most remarkable acts of all time. The Liberals joined up with David Owen, who then voted Tory, and produced a new party. The only person the electors can rely on is the candidate whom they have heard, argued with, listened to, voted for and can vote out. Give that up, and we not only wreck the European elections, but begin to undermine the basis on which this House comes to debate issues and ultimately to decide them.

Mr. Allan: We are grateful to the Conservatives for allowing us such a long and detailed constitutional debate on electoral reform by bringing this measure back to the House so often. It allows us to discuss a subject dear to our hearts that has not often figured in the House until recently.

It is a particular pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who is now an ardent voice in this place for the rump Liberal party. I have sympathy with much of his argument, except that I believe that it advanced a romantic view of the world. The world is not like that these days. For every instance of a person judging between candidates, there are far more of people having to vote for the closed list of one, the single party candidate with whom they are presented. People have to vote for a candidate against their judgment of him because they want to vote for Tony Blair or Paddy Ashdown as Prime Minister.

Sympathy for the arguments of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield leads my party to back the single transferable vote system as our preferred option. The amendment neither meets the Conservatives' wishes nor ours. Our preferred system is used in Northern Ireland in many elections. We accepted the Government's system for these elections with some reluctance; it is not our choice.

We have two fundamental objectives. First, we want to achieve greater proportionality. We believe that one of the best ways to get people to turn out and vote is the knowledge that their votes will matter. To date, Conservative votes in Sheffield have meant nothing in the European elections. We hope that those Conservatives will now vote because they have a chance. The same logic applies up and down the country where votes in the European elections will count whether we have closed or open lists.

The second objective is to increase voter choice. We believe that STV is the best way of doing that. If the right hon. Members for Chesterfield and for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) were standing in the same constituency on a list, voters who wanted to support Labour could vote Labour and number them one and two, according to their shade of opinion in the party. That is our preferred option but it is not on the table.

We have accepted with some reluctance that the system should go forward as it is. Having accepted that, and having argued in Committee for the option that we thought sensible—the Belgian list system—and lost it, we are led to the point that with only a few days of parliamentary time left, we believe that our key objective of achieving fairer representation means that we cannot make further progress on voter choice without risking the Bill running into the buffers. That is the basis on which we have decided to vote.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The hon. Gentleman does not like the choice and would prefer something not on the menu. The Liberals must choose between the two choices on offer, a closed list or an open list. Irrespective of the argument for rushing the measure through, which alternative would the Liberals prefer in the abstract?

8.15 pm

Mr. Allan: I know that the hon. Gentleman is sympathetic to fairer voting systems. In the abstract, we would prefer open lists. I have stated that repeatedly. I have no problem with that but I have one with being drawn into an issue, despite the seductive offers of the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), by the idea that because we oppose the Government on this, my enemy's enemy is automatically my friend. In this case my enemy's enemy has an open preference for first past the post. We have to judge whether co-operation furthers our cause of fairer votes or would aid a measure designed to spoil the outcome of the Bill. We have made that judgment and acted accordingly throughout.

[Mr. Allan]

Three main issues have emerged in our lengthy debates. First, the main problems discussed have nothing to do with the principle of whether lists are closed or open but concern the Labour party's selection methods. Many of the quotes in the press and in debates in both Houses—Welsh Members in particular have attended because they have some little local difficulties—have been about how Labour selected its candidates for the European elections.

Mr. Sayeed: Is that not a legitimate concern? That is how the law will operate, and it is perfectly proper to complain about it. If the law allows such operation, it should not be the law.

Mr. Allan: The hon. Gentleman makes a case to which I was going to come about how the law is moving forward in respect of selection for lists. The important thing is that but for the problem in the Labour party selection system, we might not have been debating the matter now. If all three parties had had an open selection process based on all their members voting, we might not have been here now because we would all have accepted the system.

The problem is not a fault of the closed-list system per se. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield feared that this is the way that things are going in the Labour party. I suspect that it already is. With any of the systems that we have discussed, a party could impose candidates from the centre. Labour's national executive committee could, if members were foolish enough to allow it the power, impose candidates in every Westminster seat. Candidates would be presented as a closed list of one. It is not the closed list that causes the problem but how parties decide to select their candidates.

Mr. Lansley: Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that the remedy for the Labour party's method of selecting candidates is through an open list? That follows from his point about voter choice by giving voters the option of choosing between candidates presented by a party list.

Mr. Allan: My second point relates to the specifics of the open list as proposed by the Conservatives and will serve to answer the hon. Gentleman by suggesting that the Finnish system is not the best.

Reference has been made to Lord Bethell, who is himself a candidate. He pointed out not only the specific difficulties of the semi-random or arbitrary nature of the way in which the proposed system would operate, but the practical difficulties in respect of next June's elections if we to make a sudden change. It is quite clear that there would be problems with the Finnish system. My party has a perfect slate of candidates and those at the bottom of the list are just as good as those at the top. Although we would be happy for any of them to be elected, that may not always apply to every list in every region. Given the possibility of a random selection of MEPs on the list being elected, some parties might wish to revisit the list and check who was on it.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): I refer the hon. Gentleman to his own party's selection procedure. Is it not the case that the Liberal Democrats use the zipper system which gives undue preference to the smaller number of female candidates who wish to stand as Liberal Democrat MEPs?

Mr. Allan: The hon. Gentleman is straying into a matter of some detail. However, he raises an example of where the open-list system would remove the democratic decision that we made as a party. One of our priorities is to have decent representation of women. The party voted for that and in that sense we are ashamed of our representation here. We wish women to be better represented and we are prepared to take steps to ensure that. That is a perfectly sensible choice given that the party voted for it.

Mr. Benn: If all the Liberal candidates next year are as good as each other, why cannot the electors choose who they want? Is not that the issue? If the hon. Gentleman favours the open list, why will he go into the Lobby tonight and vote for the closed list? If he voted for the open list the matter would go back to the Lords with the Lords' view prevailing.

Mr. Allan: While I believe that any of our candidates would be equally good, the members of my party have decided on a particular order. As they had made a democratic decision, they would wish to revisit it, as would the members of any party, once the system had been changed.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is [illegible] the hon. Gentleman elucidating exactly what is wrong with the system? In Germany, which has already been mentioned, the bizarre situation can arise whereby someone who is thrown out by the electorate can be put back onto the list system. That is quite ridiculous.

Mr. Allan: I would respectfully suggest that the hon. Lady is referring to a completely different system—the German additional-Member system.

To return to the system that we are debating, if we were to proceed with the Conservative proposal, the tacticians within every party would advise withdrawing all candidates except those likely to win. The parties would wish to put forward a slate of candidates that, in our case, had been democratically selected. As Lord Bethell quite rightly said, no party would favour putting forward a random list of 10 or 11 candidates in the south-east.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his courtesy in giving way to me again. He keeps talking about a random list. Does he not recognise that the Bill—with the Lords amendment to proposed section 3(5)—would make it perfectly possible for a party to present a list in the order of its own choice, but the voters, by their preferences, could choose to change it?

Mr. Allan: The voters would still be left with the option of simply voting for individual candidates, without the Belgian option of voting for the party's choice.

My third point is that everyone who has spoken so far, including the Home Secretary and Opposition Back Benchers, has highlighted the problem of first past the post being a closed-list system of one and expressed the wish to enhance voter choice—and we agree. However, the first-past-the-post system, which we believe is the alternative if we are unable to resolve our dispute tonight, would represent a significant step backwards. I hope that the fundamental point made by the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield about transferring power from the people to the party is an indication that he now supports some form of single transferable vote.

As the right hon. Gentleman knows, under the current system we all owe our presentation to the electorate to our selection by a small group of party members. We do not have a primary system and the voters in our constituencies do not get to choose the candidates for each party. We are often selected by an odd group of party members in a village hall somewhere—I think particul of the Conservatives when I say that. Once we have bee selected, we know that we are the party candidates in a closed list of one.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North–East Derbyshire): It really is nonsense for people to keep talking about a closed list of one. There is no such thing. Closed lists are the opposite of open lists. We cannot have an open list of one, therefore we cannot have a closed list of one.

Mr. Allan: The arguments that are often put forward by Conservative Members suggest that they are moving towards proposing some form of primary, which would effectively be an open-list system of one because a primary system establishes the number one candidate for a party. Their arguments against the current system relate to what happens to those at the bottom of the list, who are in the same position as those who come second or third in a selection battle for a Westminster seat—they are simply unlikely to win.

We believe that the MEP candidates who have been selected by the Opposition parties at least have the endorsement of thousands of their local party members. We should like to extend voter choice and revisit the issue in the review that the Home Secretary has promised. We welcome that review as it will provide an opportunity to argue again in favour of the single transferable vote, which is our first choice of voting system. We do not believe that this is the right time to oppose the Bill or join those who, at this late stage, seek to amend it when, at the appropriate stage, they declined to vote with our Peers in another place for the amendment that would have introduced the far more sensible Belgian open-list system.

Mr. Martin Linton (Battersea): Listening to tonight's debate, one word springs to mind; it is not principle or opposition, but opportunism. The Conservative party has always believed in the closed-list system and only last week told the House of its total faith in the first-past-the-post system. With due respect to my hon. Friend the Member for North–East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes), the latter is a closed-list system because if one wanted to elect a Conservative candidate to Parliament, but had the misfortune to live in Sutton Coldfield, one would have no alternative but to vote for the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler). There is no choice of candidate—only of party.

I would be intrigued to hear from Opposition Members whether they would really support an open-list system for the European elections when the likes of Mr. Paul Sykes might provide millions of pounds to campaign in favour of voting solely for eurosceptic candidates. That would wreak complete havoc in those elections. I leave them to dwell on that point. However, I will not deny the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield the opportunity of hearing yet another Back Bencher acknowledge that there are some advantages to an open-list system, provided that it allowed people to tick either the party box or the candidate box—which would not be a truly open system, but a Belgian system—and provided that the voters had the possibility of knowing something about the candidates, which is the case in respect of all those standing in European elections.

Nevertheless, as a Back Bencher, I will give the right hon. Gentleman the rationale for why closed-list systems should sometimes be preferred—there needs to be a separation of power. Parties select candidates and voters elect them. The more say the voters have about the choice of candidates, the less influence they have on the result of the election.

Let me give two simple examples of countries that allow voters to have some say, not only in the election of parties, but in the selection of candidates. The Irish voting system uses the single transferable vote, which allows voters to pick between candidates of Fianna Fail or of Fine Gael and between parties. It has resulted in there being no clear ideological distinction between Fianna Fail and Fine Gael, and sometimes between them and the Irish Labour party. That is the result of giving voters the luxury of choosing candidates, which detracts from their power in the choice of parties.

8.30 pm

The second example is that of the United States, which uses the first-past-the-post system, which should meet with the Conservatives' approval. However, it also makes use of primaries, in which voters are able to exercise a choice in the selection of candidates from their own party, and sometimes those of other parties as well—we have all heard of Republican raids on Democratic primaries. What is the result of that system, which allows the voter two bites of cherry, first in the choice of candidate and then in the choice of party? It is that there is no clear difference between the parties; as any textbook will say, there is a huge ideological overlap between Democrats and Republicans. The reason is that, in the desire to give voters more choice, the US system has given them so much choice that it confuses the choice of candidate with the choice of party.

That is the rationale for arguing that open lists can sometimes be self-defeating. They cannot give the voter more choice overall: voter choice is concentrated either on the choice between parties, or on the choice between candidates; and any system that tries to do both confuses the issue.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West): Is there a single Member of Parliament for any party who stood for election last year on the basis of a closed-list system for Europe?

Mr. Linton: I admire the chutzpah of the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends, who are all totally opposed to any change in the voting system and totally in favour of first past the post, which is a closed-list system. They probably had not even heard of open and closed lists until a few weeks ago, but suddenly they are the world's greatest advocates of open lists. Some of them do not even understand what open lists are—witness the fact that they so often confuse the issue of open or closed lists with that of how candidates are chosen.

That is the other side of the coin regarding the rationale for closed lists. If one has closed lists, one must have the candidates clearly selected and ranked by the political parties. That must be done on the basis of one member, one vote.

Mr. Mitchell: I am somewhat confused by my hon. Friend's argument. Like me, he is a supporter of proportional representation, so I cannot understand why he is arguing that the electorate are not intellectually up to the level of decision making exercised by the parties in choosing the lists.

Mr. Linton: As I explained, I acknowledge the arguments in favour of the sort of open lists that were discussed earlier. I am, however, explaining the rationale for closed lists: if people are allowed to choose between candidates, the inevitable effect is to fudge the basic issue of the choice between the parties. I am simply making the point in principle that one cannot give people the choice offered by open lists without detracting from their choice between parties.

As I said, the corollary of that must be that the parties choose their candidates in a democratic way. The issue is quite separate from that of open lists, but the Labour party, which has been mentioned several times, uses panels to rank candidates. That process was described by the general secretary of the party as a transitional system for one election only and I shall be glad to hold him to his word.

There is a specific difficulty facing each of the parties in the coming election: for example, the system offers the Labour party more seats in the south-west, but fewer in the north-west. There was a temptation to manage the transition so that we did not end up with too many of our people representing seats in the north-west and too few in the south-west.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): I do not understand the logic of my hon. Friend's argument, or why we need to move Glyn Ford from Manchester to No. 1 on the list for south-west England. I do not perceive the logic in that. The answer to the problem is to allow party members in each region to state their preferences by way of one person, one vote. Will my hon. Friend defend what has happened in Wales, where the person who is third on the list did not receive one vote in Wales? Can he explain why Alec Smith in Scotland, Mike McGowan in Leeds and Christine Oddy—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I cannot allow the hon. Gentleman to go on for so long.

Mr. Linton: My hon. Friend anticipates my point. I was arguing against a system whereby a party took upon itself the job of managing the transition. Glyn Ford, who represents a seat in the north-west in the European Parliament, actually comes from Stroud, so it would not have been at all difficult for him to win the selection that he has got—that of No. 1 on the list in the south-west—under a system that allowed the party members to choose democratically. It could have been done democratically, instead of being managed by the party.

I have always said that it is a mistake for parties to get involved in managing the transition. That is nothing new—I told the national executive of my views when it asked for them, and I wrote publicly on the matter at the time. I shall continue to argue that case, but the issue involved is entirely different from that of open and closed lists.

Mr. Llew Smith: We now know the birthplace of Glyn Ford and how that justifies his going to the south-west. Can my hon. Friend now tell me the birthplace of the person who is No. 3 on the list in Wales?

Mr. Linton: I am arguing on the same side as my hon. Friend—in favour of a democratic decision on the selection and ranking of candidates. However, the issue of open and closed lists is quite separate. All the discussion about control freaks, centralisation and party bosses is totally irrelevant to the issue of whether we have open or closed lists.

One of the better aspects of the report of the independent commission on the voting system is that it advocates voting on open lists, but within counties and smaller units. The level at which open lists will work worst is in large regions, where the possibility of voters being familiar with the characteristics and politics of each of the candidates on a long list of up to eleven people is remote.

Mr. Benn: Take an individual candidate—Michael Elliott for London, who has been a Member of the European Parliament for 14 years and who has been put at the bottom of the list. Despite the fact that, in three European elections, the people of his constituency have chosen him to be their MEP, the party machine has put him down to the point where, unless everybody votes Labour, he will not get back. What is the justification for that?

Mr. Linton: My right hon. Friend has mistaken my argument. We are entirely as one on that issue. During the consultation period, I wrote to the NEC to say that the question should be decided by OMOV. What is more, I would chance the view that the members of London voting in a one member, one vote ballot would have resulted in much the same listing as was obtained through the panel. The point is that it should be done in a democratic way. I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend on that point. I am simply trying to make it clear that the issue of how parties select their candidates is totally different from the issue of open or closed lists. Germany, France, Greece, Spain and Portugal use closed lists because they recognise that in European elections, when electoral regions are largest, the open-list system works least well.

I ask the House to see the issues in perspective. We are about to pass a Bill that will bring about a huge change in our voting system and hugely increase the choice for voters. It will mean that Labour voters in Surrey and Conservative voters in Glasgow will, for the first time, have some chance of having a representative of their own party in the European Parliament. It will enfranchise millions of people in this country.

Mr. Swayne: Has the hon. Gentleman not given the lie to his whole argument by saying that the voter will have, not his representative, but the representative of his party in the European Parliament?

8.45 pm

Mr. Linton: It is about time that hon. Members had the humility to recognise that when the good denizens of New Forest, West put their cross against the hon. Gentleman's name, nine out of 10 are not expressing their personal admiration for him. I am sorry to have to tell him that they are probably expressing a preference for the Conservative party. Although, as I have said repeatedly, it is good if a system allows the voters to have some influence on candidates as well as parties, we must start from a clear understanding that nine out of 10 voters, or probably 99 out of 100, are making a choice between parties and Governments, not between individuals.

Although the issue of whether we have semi-open or closed lists in European elections is important and worth debating, and I have opinions on it, by comparison with the thrust of the Bill it is a tiny issue. This is the Opposition's attempt to stir up the mud to cloud the overall issue.

The parties have 300 candidates in place. The Bill went through the House of Commons last time by a majority of 307 to 125. The system is already used by the major countries in Europe, including Germany, France and Spain. To take opposition any further will merely expose the Conservative party's opportunism. At any time in the past 100 years the Conservatives could have proposed multi-member lists in first-past-the-post elections.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire said that such a system cannot be applied to first past the post. Of course it can. We could easily have more than one candidate standing in the first-past-the-post system and allow the voter to choose between candidates of the same party. We prefer not to do so because it might split the vote, as Conservative Members know full well and they would not risk that. Technically, however, it is perfectly possible. In the past 100 years, the Conservatives have never expressed any interest in or support for open lists.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I have been following the hon. Gentleman's argument with interest but also with difficulty because he appears to be riding the fence, and that can be very painful. As one of those Members who perhaps falls into the 10 per cent. that he referred to in response to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne), can I ask him whether he is trying to enfranchise the people of this country or the political parties and establishment?

Mr. Linton: It is well known that even Mr. Brian Redhead voted across the party divide for the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) because of his admiration for the hon. Gentleman's constituency work. It is sad to say, however, that even allowing for the fact that many people in Macclesfield no doubt admire the hon. Gentleman's work for the local hospital and so on, most of them vote for him because he represents the Conservative party. His Front-Bench colleagues may not agree.

Mr. Mitchell: It might be better if the name of the hon. Member for Macclesfield were not printed on the ballot paper. The logical conclusion of my hon. Friend's argument is that we print only party names, not those of candidates, and we pick the candidates afterwards. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is far too much background noise in the Chamber. The hon. Gentleman who is speaking should be heard properly.

Mr. Linton: My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) knows that it is a dilemma of every electoral system that although we put forward candidates, most people are choosing parties and Governments. Of course it is important to keep the safety valve of having candidates as well as parties, which gives the people the possibility to choose one without the other. However, we must face the fact that under our existing system of first past the post, people must go to extraordinary lengths to remove Members such as the hon. Member for Macclesfield—not that they would want to do so—or the hon. Member for New Forest, West. There would have to be a revolution in the New Forest before so many people swung away from the Conservative party that New Forest, West went Labour. I look forward to that very much but it is unlikely to happen.

Semi-open lists, which we are offered by the Opposition, would make very little difference. The Under-Secretary will correct me if I am wrong, but in all the time that such lists have been used in Belgium, there has been only one known instance of a candidate in a lower position being moved up by the votes that he or she received on the open list to be elected when that person would not otherwise have been elected. There may have been two cases at the very most. The issue is a dot and comma in the electoral system that we are discussing. The House should remember that compared with the issue of whether the Bill is passed, the newly discovered question of open and closed lists, which the Opposition are still trying to get used to, is tiny and should be put in perspective.

Mr. Sayeed: It is customary to respond to the preceding speech, but I found the speech of the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) so confusing and internally contradictory that I do not intend even to try to respond to it.

As this bad Bill has shuttle-cocked between the two Chambers, the same old lags on the Labour Front Bench have made the same old tired and specious arguments. Government supporters have been laggardly in coming forward and supporting what the Government are trying to do. Even the Home Secretary today made a speech that was designed to fill a space rather than make a difference. He repeated the same old canard that the Bill's defeat in the Lords was the fault of those wicked Conservative hereditary peers.

Mr. Caplin: It is true.

Mr. Sayeed: The hon. Gentleman may learn something if he listens. He seems to forget that 38 of the

[Mr. Sayeed]

53 Cross-Bench peers—I have a list here and I have counted—who voted in a Division on 12 November voted against the Government. More than 70 per cent. of those peers who owe no party allegiance voted against a Government measure because the principle was wrong.

Mr. Caplin: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that in all the three votes on this issue in the other place, the Conservative party's victory—if that is what it is—has occurred because of the votes of hereditary peers?

Mr. Sayeed: The critical point is how those who owe no party allegiance vote, and it is absolutely clear that on 12 November over 70 per cent. of them failed to support Labour's proposals. Indeed, on that date not one Labour or Liberal Back-Bench peer spoke in favour of the Government's measures, just as on 10 November not one Labour Back Bencher made a speech supporting the Government's proposals.

Mr. Andy King (Rugby and Kenilworth): Will the hon. Gentleman clarify whether the measure would have been passed in the other place if the hereditary peers had been discounted?

Mr. Sayeed: That is not the critical point. We must consider how those who owe no party allegiance vote, because that is probably the best way of judging the merits of an argument.

Mr. Beith: I recall that the situation was the same with the poll tax, but I do not remember Conservative Ministers coming to the House and saying, "We are dropping this measure because we have counted the Cross-Bench peers and more of them voted against it than voted for it."

Mr. Sayeed: The right hon. Gentleman should deal with this specific measure, on which his party does not have a very honourable position to defend.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Perhaps I should point out that, if the then Conservative Government had had the common sense to abandon the poll tax because of the result that they achieved in the House of Lords, they might not have got into nearly so much trouble.

Mr. Sayeed: I thank the hon. Lady for her assistance in supporting my arguments.

It is quite surprising that not one Back-Bench Labour peer or Labour Member in this place has spoken in support of the Government's proposals. It is even more surprising bearing in mind the subservient nature of Labour Back-Bench questions and how Tone's clones have been parachuted into the House of peers—not because they have any merit but because they are friends of the Prime Minister. Even they were not prepared to support the Bill. I suspect that that is because this debate is not about closed lists versus open lists—although I believe that open lists are far superior and more democratic.

I believe that not one Labour Back-Bench Member of Parliament or Labour Back-Bench peer is prepared to support this measure because of the way the Labour party intends to operate closed lists. That is the real reason and that is what has really stuck in their craw.

It is worth reminding the House of the speech made by the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) on 10 November. He said:

"I took part in a vote, with many fellow members of the north Wales Labour party, for those whom we thought should be on the list for the Welsh constituency of five members. We voted for our sitting candidate, Mr. Wilson, by, I think, about 98 per cent, yet, at the last stage, after the matter went into Millbank tower, where heaven knows what happens, a candidate from across the border in England appears on our list in Wales in third position".

"he came from outside the area and we in Wales had no knowledge that he was interested in being on the list in Wales and he was not considered as one of those in contention for a place on the list by the Labour party members in north Wales. Yet there he is in third position and the candidate for whom 98 per cent. of Labour members in north Wales voted is in fourth position—an unlikely winning position for the Labour party in the elections.

That cannot be right."—[Official Report, 10 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 228.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hansard is available to every hon. Member, so the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) does not need to read an extract from it verbatim. The hon. Gentleman has made his point and perhaps he should now move on.

Mr. Sayeed: I thank you for your help, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Wrexham—a Labour Member and a former shadow Minister—was making the point that this system cannot be right because it is not open and it is undemocratic.

I think that even the Home Secretary is seized of that argument. I believe that, if the Labour party had chosen the system that we favour, whereby the party membership selects, openly and democratically, both those who should be on the list and the order in which they should appear, we would not have seen this Bill return from the Lords again. However, the Labour party has not done that. Its operation of the closed list is so undemocratic that I consider it an affront to democracy.

Mr. Caplin: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in the south-east—where my constituency of Hove is located—our Member of the European Parliament, Mr. Brendan Donnelly, has been de-selected by his own party not because of any democratic views but because of his views and those of the Leader of the Opposition regarding the single currency?

Mr. Sayeed: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's assistance, but he has got it totally wrong. Mr. Donnelly was not selected by the party members who attended a selection conference. The hon. Member for Wrexham made the point that the candidate in north Wales who received 98 per cent. of the votes was placed in such a low position on the list by the party executive at Millbank that he had no chance of getting elected. That is wrong.

Mr. Loughton: My constituency adjoins that of the hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin), and I know that almost 2,000 members of the regional Conservative party voted to put that MEP in that position on the list. Does my hon. Friend know how many members of the Labour party in the south-east region had an opportunity to select the candidates that will appear on the ballot paper representing the Labour party?

Mr. Sayeed: I have not been to Millbank tower, so I do not know whether it is one, two or three apparatchiks. However, I presume that the Prime Minister will decide what the party gets.

I was interested to listen to the Home Secretary's speech tonight, which was surprisingly half-hearted. It was slightly jokey—as most of his speeches are—but it was extraordinarily shallow. I believe that the Home Secretary's heart is no longer in this Bill. His amendments to the Bill are so banal that he must recognise that he has no chance of placating the Lords. I suspect that, after consulting his friends in the parliamentary Labour party, he has concluded that closed lists are undemocratic. He has never been a particular supporter of proportional representation, but he now recognises that this is an opportunity to double-cross the Liberal Democrats. He will not only double-cross the Liberal Democrats by ensuring that we do not get PR for European elections but he will ensure that we do not get closed lists, which his parliamentary party does not want. He will then blame—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman is associating the Prime Minister with a double cross. I hope that he is not suggesting that a Member of this place would do anything underhand.

Mr. Sayeed: I am glad to clarify my comments. First, I was referring to the Home Secretary and, secondly, I did not say that he was double crossing anyone. I suggested that he had the opportunity to double-cross the Liberal Democrats—there is a difference.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman should make himself clear. I hope that he is not suggesting that any Member of the House would do anything underhand. If he says that he is not trying to do that, I am happy to let him continue.

Mr. Sayeed: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Of course I would not even suggest that the Home Secretary would attempt to double-cross any other person or do anything underhand. I am saying that this is a way of getting at the Liberal party. This is a way of preventing PR. This is a way of getting rid of closed-list systems, which he knows that Labour Back Benchers do not like. As he has shown, he is in a position to blame the change of direction on hereditary peers, however erroneously ascribed that blame is.

We know for certain, however, that the way in which the Labour party intends to operate the Bill, if passed, is an affront to democracy. It will allow the Labour party—the Labour party machine—to determine who is elected; and the responsibility of those who are selected and, consequently, elected will be, not to the electorate, but to the Labour party machine.

Mr. Beith: I must be a bit naive. Surely the hon. Gentleman understands that, if he succeeds and the Bill fails, first, more Labour MPs will be elected than under the present system, and secondly, it will be open to the central machinery of the Labour party, through the selection panel system, to ensure that only those that it wants are elected. Therefore, the results that he fears will happen in much larger measure if he succeeds in killing the Bill.

Mr. Sayeed: That casts some light on why the Liberal party, having said that it wants open lists, now says that it wants closed lists, but the right hon. Gentleman has got it wrong. I believe that, as the people realise how much contempt for democracy is revealed by the things that the Government are trying to do, they will demand of the Labour party more honest, more open selection and election procedures.

The Bill may have a quixotic result. I believe that it has emboldened the House of Lords and enhanced its legitimacy. The Bill has shown the need for an independent second chamber. I believe that it will make the Government's life more difficult, and I am delighted with that.

Mr. Mitchell: I have previously abstained in Divisions on this measure. It was the most difficult form of abstention, because I always come along to abstain in person. I shall now air my indecision by giving the arguments for the abstention, although my indecision is less decisive than the indecision of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan).

At this stage in what looks like a futile argument, we need a futile gesture, because what is going on is a battle of prehistoric monsters—a virility contest between the Government and the House of Lords. I am too old to be into virility contests. I am a safe pair of trousers, of course—we all are, on the Labour Benches—but I am not a virility contest person. In this eyeball-to-eyeball confrontation—it is pink eyeball to pink eyeball, one from principle and the other from port—neither side is effectively right.

I am the biggest fan of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. I hope that the Under-Secretary will transmit that message to him; it might do me good. The Home Secretary chose the worst possible form of proportional representation—which I support—for the Bill, perhaps deliberately, in the hope of discrediting proportional representation; whereas the House of Lords is kicking over the traces on behalf of the Conservative party, which does not want any PR at all, in the hope that the Conservative party will go out on a limb and support the hereditary peers. The Lords are scratching the back of the Conservative party by doing what they believe will please it—making a nuisance of themselves for the Government.

It is an argument in which neither side is right, and it is depressing in the extreme to watch the battle of mastodons going on at the expense of the European elections next year. The Government's majority is in single hundreds, it is true; we do not yet have total control, as we shall eventually, but we have a majority to do anything, and the hereditary peers are just having a bit of fun—a last fling before extinction. It is not really Lords versus Commons; it is the hereditary peers versus the hereditary believers in first past the post. Most MPs believe in first past the post because they believe that any system that elected them must be the wisest, most effective system available.

[Mr. Mitchell]

It has been suggested to me, in the friendly discussions that one has with Whips—I am a big admirer of my personal Whip—

Mr. Benn: Put him on the list.

Mr. Mitchell: Perhaps they will put me on the list.

It has been suggested that I should regard this as a battle between Lords and Commons, and that I could do myself a bit of good by voting with the Government this time. [Laughter.] Labour Whips do give us helpful advice; that is what they are there for. As Opposition Members are laughing, I want to make it clear that the Labour party is not a party of control freaks—I am authorised to say that.

We should therefore decide on the basis of the argument, but the argument has been extremely confusing for someone like me. I always admired the Liberals as men and women of principle—a party of principle—but after admiring them for that for 18 years, it is terrifying to see how cheap they come now. We used to say in the back row of the Glenroyal cinema in Shipley that some girls were easy and some girls were not. The Liberals are easy: a few crumbs from the table of power, and they will throw away their principles on terrorist legislation, on proportional representation and on open lists. That is cheap.

I want the same thing myself. I would like a bit of power too, so I can understand the Liberals taking that approach. My friends, my fellow executives of the Labour campaign for electoral reform, in which we have all fought together, will tonight take a firm stand and say that we shall hold the Government to the review. We shall be really tough about the review, after the election is over.

My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) has confused me with the argument that we should have closed lists because the people cannot judge, except on a party basis, but that the parties should choose on the basis of one member one vote. They have not done so, which to my mind destroys the argument for closed lists. I could not follow that argument.

Mr. Linton: My hon. Friend has a short memory. I said at the beginning of my contribution that I would prefer an open-list system, but I gave the rationale for a closed-list system.

Mr. Mitchell: I had not understood for the wrong reasons. Now I do not understand for the right reasons. I am much happier with that situation.

There is one simple principle on which we should judge the argument between a closed list and an open list, which is that the electorate will resent having a closed list imposed on them. They will resent not being able to make any choice at all. It is not a burning issue. Most of them will not bother to vote in the European elections. They will stay a mile away, and rightly too. European elections are boring.

If voters are told that they do not have the power to choose, they will mostly vote on party lines. I am sure that they will want to vote for us—we are extremely popular, we are a good party, and we have a leader who throws his cloak over the whole party. We shall do well in the elections, but we are telling the electorate that they cannot make any choice—they must vote as the party wants them to vote.

That will produce a festering resentment, which will do us no good. It is a basic flaw in democracy. We cannot say that to the people. We should maximise choice. They will resent it if they feel that they cannot pick and choose within the list when they know enough about the candidates to pick and choose.

I have aired my agonising indecision. I shall leave the Chamber for a little while to commune with destiny. I shall be sitting in the Cafeteria downstairs, eating my sausage and mash, and awaiting offers. After 18 years in futile opposition, I would like a bit of power. My ambitions are higher than those of the Liberals, because I want to be a PPS. I intend to contemplate my vote, eat my sausage and mash, and hope that somebody comes down to see me.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am glad that there is no ruling from the Chair that we are not allowed to be amused by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). He made the speech by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) look no better than it was when we first heard it, and he has made the speech by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan), which looked good by comparison with the speech from Battersea, look not quite as good as it did after we had heard only the latter.

We have heard from hon. Members that the voting system is a bit of fun, that it is a tiny issue, that being able to vote for an individual is something to do with a safety valve, and that it is a dot and a comma. It will be the first vote in this island in which not a single voter will vote for a single candidate, and not a single candidate will receive a single vote from a voter. That is more than a dot or a comma.

It is also worth noting that the Government would intend that in most cases there would not be by-elections. If that applied to this House, the hon. Member for Great Grimsby would never have been chosen by the control freaks to stand in general elections. His constituency party was looking for someone in a by-election to hold a seat that it thought it might lose. The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) was another by-election entrant, and so was I.

One of the disadvantages of a party-list system, or even of the big multi-constituency system, is that we begin to lose the opportunity between elections of understanding what the voters are thinking. I shall give one example from outside my constituency at a local level. Even though the Labour party is apparently standing with more than half the popular support, it cannot put up candidates in many of the south-coast by-elections. When one considers the swings from the Liberal Democrats, say, to the Tories in the area which I represent in part, real votes being counted encourages putting forward good candidates whom the voters like and tells us something about the way the wind is moving between the parties.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) said, we are not now debating whether to have the first-past-the-post system in single-Member constituencies. The Bill is not about that. The test is the simple one of why, when the Prime Minister last Wednesday defended the closed-list system, not one of the independently minded Back-Bench Labour Members nodded agreement to what the right hon. Gentleman was saying.

If there were a secret ballot among Labour Back Benchers to give them the choice of an open system or a closed system, the vast majority would vote for an open system. If they were given a free vote, they would vote for an open system using their own names on the Division list. Instead, they are being told by their Whips to support the closed-list system for reasons which most of them do not understand. Perhaps we cannot assume that, because most of them are not speaking; but those who have spoken have shown that they do not understand. They have said clearly in most of the arguments that they would prefer to have an open-list system.

The Liberal Democrats have said that they would prefer to have more of an open-list system, which is why they will vote with Labour Back Benchers for something that they do not want. If the choice is, as the Lords Labour Minister said on the radio, whether one wants to vote with the hereditaries for what Labour Back-Bench Members want or to overturn their judgment and, for example, stand with cross-Bench Members of the House of Lords, I would go on the whole for those with some degree of independence rather than for those being controlled by the Whips—however engaging the Government Whips might be.

I suggest an extra question that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) might consider. His first five questions are good ones but I suggest that the sixth might be how much power we give to a few people. At present, I believe that the Labour Whips—I use them as a sort of cloak for the people round the Prime Minister—have too much power. They have persuaded Labour Back Benchers to vote for something in which they do not believe. They have also managed to persuade the Liberal Democrats to vote for something in which they do not believe either.

If the Government do not insist on having closed lists, that will be good for democracy, good for the House and good for the country. It might even start a tendency for those in other parts of the European Union to say, "Why don't we go more to smaller constituencies than, in some cases, the whole nation; why don't we go for smaller constituencies than the multi-Member mammoths?" We are facing multi-Member mammoths in this country.

There has been talk of the various ways of selecting candidates and where they stand on the list. I think that the Tory party has the best system of the three parties but in my view it is still a bad system. It would be far better to have Members of the European Parliament representing areas where they have a chance of getting to know the people and to be known by the people. That would be far better than having nine, 11 or even five Members for the same area.

I believe that when historians of politics write up this period they will say that what the Labour Government were doing was wrong. For those who have any sense of independence—I include the hon. Member for Great Grimsby in that category—I have some advice. If I were the hon. Gentleman I would return from my meal and, instead of being like a poached egg on a fence, vote for what the majority of his colleagues want. The hon. Gentleman's Labour colleagues will not vote for the open-list system but he should.

Mrs. Dunwoody: When I was a Member of the European Parliament, one of the constant arguments between myself and other Members of the socialist group arose from their saying that we should have proportional representation and a list system. Their constant complaint was that the British were the only people who did not have the name at the top of the list of a very well-known socialist politician. They said that that was the only way in which they were able to obtain any sensible vote. They asked why we could not at that time have someone such as the gentleman they called "Nail Kinnock" at the head of our list.

I had some difficulty explaining to them that even the most inadequate of our elected Members had a direct connection with the area which they were elected to represent. That was something that they found extremely difficult to understand. Having worked for many years on the continent, I understood their confusion: their system has always been party-controlled and party-based. For example, the Dutch system has both religious and political divisions, so I was one of the first people to work for both a socialist and a Catholic radio station.

The link between voting for a person and voting for a candidate is important. We are all here because of our commitment to our party. I have been a member of the Labour party since I was 16 years old, although I sometimes wonder which Labour party. The other day, my lovely Deputy Chief Whip suggested that I had one of my own, which was a bit rotten of him.

Although we are all here because of our party connections, in our system of government people connect parties with individuals. Individual Members of Parliament take the flak in their constituencies for the views of their party, and take their constituents' views back to the elected Chamber. They have a direct link with a geographical area, and are regarded as the representative of that area. It would be a dire day if we were to lose that.

I have argued about this matter within my party, and I understand those who said that, because an undertaking was given many moons ago that we would move towards the same system as the rest of Europe—this is really all about conformity of electoral systems—we would have to come up with a system that was different from the one that we operated. I was prepared to argue about that, but I lost the argument within my party.

I have grave reservations about the idea that, in the final analysis, the electorate should not be given the ability to decide their own candidate. That is why I have abstained on this Bill. Candidates come in all shapes, sizes and types—some admirable and some not quite so admirable, some well known to the electorate and some building a reputation.

My objections to the Bill do not stem from the Labour party's behaviour. The Labour party has got itself into a hole, which is not altogether unusual in my lifetime, and I should like it to stop digging. If it persists, I simply want to put it on the record that I firmly believe that, when the electorate vote for me they show great intelligence, ability, understanding and sensitivity, whereas, when they vote for anybody else, they show a great inability to understand political issues. The reality for politics in this country remains that the electorate should decide.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will the hon. Gentleman—I mean hon. Lady—give way?

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am very fond of the hon. Gentleman. If he has not yet learnt that I am not a man, we are in trouble.

Mr. Winterton: I am grateful for the hon. Lady's tolerance. Will she be frank enough to admit to the House that, two or three elections ago, she should have lost her seat, because, in normal circumstances, the swing would have had her well defeated in Crewe and Nantwich? However, I am happy to say from the Conservative Benches that, because of the respect in which she is held as a result of the wonderful work that she has done for her constituency since she was first elected, she won the seat. Does she believe, as I do, in trusting and respecting people because they know what they are doing?

Mrs. Dunwoody: I frequently explain to people that my constituents may say, "She is an unfortunate person with unmarried parents, but she is our unfortunate person with unmarried parents." That is quite important in elections.

I feel very strongly about this matter. I speak tonight not because I believe that we are being asked to choose between an inadequate system and an even more inadequate system, but for a very different reason. I saw the effect of list systems on the European Parliament and the control that all political parties exercised. I explained time and again—wrongly, it now appears—that we would find it difficult to accept that system in Britain, because we had a genuine commitment to a constituency link and we believed that the individual was tremendously important in our system of government. I believe that very strongly.

I shall not vote tonight, which is unusual for me, because it is the coward's way out. I want to record my deep worry about the breaking of that link. Whatever we think of the electorate, on the whole they come up with sensible results. Sometimes I like the results, and sometimes I hate them, but I support the right of the electorate to decide those results.

Mr. Loughton: This has been an entertaining debate, which has often been about something else, but the issue that we should have been debating—put in its simplest terms—is the people's choice against the party's choice.

Despite the constant debating of the subject, wherever I speak to well-informed people, I am amazed that the vast majority are blissfully unaware that they will not be able to vote for the candidate of their choice when they go to the polls at the European election next June. There is enormous ignorance of the reality of what is being debated and of what will result if the Bill is passed in this form.

People in this country like to think that they have some control over the candidate who represents them, that they have a link with that representative, that they know their representative's name, and that, if push came to shove, they could speak to, or get rid of, that representative.

That may be a slightly rose-tinted view of the way in which our democracy works, but most British people take comfort from that state of affairs. Suggesting that they are not up to the job of selecting their first-choice candidate to represent them—in Europe, in Wales, in Scotland or in Westminster—shows utter contempt for the ordinary people of this country.

The Home Secretary argued on numerous occasions that all that is pointless, because candidates will be virtually anonymous in these huge European regions, and are virtually anonymous as Members of the European Parliament for the smaller constituencies at present, but that they will be wholly anonymous in a constituency which—in my part of the country, for example—will encompass 5.9 million people and elect 11 representatives. Goodness knows where someone will go for a surgery to see one of the MEPs in such a large area.

That is a fallacious argument, however: it suggests that, because they will be anonymous, we may as well condemn all MEPs to a lifetime of anonymity through being a person on a closed list. That will not improve the turnout at European elections, which has been the raison d'être for reforming the system. It will make people feel more detached and more remote from their MEP, whom they could not vote for as a person.

As many hon. Members have said, the problem is that many of the least anonymous candidates in the Labour party tend to be those who are most out of line with Millbank tower, which is what the argument is about. The closed-list system is designed entirely to suit the internal machinations of the governing party.

We have heard about the strange goings on behind closed doors in respect of the Welsh list, after which the top candidate chosen by members of the Labour party in Wales mysteriously dropped well down the list. A small number of regional representatives and members of the Labour party national executive committee decided who went on that list and in what order.

Do I detect a small chink in that control freak mentality, at least in Wales, with the story that the members of the Labour party in Wales may get one person, one vote, to select the leader of the Welsh Assembly, should he or she happen to be a member of the Labour party? If that is the case, it is a welcome development, albeit late in the day. It follows the example set by Conservative Members many months ago, when we went for one person, one vote. All the candidates on Conservative party lists up and down the country were selected under a system whereby every member of the Conservative party in each region had the opportunity to cast an equal vote for a candidate to decide where on the list they were placed.

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that that is nonsense? In my part of the world, members from Berkshire had to travel to a caucus meeting in docklands to deselect their MEP. It was not one member, one vote. Only one party has offered that system: the Liberal Democrat party.

Mr. Loughton: If the argument in favour of the legislation is that a bus journey to docklands is too far, that is a fairly sorry state of affairs. It was not a caucus meeting; every paid-up member of the Conservative party in the south-east region was able to attend the meeting and cast an equal vote.

I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman will reply to the question I posed earlier. How many members of his party had an equal vote in the selection of the Labour party candidates who will be set against the Conservative party candidates in my region? Can we count them on one or two hands? We cannot count them, because we do not know who selected those candidates, how many people made the selection and on what basis. Perhaps they used a ouija board. Did they get pager messages from Millbank tower? Did the Prime Minister appear and say, "These are the people I want to appear on the list"? We do not know.

The Labour party has dismally failed to tell us how it selected its candidates. How Labour Members have the audacity to claim that they have a better system than the wholly democratic one person, one vote system used by the Conservative party beggars belief.

Mr. Allan: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman took part in the democratic exercise to select his party's candidate. I hope that he will confirm that the Conservatives have selected candidates who will serve the public in a genuine spirit of public service, and not be merely party hacks. Some of the tone of the debate is insulting to candidates, because it suggests that they will have no notion of serving the public in their larger regions. That is not true in the Liberal Democrat party.

Mr. Loughton: That is a bit rich, given that the Liberal Democrats used a hybrid zipper system to choose a small number of female candidates. They feel guilty because they so dismally failed to get many female MPs elected at the last general election [Interruption.] The Conservative party made no pretence about trying to fix the list. In the London region, a woman who is certainly no party apparatchik came top of the list, and good luck to her. Her name is Villiers—I shall give her that extra bit of publicity to promote her chances at the election next year. There was no prospect of party apparatchiks getting any favours. In fact, the list shows that the opposite was true.

It is appropriate that, on 6 December, we celebrate—or perhaps do not celebrate—the 250th anniversary of Pride's purge. Under Cromwell, Members of the House who happened to be out of tune with the Commonwealth Government of the day mysteriously disappeared from these Benches. We have a lesson to learn, because, 250 years on, history seems to be repeating itself on the Labour Benches.

I return to this little chink of light. On 12 November 1997—a year ago—the Home Secretary said:

"We are a party and a Government who listen to argument."

Let them prove that this evening. They have repeated the absurd suggestion that all will be well because we will have another review. As the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said, the review will take place after the changes have happened.

Can any Labour Member name a European country that changed its electoral system and six months later had a review about changing it back? It does not happen like that. The right thing to do would be to keep the status quo until next year's elections, and then review it—if that really is the Government's intention.

It is absurd to insist on a closed-list system that, in the end, would probably make little difference to the way in which party votes fell. Moreover, there is no need to fall into line totally with other European states for the purpose of these elections. There is a multiplicity of different electoral systems. As I have said, we do not even have a commonality between the parties in regard to the way in which candidates are selected—although, if we are a progressive House moving towards more democratic accountability, I expect that the Conservative model will be emulated by all the other parties.

9.30 pm

Another absurdity is that the Labour party's manifesto at the last election expressed no preference for a particular type of proportional representation. Labour cannot even claim that it is only living up to its manifesto commitments—although we know that it is not very good at doing that, anyway. Besides, the proposed system goes against the Jenkins report. Conservative Members disagree with the thrust of that report, but the one thing to which it holds dear is an open-list system and some contact with the individual Member. That, at least, Lord Jenkins has tried to preserve.

The truth is that this whole debate has become a convenient way of bashing the House of Lords, just as foxhunting was some months ago. In fact, the noble Lords are doing their job, and doing it rather well. They have been representing the views of the electorate rather closely—on student tuition fees, the age of consent and, in this instance, the people's right to vote for people, not parties. But, if we are to accept what we are being fed by the Government, their Lordships have already been dismissed. They have already been summarily executed.

Labour Members might do well to listen to some of the wise words that were spoken in the House of Lords just a few days ago. Lord Shaw said:

"So the argument that it is simply a matter of elected Commons versus unelected Peers and that the unelected Peers, because they are dominated by hereditary Conservative Members, should always be brushed aside, is not in itself strong enough."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 12 November 1998; Vol. 594, c. 851.]

He is right. The idea that anything said in the House of Lords does not matter is absurd. It is ironic that the unelected Lords should be most in tune with the democratic principles that are held dear by the majority of democracy-loving people.

It is time to show that the Home Secretary does listen, not just to the majority in the upper House but to the silenced voices on his own Benches, and elsewhere among the majority of his own party members in the country at large.

Mr. Barnes: I wish to make only two brief points. One relates to the peculiar argument advanced by the Home Secretary and Liberal Democrats, that there can be such a thing as a closed list of one. I accept that one person can be foisted on the electorate, just as a list of people can be foisted on the electorate. They can be foisted by a decision of the party—by one member, one vote, or what you will—or by the bureaucracy of the party. Both lists and individuals can be foisted on people who will not have much choice if they want to vote for the party concerned.

The phrase "a closed list of one", however, is very odd. I do not have a very good memory, so when my wife sends me shopping, she gives me a list. Even my memory, however, is not so bad that my wife will give me a shopping list containing only one item. I therefore found it strange that an argument should be advanced whose aim seemed to be to confuse the two systems. It is not logically possible to have a closed list of one. It is neither false nor true to say that it is possible; the idea is simply meaningless nonsense.

A closed list means something in comparison with an open list, and there is no way in the world or in logic that we can have an open list of one. As we have agreed, one candidate can be foisted on people whatever the method that has been chosen, so I hope that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and the Liberal Democrats will stop speaking in ways that are entirely meaningless. If they mean to say something else—this is the point that I first made—about it being possible for people to be foisted on the electorate, whether as individuals or as candidates on the lists, they should say that, but they should not try to invent a type of language that finishes up saying nothing.

Mr. Allan: Aside from the semantic argument, we are simply trying to make the point that there would be an alternative, and it is the logical outcome of that proposed by the proponents of the amendment. To follow the same logic that they are using in this debate, in first-past-the-post elections, each party should put forward a list of several candidates, and the highest one should get selected. I apologise for any semantic confusion that was caused.

Mr. Barnes: It is a matter not of semantics, but of meaning. I do not think even politicians should say things that are meaningless, although they happen to feel that they say something. It may be that, in the era of spin doctors, we are given to that, but we should be considerably aware of it.

My second point is about why I am abstaining on all this to-ing and fro-ing with the other place. It is because I oppose lists, whether they are open lists or closed lists. I agree that a closed list can emerge because it has been democratically determined by membership within a party, by delegatory or by individual vote means; it can also be foisted on people.

Nevertheless, a closed list is presented to people, and there is no opportunity to make any choice between the half dozen or so candidates that are presented. However, if we had an open list and we could choose between the half dozen, that would produce other problems. As occurs with the single transferable vote system in the Republic of Ireland, members of the same political party would be in contest with one another to get higher up the list and to get the vote compared with someone else.

I do not think that that is a good thing for political parties, or for democracy generally. We can fight each other enough within the Labour party without organising it for electoral arrangements. Why should we institutionalise conflict? The conflict that the Conservative party had, and still has, over Europe—why should we extend that to the ballot box, to allow the choice then to be made by the electorate in going for one person or another? It is a matter that the parties need to sort out by their different representatives as to what their general position is, which they should then put before an electorate.

Therefore, I do not like lists. There are other forms of proportional representation in which lists are not things that are put to the electorate. Lord Jenkins' report refers to a system that the Hansard Society suggested on one occasion, that of the fastest loser. We can top systems up out of the votes that have taken place in constituencies by the people who came nearest to taking those seats in the election.

Something like that might be possible. It does not refer to the situation that is before us now, because we have no choice. Those of us who dislike this type of proportional representation, or think that first past the post is better than some other forms of proportional representation, have nothing else to do in these debates but to continue abstaining in a principled way—something that the Liberal Democrats used to know about at one time.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): The hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) may have struck a chord with the House—perhaps he will also with future electorates and Labour party candidates—by being so confident as to say that he, like other Labour Members, will abstain in today's Division. If a closed-list system were ever introduced for elections to the House, I am not sure that they would feel quite so confident in making such a statement.

The Government are today stuck between a rock and a hard place. The rock is the open list, and the hard place is the current first-past-the-post system. The Home Secretary said that Conservative Members should follow Lord Bethell's advice, which was published in an open letter in today's The Daily Telegraph. I wonder whether the Home Secretary and other Ministers would like to follow the advice given by Mr. Henry McCubbin—who was the former Labour Member of the European Parliament for north-east Scotland from 1989 to 1994—in a letter to my noble Friend Lord Mackay of Ardbrecknish.

Mr. McCubbin wrote to Lord Mackay—the letter was used last week in a debate in the other place—that Rule 2 of the European Parliament's rules, under the heading "The independent mandate", clearly states:

> "Members of the European Parliament shall exercise their mandate independently. They shall not be bound by any instructions and shall not receive a binding mandate."

Therefore, that honourable gentleman, who—in his own rather eloquent words—had dropped out of the "comfort zone" and been excluded from the closed list, would stand to gain quite substantially if the House votes, and the other place continues to vote, for an open list system.

Mr. McCubbin wrote to my noble Friend Lord Mackay simply to say:

> "To my mind the open list is the only way to meet this simple but important criteria", and has written to the Lords to > "support the Lords amendment to provide for open lists"—[Official Report, House of Lords, 12 November 1998; Vol. 594, c. 849.]

in the hope that sufficient peers would follow that suggestion.

I am one of only three dual mandate Members and, on personal experience, can put Ministers' minds to rest on the matter of voter recognition, which certainly exists. On leaving this place and arriving on a train, at 12.30 in the morning, at the constituency of the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell), I was picked up by a taxi driver who was rather concerned that I had nowhere to stay that night. However, when I assured him that I was not only the Member of Parliament for the Vale of York but a Member of the European Parliament for that constituency, he got part of my name right and called me Anne. He could not quite get the second part of my name right, but then he was not voting that night.

If a taxi driver in Colchester town knows who his MEP is, that is good enough for me.

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) has struck a chord with the House today. We know that the only beneficiaries in the House today are the Members of one small group—the Liberal Democrats—and that the proposals are the prelude for proportional representation being introduced, perhaps on a similar basis, for elections to the House.

If first past the post has been and still is good enough for this place, why should it not be good enough—as it has been since 1979—for electors to the European Parliament? What are Ministers so afraid of? They speak so often of Labour being the people's party and of creating a people's Britain. This is the one occasion on which we can allow voters to make the people's choice. Let the people choose.

It is not really a question of the Lords versus the Commons. As my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) said today, throughout this whole experience—my hon. Friend the Member for Mid–Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) called it "the shuttlecock procedure"—the Lords have been more in tune with voters than Ministers have. Ministers are so out of tune on the matter, that, on reflection, they may want to leave the rock and the hard place and join Conservative Members in voting for nothing more simple or clear than an open list. As the Lords stated, electors should be able not only to vote for a party but to state their own personal preference of candidate. Let the people decide.

9.45 pm

Mr. Stephen Twigg (Enfield, Southgate): We have heard a great many romantic notions from Conservative Members about the present set-up. I am delighted that the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) was identified late at night, at least by her first name, by a taxi driver in her European constituency.

Listening to Conservative Members, one would believe that this country had the highest turnout in the European Union at the European elections, rather than one of the lowest, and that everyone knew the name of his Member of the European Parliament. I would stick my neck out and say that the majority would not know the name of their Member of the European Parliament. I would make an exception for my own excellent MEP, Pauline Green, the leader of the Socialist group in the European Parliament. I am delighted that she is also No. 1 on the Labour list for London, and look forward to her continuing to represent the people of my constituency in the European Parliament.

I shall concentrate on three points. First, it is worth reminding ourselves of the Bill's purpose, which is to give fair representation to voters across the country. I contest the view that the beneficiaries of the proposed system will be any one political party. I think that the beneficiaries will be voters who do not currently have a voice in the British delegation to the European Parliament, whether they be Liberal Democrat voters in Greater London, Labour voters in many of the home counties or Conservative voters in Scotland and Wales. The Bill deals with what the Jenkins report identified as electoral deserts, which are those large parts of the country where significant groups of voters have no representation. It is for that reason that the Bill should become law as soon as possible.

Secondly, when we debated the Jenkins report in the House a couple of weeks ago, hon. Members of all parties accepted that there is no such thing as a perfect voting system. Every voting system has its advantages and disadvantages, and we should bear that in mind tonight.

Thirdly, at an earlier stage of our consideration of the Bill, we considered proposals, put to us by the Liberal Democrats and endorsed by organisations such as Charter 88, for a partial open system—the so-called Belgian system. Many of us felt that that option had merits, and said so in this place and elsewhere. Unfortunately, we did not proceed with that proposal. I welcome the Government's proposal for a review, which will enable us to consider the issue again after the elections.

Mr. Lansley: Does not the hon. Gentleman realise that, should the Government choose to do so, they could, with their order-making powers, get something very close to the Belgian system by using the open-list system set out in the Lords amendment?

Mr. Twigg: That point was not made by the hon. Gentleman or any of his colleagues when the proposal was before the House. The hon. Gentleman's proposal and that being considered now are very different. The Lords proposal is essentially a wrecking amendment from people who want the first-past-the-post system to be retained in the European elections.

I want to take up the point about closed lists of one. It is appropriate to talk about the first-past-the-post system as a closed list of one. The purpose of an open list is to enable the voter to have a choice of different candidates, including different candidates from the same party. The argument against a closed list is that it does not give that choice. For example, a Labour voter in my constituency who does not want to vote for me either has to vote for me with gritted teeth or does not vote Labour. It is therefore perfectly legitimate to argue that we have a closed system with first past the post.

Mr. Barnes: Will my hon. Friend say how we could have an open list of one?

Mr. Twigg: Of course we could have a system whereby the parties offered a range of candidates and the voters were allowed to decide among them. The logic is the same as that deployed by those arguing for the Lords amendment. [Interruption.] I am being asked to wind up so I shall do so.

We have an opportunity to pass a Bill that will be an important part of the Government's constitutional reform programme. We have an undertaking in the amendment tabled by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary that there will be a review and that Opposition parties will be consulted. That should be welcomed. The House of Lords has had its chance. The will of the House of Commons should prevail. The Bill is a significant democratic reform, which I hope will be supported by hon. Members of all parties.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): We have had a good debate, and a good-humoured one. We have gone over well-trodden ground, but we have once again heard widespread concern about and hostility towards the Government's proposal for a closed-list system. It is striking that the hostility has become greater and greater during debates on this matter, not least on the Government side of the House. We have heard hon. Member after hon. Member speak with great feeling against the closed-list system and in favour of the principle of the open-list system. I have listened carefully tonight to each speech from the Labour Benches, and not one of them favoured the closed-list system in principle over the open-list system.

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) gave a speech that the House enjoyed. He set out his five principles of democratic choice, as he put it, and it was clear that the system proposed by the Government did not fulfil any of his criteria. In particular, he rightly said that it is impossible under a closed-list system for a voter to use the ballot box to get rid of a Member of whom he or she disapproves.

I thought that the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) would be a supporter of the closed-list system when he began to speak. However, he said, during his speech and in clarifying an intervention later, that he favoured the open-list system over the closed-list system. His logic was not entirely clear, but I do not want to be unfair to him. I did not follow his point about the danger of having members of other political parties voting in a party's internal elections of candidates. There is no risk of our having anything like the American system in which, for example, Republicans can vote for Democrats. There is, at least, no risk of that in the Labour party, which will not allow even its own members to vote to choose a candidate. Late in the hon. Gentleman's speech, it emerged that he has serious concerns about the way in which Labour is proceeding, and that he has protested to the national executive committee.

The House also enjoyed the speech of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). I gather that he is now communing with a cup of tea, but we understood his strong feeling against the closed-list system. He said that he would abstain, but that the closed-list system is futile and will, in his words, cause festering resentment. The Home Secretary will have been pleased to hear of the hon. Gentleman's personal admiration for him. The hon. Gentleman also said that he was a safe pair of trousers. Notwithstanding all his efforts to get into his party's good books, however, the hon. Gentleman could not bring himself to support the closed-list system.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) spoke with considerable passion about her support for the open-list system, and about the need for the electorate to have a direct link with its representative. The hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) also spoke passionately on that theme.

The hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg) seemed at one point to be a late entrant as a supporter of the closed-list system, but even he managed—diplomatically—to qualify his speech. He said that he would have preferred the Government to take another course, and that he preferred the open-list principle.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): No, he did not.

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate said that the Government had taken an unfortunate decision at an earlier stage, and that he supported the Belgian system—a semi-open form of list—in principle. The fact that the Minister seeks comfort in that makes it plain how desperate the Government Front-Bench team has become in its search for support.

There was, of course, no support for the Government from the Conservative Benches. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) made a very good speech in which he drew fairly attention to widespread concern about and lack of support for the Government's proposals in the other place. My hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, West (Mr. Bottomley) made the important point that the Bill was not a minor detail. When history comes to be written, historians will, as my hon. Friend asserted, argue that the Government acted wrongly, and that they set a bad precedent for our electoral system by depriving voters of choice.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) also made a good point in asking why Members of the European Parliament should be condemned to a life of anonymity through the use of a list, rather than being able to create a direct link with the electorate. The same point has been made by many others, including my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), who spoke from experience to show that voter recognition can exist.

In response to all that condemnation of the course that he has taken, the Home Secretary, in a speech that was perhaps not as good humoured as some of his earlier contributions to this debate—we can forgive him, because we have been over this course so often—gave up any pretence of making an argument on the subject. He did not try to build a case on the evidence but simply showed brass neck and what the hon. Member for Battersea described as chutzpah. He advanced ludicrous arguments.

The Home Secretary said that this was all a conspiracy got up by the Conservative party. He called it a conspiracy of non-understanding. If it was all got up by the Conservative party and the hereditary peers, I have to say that it extends to many groups and individuals not normally associated with the Conservative party. There has been widespread concern across many different groups about the Government's course.

Concern extends to Charter 88, whose briefing when the matter was first proposed last autumn said:

> "We believe that the closed list system originally proposed in the Bill where voters can only put their cross next to the party name should be replaced with a more open list system."

The Electoral Reform Society expressed a similar view. Its president, Earl Russell, is a member of the Liberal Democrat party.

Mr. Allan: A fine man.

Mr. Clappison: He was fine in that he had the courage to vote against the Government's proposal, against the Whip put on by the Liberal Democrats.

Concern extends to many in the media. Last October, when the proposals were first unveiled, The Times said that they were bad for democracy and would be bad eventually for the parties too. It described it as the worst possible kind of proportional representation for the European elections and said that it would result in placemen being put in the European Parliament, rather than individual representatives. The Times is also part of the conspiracy.

The Home Secretary reached his most ludicrous when he said that the idea that the closed list is anathema to our system of politics was pure nonsense. He forgets what he said last October in a leaked letter to a colleague reported in The Guardian. In setting out the case for a closed-list system, he said:

"though this is not a term which I think we should use."

The conspiracy of non-understanding may even extend to the Home Secretary himself.

The Home Secretary went on to say that, despite all our concerns, we have to agree because their manifesto commits the Government to the closed-list system. The Labour party manifesto is not something that I normally carry around with me, but I have been helpfully furnished with a copy. It states:

"We have long supported a proportional voting system for election to the European Parliament."

There is no mention of the closed-list system and no reason why there should not be an open-list system. At least eight other members of the European Union have open-list systems that would have been compatible with that pledge. Why, out of all the systems that the Government could have chosen, did they choose one that maximised party control?

We think that the answer is clear, and it was given by another member of the Conservative hereditary peers' conspiracy against the Government, Lord Shore. He said:

"The issue is about the open list against the closed list. It is about an open democratic list against a closed party management list. It is about accountability to the electorate, to the voters, against accountability to a party committee".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 12 November 1998; Vol. 594, c. 851.]

That view has been echoed time and again through our debates.

We cannot accept the latest review put forward by the Government. We regarded their original concession—it was described as a concession—as so minimal as to be meaningless. Their new concession is ludicrous. They now say that, in addition to the review of the operation of the closed-list system, we should have one of the operation of the open-list system. How can a review be conducted when that system is not operating? We welcome the fact that there will be consultation on who will chair the review, but we wonder what on earth it will find to do. All the evidence that will be available in six months' time is available now. It is a matter of principle, and the Government have come down on the wrong side. They have come down in favour of party control, rather than representative democracy—not voter choice, but control by the party bosses.

We hope that the closed-list system is not a harbinger of things to come, because it is bad in every conceivable respect from beginning to end. The debate and the Government's proposal are about promoting party control over individual choice and representative democracy. The proposal is a thoroughly bad thing and we are fully entitled to continue opposing it.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the Regional Development Agencies Bill and the European Parliamentary Elections Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Mike Hall.]

Question agreed to.

European Parliamentary Elections Bill

Lords Reasons for insisting on certain of their amendments to which the Commons have disagreed and for disagreeing to the Commons amendment to the Bill in lieu, again considered.

Question again proposed, That this House insists on its disagreement with the Lords in their amendments, but does not insist on its amendment in lieu.

Mr. George Howarth: I should correct the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) on one point. He said that we had produced the review system at the last minute. In fact, it is in response to a request from the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) some time ago. We thought that it was a reasonable request—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman asks for something and is granted it. Then, most ungratefully, he laughs at our agreeing to his request.

The Opposition should acknowledge that we have said that they will be consulted about the way in which the process works, and we mean that sincerely. There is a real point to having a review. They asked for it and I hope that they will be good enough to acknowledge that.

It is customary to begin by saying that we have had a good debate. On this occasion, perhaps I will be forgiven for saying that it has been an interesting debate. We have certainly heard some good speeches, and I shall refer to one or two in a moment, but frankly, the debate has not moved on a great deal since Second Reading. Opposition Members have their view and we have ours, and there does not seem to have been a meeting of minds. If they have doubts about whether the Bill has been debated thoroughly, I remind them that the House has debated it on Second Reading, in Committee and on Report and has considered Lords amendments for a total of 31 hours and 45 minutes. I would have thought that almost everything that could have been said about the Bill, and the choice of an open or closed-list system, had been said.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Could the Minister say which Labour Back Benchers would support the Government policy on a free vote?

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman asks a silly question. I wonder whether he could tell me how many of his colleagues would have voted in the poll tax had they had a free vote on it when they were in government. It is the same principle. We were elected on a manifesto commitment to introduce a proportional system for European elections and that is what we will deliver.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Howarth: No. Let us not forget that, had it not been for the stubbornness of the unelected second Chamber, we would not be debating this matter for the fourth time tonight. Conservative Members have advanced no new arguments tonight. Nor have they made any attempt to explain how the perverse results that an open-list system can produce—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. There are far too many conversations going on in the Chamber.

Mr. Howarth: Nor has anyone explained how the perverse results that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has repeatedly explained could possibly be justified to the electorate in the circumstances that he described earlier. Quite honestly, the discovery that the person who got the most votes in such a system was not elected would be met by bafflement among the electorate—and rightly so.

There has not been any sort of answer to the damning admission made by Lord Bethell, himself a former and aspiring Member of the European Parliament, whose words my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary quoted at the start of the debate, that he and his fellow Conservative hopefuls in London would be known only to the tiniest fraction of the electorate. I might add that, as a result of his being frequently mentioned in tonight's debate, Lord Bethell is probably rather better known now than he was before he wrote that letter.

The Government remain firmly convinced that the closed-list system is the most fair and appropriate system for Britain to use to elect its MEPs. It is easy to use and produces fair and clear results. We also remain convinced that this House must prevail over the other place, which, for all its undoubted merits in other respects, has been elected by no one and lacks any democratic legitimacy.

We listened to the views of the other place, and first introduced and then strengthened the review clause. We hope that the other place will now return the favour and listen to the clear and unambiguous message which is the will of this House—[Interruption.] If Conservative Members doubt that, I suggest that they look to see who goes into which Lobby tonight. The result will be the expression of the will of this House—an expression of which the Lords will take notice. A combination of the unelected in the House of Lords and the unelectable sitting on the Conservative Benches here will not thwart the will of this House.

Salmon Farming (Scotland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

10.21 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I am pleased to have the opportunity to raise on the Adjournment of the House the subject of the Scottish salmon farming industry. I am very pleased that the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald), who is Minister with responsibility for the highlands and islands, is present to reply to the debate because, between our two constituencies, we supply a substantial proportion of Scottish-produced farmed salmon.

The debate is an opportunity to emphasise the importance of the industry to Scotland as a whole, and to the highlands and islands in particular. In spite of many adversities confronting the industry, it has been one of Scotland's economic success stories. A recent Scottish Office and Highlands and Islands Enterprise survey shows that about 6,500 jobs in Scotland depend on the salmon farming industry—about 2,000 on farms and another 4,500 jobs upstream or downstream, in such industries as feed, supply and repair of cages and, obviously, the important salmon processing industry. The salmon farming industry has a turnover of about £260 million, and I am sure that the Minister would readily acknowledge that it is an industry that creates and sustains employment in many parts of the highlands and islands where there are no alternative forms of employment available. The industry is very important, so it is important that the House has an opportunity—albeit late in the evening—to discuss it.

The industry has not had to look far to find troubles and adversity. Those of us who have been in the House for some years remember the cyclical nature of the market and how, at this time of almost every other year, in the period leading up to Christmas—one of the busiest times for the salmon farming industry—there was a crisis, amidst allegations that the Norwegians were dumping cheap salmon on the European market.

Eventually, the allegations of dumping by the Norwegians were referred to and investigated by the European Commission, and the claims were held to be well established. That led to a negotiated agreement between the European Union and Norway, which effectively imposed a minimum import price—not a quota, which many in the salmon farming industry had wanted. There were mixed views at the time about how effective the minimum import price would be. I spoke to one producer today who said that its existence prevented a free fall in the price earlier this year, for which he was thankful.

This is probably the first opportunity that the House has had to hear from a Minister about the Government's assessment of the effectiveness of the regime and the agreement reached between the European Union and Norway in May last year. Under that, there are individual agreements between the EU and a number of Norwegian exporters. It is possible for the EU to take action against those breaching the rules, including the imposition of a tariff on exports to the EU.

On 31 August this year, there was a report in The Herald quoting the Official Journal of the European Communities, which identified three violations of the agreement. As I have informed the Minister, there have been recent reports in Norwegian newspapers of Norwegian exporters coming to arrangements with Danish importers to try legally to circumvent the rules. Information on those allegations has been given by the Scottish Salmon Growers Association to the Commission.

I hope that the Minister will not only provide the Government's assessment of the effectiveness of the agreement reached last year, but will tell us what the Government do to monitor the effectiveness of the arrangements. Can he reassure the House that at all times, particularly in the light of the most recent allegations, they will press the Commission to monitor the situation and take effective action where any breach of the agreement is found?

I understand that import prices are to be averaged out over a quarter, and that they must average at the minimum import price or above. The last quarter of this year has started in October and the early weeks of November with volumes from Norway reducing the price well below the minimum import price. Doubts are being expressed whether between now and 31 December, prices can be sufficiently above the MIP to average at the MIP or above. What sanction will there be if, come February, it is found that the average price for this quarter—which is one of the most important times for the industry—was below the minimum import price?

The Norwegian Government undertook some self-restraint with respect to feed quotas. They announced for this year an increase in feed quota of 2.3 per cent., whereas the volume sold is up by 12 per cent. In spite of a weak market in Europe and the problems of the markets in Norway and Japan, a 10 per cent. increase is proposed by the Norwegian Government for 1999. That would lead to a substantially bigger volume coming on to the market. What representations have the Government made to the Norwegian Government about such an increase in their feed quota?

The MIP was fixed in May last year in ecus. At that time, the value was £2.75 per kilogram, whereas it is now £2.25 per kilogram. The strength of the pound has therefore led to a 20 per cent. loss of revenue for salmon producers. Do the Government intend to seek a revaluation or a change in the minimum import price to reflect the loss of value in real terms because of the strength of the pound in the intervening 18 months?

One of the other difficulties facing the industry has been the outbreak of infectious salmon anaemia—ISA. That was first reported in the west of Scotland in May. There was a confirmed case in Shetland in August. Can the Minister tell the House how many cases have been confirmed and when the last one was confirmed? There is a perception that the disease has been brought under control, but one hopes that one is not speaking too soon. An update would be useful.

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): My hon. and learned Friend is aware that in my constituency, salmon farming is extremely important. A number of producers have had to destroy all their stock because of ISA. Does he agree that the Government could give some help and restore confidence to the industry if they examined the 1993 EC legislation which provides for a 50 per cent. contribution to the cost of compensation, particularly for the smaller independent fish farms?

[Mrs. Ray Michie]

Mr. Wallace: My hon. Friend makes an important point about compensation. There has been a huge loss to the industry as a result of having to slaughter stocks. Indeed, there has been the immediate slaughter of stocks because ISA is a so-called list 1 disease. I want to emphasise—I hope that the Minister will do so as well—that there is no evidence that the virus associated with ISA has any effect on humans and that there is no risk to human consumption. Nevertheless, it has a pernicious effect on the fish and has led to slaughter. This has meant that producers have been faced with huge losses. Undoubtedly, claims for compensation are inevitable.

Earlier this year in the Court of Session, following an outbreak of viral haemorrhagic septicaemia on the island of Gigha in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie)—a list 2 disease—it was found that the failure by the Secretary of State to provide for payment of any compensation where slaughter orders were made was illegal. I know that that outbreak can be distinguished because it involved a list 2 disease, but it is an important point that the fish were slaughtered on the orders of the Scottish Office. In the circumstances, the case for some element of compensation is strong.

Looking to the future in terms of insurance and compensation, it is obvious that there is a need to attract insurers into the market. As someone put it to me, "You will not get someone to insure a house when it is on fire." It is important that the problem is brought under control and eradicated. It is important also that those who are engaged in insurance see the problem as an insurable risk.

My understanding is that the industry has indicated a willingness to work with the Government and to make a contribution towards future insurance and compensation packages. However, the Government must shoulder their share of responsibility and likewise indicate a willingness to make a contribution. A joint Government and industry working group has been considering how interim cover arrangements can be put in place until such time as the disease becomes an insurable risk. That has happened in Norway and it is now possible to insure against ISA at affordable premiums. Is the Minister able to report on the progress of the joint Government and industry working group? Does he accept that in such situations, the Government have a role to play in shouldering some of the burden until it is commercially viable for insurers to offer insurance and for the industry to be able to afford the premiums?

That development in turn will require the consideration of some technical measures. In Norway, ISA is an insurable risk, but there has not been total eradication. However, the number of outbreaks has been reduced to such a low level that the insurers have been persuaded that it is a market in which they can become involved. There must be a good understanding of the technical and scientific issues that are involved. How, for example, did ISA get to Scottish waters? How does it spread? What is being done—perhaps the Minister can tell us—to advance technical and scientific knowledge of this disease?

Will the Minister think about more flexibility? I understand that under European Union rules, the fish have had to be slaughtered immediately. That means that a substantial volume has been slaughtered in a relatively few weeks whereas in Norway, it has been possible, when outbreaks have occurred, to slaughter over a period of months. That means also that there has been a more managed eradication which has had less impact on the market. As the fish have been slaughtered immediately here, there is no opportunity to mitigate loss through allowing for further growth. That makes insurance a less attractive proposition.

Many small producers who have not been affected directly by ISA in their own salmon farms have felt the effect of the disease because salmon that has been slaughtered has been put on the market in substantial volumes, which has driven the price down. This has meant that there has been a requirement by banks for many smaller producers to advance more collateral against borrowings. That has put great pressure on smaller producers and obviously inhibits the development of the industry. For these reasons, we want to be reassured on the technical measures that the Government are pursuing to try to ensure that there is a better understanding of the disease and that it can be contained in future.

Another issue that arises from ISA is the substantial investment—some £1 million—that was required in Shetland to install at very short notice blood water treatment equipment at salmon processing plants. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the hon. Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), was in my constituency earlier this month and received some representations on that matter. I know that his visit was much appreciated.

Those arrangements had to be implemented swiftly, and financial instruments for fisheries guidance grant applications have now been made. I do not expect the Minister to tell me this evening that they will be successful, but I urge him to look on them favourably and sympathetically because they respond to an immediate problem and are an investment in the industry's future.

The industry welcomes the transfer of responsibility for planning arrangements from the Crown Estate Commissioners to local authorities. In Shetland and parts of Orkney, works licences are already issued by local authorities, but new arrangements would have to be made in the highlands, Argyll and Bute and the Western Isles. Local authorities will need to pool their resources because the number of applications will be relatively small and each local authority could not be expected to have its own marine expert. Some certainty is required about the transfer time and the arrangements that will be made in the interim, because primary legislation will be needed and that might have to await the Scottish Parliament. Clearly, salmon farmers wishing to develop, expand or set up new sites need to know the position in the meantime. Guidance on that from the Minister this evening would be welcome.

On the bureaucracy faced by the industry, I am advised that the Veterinary Medicines Directorate is slow in processing licensed medicines for salmon. While Norway has eight licensed sea lice treatments, the United Kingdom has only one and a half. I queried how we manage to have a half and was told that hydrogen peroxide cannot be used in the summer because of water temperature, so it is available for only six months of the year. The Ministry does not seem to have enough push to deal with those matters within the European Union. The industry would welcome some assistance on that front.

In conclusion, we cannot underestimate the important role of salmon farming and agriculture in rural development. There are short-term problems, but also long-term opportunities. In the future, there will be a global demand for agricultural products. Scotland's assets include natural resources; a human skills base—many jobs now have increasingly skilled components; niche marketing skills; proximity and access to European markets; a strong domestic market, with an 11 per cent. increase to September this year; and an end product that commands consumer support. Although the industry has had some development grants, it has reached its present state without subsidy. It wants to ensure that it is up to date and takes on the best in terms of environmental assessment and environmental management systems. Westray and Hoy in Orkney now have organic salmon farms. Thus the industry is taking a long-term view and it wants reassurance tonight that the Government support it.

This may be the last time that the House of Commons debates the Scottish salmon farming industry, because next July responsibility for it will transfer to the Scottish Parliament. That Parliament will recognise an industry that is important for Scotland and offers great opportunity for development in Scotland. This evening, we want some support and reassurance that the Government will help to see it through its current difficult times.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Calum Macdonald): I congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) on securing this debate. I entirely agree with him about the industry's importance to Scotland, particularly its most fragile and remote areas. I welcome the participation of the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie) in the debate.

The hon. and learned Gentleman made a number of points and I should like to get through as many as I can. On the agreement between the European Union and Norway, it is a measure of our commitment to the industry that one of the first things that the Government did last year—led by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my noble Friend Lord Sewel—was to intercede with the European Commission in the action initiated by the Scottish industry against its Norwegian counterpart for dumping farmed salmon on the Community market.

It is well known that we did not think that the action agreed by the EU went far enough—as the hon. and learned Gentleman said, it received a mixed reception—but, to its credit, the Commission has taken its responsibilities for monitoring and enforcing the agreement with the Norwegians seriously. The result has been that the Commission has imposed duties on 36 companies. A further three face a similar prospect, and, as a result of EU pressure through the agreement, the number of companies registered to trade has been reduced from 191 to 135.

As the hon. and learned Gentleman knows, the main aim of the agreement is to introduce a degree of stability in the salmon market. That involves imposing a minimum import price for salmon exported from Norway to the EU; requiring Norwegian exporters to register and exposing them to tariffs if they breach those prices; and requiring that part of the export tax imposed by the Norwegian authorities to be used for generic marketing of Atlantic salmon. The latter has taken time to settle and to organise, but I understand that a way ahead has been agreed, involving the industries of Scotland, Norway and Ireland. Today, a £4 million advertising campaign, funded by that export tax, has started in France, Germany and Spain.

Earlier this year there were signs that, at long last, the agreement was beginning to have the desired effect. Prices began to rise, offering Scottish growers some long-overdue promise of better times, but they dipped a few months ago, when the Norwegians placed sizeable quantities of small fish on the market. That was made worse by similar placements as a result of infectious salmon anaemia outbreaks in this country. We look to the price drop being reversed as the Christmas trade approaches.

The hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned the report of Norwegian producers using Denmark to get around the regulations. We were not aware of that, but we will investigate, contact the Scottish Salmon Growers Association and pursue the matter with the Commission. He also mentioned the impact of the pound on the agreement. It is up to the EU to renegotiate the agreement, but it is important to bear in mind that sterling has fallen against the deutschmark by 10 per cent. in the past year.

As the hon. and learned Gentleman made clear, ISA is a matter of concern. I agree with him that there is no evidence that the disease has any effect on human health. It was first confirmed at a farm on Loch Nevis on 15 May this year and since then there has been confirmation on 10 farms, including one in the hon. and learned Gentleman's constituency. The common denominator appears to be site-to-site contact, although the source is still a mystery. It is being investigated.

A further 11 farms are suspected of having the disease, including one on Shetland which has been cleared of its fish. As a consequence of all that, movement restrictions have been imposed over a wide area and 198 farms are currently affected. The last known incident was in September and I share the hon. and learned Gentleman's hope that the disease might have run its course.

ISA is classified as a list 1 disease under EU legislation, which requires that eradication action must be taken when the disease is confirmed. That entails a number of procedures, and fallowing of the sites for at least six months before restocking. Movement restrictions have been imposed over a wide area and a rigorous inspection regime is under way. This is the first time that anyone in the EU has experienced the disease and it is almost inevitable that our processes for handling it are being developed as time goes on. I stress, however, that we are in close contact with the Commission, which has expressed itself satisfied with the steps that we are taking.

I am conscious that the ISA outbreak is causing hardship, and that things could get worse if the suspected sites are confirmed or if outbreaks occur elsewhere. Already, there have been redundancies, and I am aware of the considerable concern that the disease should be contained.

I pay tribute to those in Shetland who have had to deal with the consequences of the outbreak. That response has been positive, and it has been recognised that without such action others could face a similar plight. I particularly want to pay tribute to Shetland Islands council, which has made available some £100,000 for disinfection of liquid effluent from salmon processors. I am also grateful to Shetland Enterprise for its £50,000 contribution towards that work, which is vital if reinfection is to be avoided.

The hon. and learned Gentleman said that producers have made an application for FIFG support. It is available into next year, but it is as well that they have put in their applications, because the last date for doing so is 31 December. Most of the £5 million—£4.1 million of it—allocated to FIFG has already been awarded, so there is pressure on resources. The final round will be allocated early next year.

It is now almost two months since the last outbreak was confirmed, I know that everyone in the industry shares the hon. and learned Gentleman's hope that we are past the worst.

The problem of disposing of slaughtered fish in a small place such as Shetland could be severe. Thus far we have received considerable support from the Norwegian authorities in handling waste from infected farms, and we are grateful to them for that. We are exploring alternative arrangements should the need arise in the future.

It is precisely because of those problems that rigorous controls are being enforced. The total co-operation of all concerned is absolutely vital. As I said earlier, we are all learning lessons about the disease as time goes on. In the light of experience gained, we have introduced a graduated approach to the fallowing of sites within restricted zones, which reflects the disease risk in each case. It is important for all concerned to recognise and accept that we cannot cut corners.

The hon. and learned Gentleman spoke about the need for fish farmers to be encouraged to report disease early on. He suggested that a compensation scheme could be beneficial and that its application should be considered more widely. The industry has so far shown a responsible attitude, and I very much hope and expect that to continue, regardless of the compensation issue.

I assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that we are continuing to discuss all the options. However, it would be less than frank of me not to mention the fact that it has not been the policy of successive Governments to pay compensation for fish diseases. Indeed, we do not have the legislative competence, as the hon. and learned Gentleman knows from incidents of shellfish poisoning in his constituency. Equally, it is important to recognise that the issue is not simply one for the taxpayer; we need to explore the scope for the industry to recognise its obligation to address the financial consequences of the disease.

The hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned Gigha. In that case, the disease was viral haemorrhagic septicaemia, which is a list 2 disease for which the rules are different. A judgment in that case is the subject of an appeal, so I cannot comment on it further.

As for the hon. and learned Gentleman's point about medicines, I recognise the industry's concern that it is being denied the use of treatments available to Norwegian competitors. The use of medicines is a sensitive issue. Statutory procedures are laid down and must be observed. Nevertheless, we are conscious of the view that such treatments could overcome a number of problems, and I assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that we shall continue to seek to ensure that applications receive speedy attention.

The hon. and learned Gentleman also spoke about local authority involvement in the approval of fish farm developments. That reflects the Government's decision, after full consultation, that, subject to endorsement by the Scottish Parliament, local authorities should have formal planning responsibilities. We believe that outcome to be the right one: the issue is for local communities to decide, and they should have a say in the matter. There were many complaints in the past about the way in which the Crown Estate Commissioners handled the matter, and about the fact that local communities did not have a direct, democratic say.

To help in the process of consideration we have done what the hon. and learned Gentleman suggested, and issued draft locational guidance. Advice on environmental assessments, commissioned by the Crown Estate and the industry, has also been produced. Consistency across authorities is never guaranteed; but then it does not apply in other planning areas, and that is right in principle. Different areas have different priorities. The point to recognise is that, in addition to central guidelines for local authorities, there will be a formal right of appeal for applicants.

It is always difficult to respond to all the points in a debate such as this. If I have missed any out, perhaps hon. Members will bring them to my attention, and I will respond in writing. I congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland on securing the debate, and on clearly articulating the concerns and desires of the industry at what is undoubtedly a difficult time. I assure the hon. and learned Gentleman and the industry that the Government remain firmly committed to a fully sustainable fish-farming sector.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at ten minutes to Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Right to Buy

1. Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): What plans he has to revise right-to-buy legislation. [58604]

The Minister for Local Government and Housing (Ms Hilary Armstrong): On 28 July I announced proposals to improve value for money by replacing the current £50,000 maximum discount limit with nine regional limits. This change would result in a maximum cash limit ranging from £22,000 to £38,000. Tenants would continue to be eligible for up to 60 per cent. off the value of a house and 70 per cent. off the value of a flat. We are considering the responses to consultation and we shall announce our decisions as soon as possible.

Mr. Hughes: I welcome what the Minister said, but may I ask her to be much braver and to look at other matters, especially things that adversely affect leaseholders in the borough where she lives when she is in London, of which I am a Member of Parliament—Southwark? Will she consider the fact that many boroughs, including Southwark, wait to do capital works on estates until the protected period for new purchasers is over, when they do not have to make much of a contribution, so that the leaseholders suddenly have to make a whacking contribution to the cost of what is otherwise a council development?

Will the Minister also ensure that boroughs do not abuse the system by lumping on to leaseholders' bills the cost of large amounts of communal works that they have not done for decades, so that leaseholders suddenly find themselves paying for drains, road repairs, pavements and so on, which the Labour council should have done a hell of a long time before?

Ms Armstrong: The hon. Gentleman is referring to another aspect on which the Government are about to consult—the future of leaseholding. We expect in the next few weeks to issue a consultation document on leaseholding, and the hon. Gentleman will then have every opportunity to make representations.

Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West): Do the Government have any plans to introduce legislation to help people who, having been encouraged to do so, buy properties—such as high-rise flats—and then discover that those properties are worthless?

Ms Armstrong: Earlier this year, we announced proposals to offer councils a financial incentive to buy back ex-council flats and houses from owners in difficulty. We aim to enable people to enter home ownership and to sustain that wherever possible. However, as my hon. Friend says, it is impossible to re-sell some properties because they are in a block on which lenders are unwilling to consider granting mortgages. Councils have the right—which they were given by the previous Administration—to buy back such properties. Under our proposals, 25 per cent. of councils' costs would be covered.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): May I ask the Minister, lest she be tempted to do anything foolish, to think carefully before acting on proposals that will discourage home ownership and make it more difficult for tenants, especially in London and the south, to buy their own homes? Does she accept that the changes that are proposed will adversely affect approximately one in 10 families in England and one in four families in London, and that their discounts could be reduced by between £12,000 in London and £28,000 in the north-east? What possible justification is there for that type of attack on home ownership?

Ms Armstrong: I find it amusing that the hon. Gentleman cautions me about being foolish, but there you go, Madam Speaker. As I said in my previous answer, we are interested in sustainable home ownership, but we are also interested in ensuring that the taxpayer gets value for money. Both those interests must be upheld in pursuing this policy. The hon. Gentleman exaggerated somewhat.

Mr. Burns: No. It is in the Minister's answer.

Madam Speaker: Order. I will not have comments from sedentary positions, whether they are from Front Benchers or Back Benchers.

Ms Armstrong: It is not one in four families in London who will be affected but one in four of those who buy at the top end of the market and who are already council tenants. The present figure for council tenancy in London is far from one in four families, so the hon. Gentleman is exaggerating. He clearly has not listened to what I have said—but that is not untypical.

We want to ensure that people are able to buy and sustain their own homes. At the same time, the Government respect the rights of taxpayers. The current policy costs taxpayers £400 million a year, and we want to ensure that that is not an ever-escalating bill. Our proposals will ensure that the vast majority of tenants continue to be eligible for a discount of up to 70 per cent. when buying their own homes. I believe that the taxpayers will find that very generous and very fair.

Lake District

2. Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): What proposals he has for environmental improvements in the Lake district. [58605]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Alan Meale): In order to enhance the environment and preserve the special character of the national park, the Government are working with local partners in developing a sustainable Lake district transport strategy. The Government will also provide the Association of National Park Authorities with an additional £2 million next year to improve national parks generally. I can inform my hon. Friend that the Cumbria area has so far received almost £1 million for its rural bus initiatives.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My hon. Friend is well aware that there are major problems with road and rail systems and the environment in Cumbria—particularly in the Lake district. Can we be assured that the important review that is now going on—which we all called for—will change the environment and have a real impact on Cumbria, which has gone without for many generations?

Mr. Meale: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has worked tirelessly in this area for many years since his election as a Member of Parliament. He knows that the Secretary of State and I are interested in trying to implement a real strategy for the Cumbria area in order to sort out some of its problems. The Deputy Prime Minister and I visited the area on 10 October this year, and I visited again on 17 October. We have already put together a grant in aid for the Cumbria county council of £150,000 for work on the development of multi-modal interchange facilities for the area. The core partnerships in the Lake district are about to start work on that. We hope to produce a report shortly, which we shall bring before the House.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): Will the Minister accept that his interest, and that of his colleagues, in the affairs of Cumbria is very welcome? However, it would be helpful if he could give some idea of the time scale for reaching some firm conclusions. Will he reassure my constituents that he will bear in mind the unique nature of the area and its dependence on tourism? In particular, does he now recognise that Kendal is not in West Cumbria? Will he confirm that he now has more of an understanding of the geography of Cumbria than of Cyprus?

Mr. Meale: I assure the hon. Gentleman that I know where Cumbria is, as I visited the area many times when I was much younger. The Government acknowledge that tourism is very important to Cumbria. Any changes made will benefit the area so that more people can visit and have a better time when they are there.

Local Government Finance

3. Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): What representations he has received from the Local Government Association regarding the local government finance settlement for 1999–2000. [58606]

The Minister for Local Government and Housing (Ms Hilary Armstrong): The Local Government Association and special interest groups within it have made a number of representations during discussions on next year's financial settlement for local government.

Mr. Gray: I am sure that those groups were grateful to the Minister for her valuable time. Will she now find time to meet a delegation from Wiltshire county council, which will explain to her the consequences of last year's settlement and the £100 million that her Government robbed from shire counties? Sparsity and rural poverty in Wiltshire make it one of the eight worst-funded counties in England. That is in stark contrast to the Prime Minister's constituency, which did conspicuously well in last year's settlement. Will the Minister explain why that was so?

Ms Armstrong: The hon. Gentleman forgets that the Prime Minister represents a rural constituency, too. At the request of the LGA, I have met each of the groupings in the LGA, including the county councils network. The hon. Gentleman knows from his previous position, before he became a Member of Parliament, that the period for representations on individual budgets comes once the settlement has been announced. If Wiltshire wants to make representations, we will consider them. Following the actions on which I suspect the hon. Gentleman had some influence under the previous Government, we want to make the settlement much fairer than it was when we took office. The hon. Gentleman may be able to give us lessons on how to make sure that some councils get more money than others.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): I accept that the Government's objective is to make the distribution far fairer, but alterations to area cost adjustments and standard spending assessments while the overall limit remains fixed will only please some people and upset others. Will my hon. Friend recognise the plight of councils such as Burnley, which have had their capping level frozen for a number of years? Those are a small group of authorities with a particular problem, which I hope the Government will try to correct.

Ms Armstrong: My hon. Friend is honest when he admits that, when one redistributes money, some gain and some lose, and that one can never please everybody all the time. The position of the authorities that he represents has been put to me. I have met that grouping. My hon. Friend will also know that the Deputy Prime Minister made it clear, following the comprehensive spending review, that there will be no pre-announced capping limits this year.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (South-West Surrey): Further to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) about the vindictive attack on some of the shire counties, is the Minister aware that there is a sub-group of local authorities that have both rural and urban characteristics—the town and country issues group? This is the third time that I have raised their plight with her in the House. Could it be third time lucky? If she has not already done so, will she agree to meet that group?

Ms Armstrong: The House is no doubt becoming aware that, if I saw every delegation before the settlement was announced, we would not have time to do the work necessary to deliver the settlement. We saw every delegation that asked to see us after the last settlement. Since then, I have met the LGA in partnership meetings and I have met the groupings recommended to us by the LGA. I have read and listened to the arguments of the town and country issues group on many occasions. I utterly reject any suggestion of vindictive treatment of shire counties last year. Far from it—we are delivering a much fairer settlement than the right hon. Lady's Government ever managed to do.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): The majority of local government appreciates the opportunity to meet my hon. Friend and discuss matters before the SSA is settled. Will she ensure that the planned 15 per cent. increase in SSAs over the next three years provides an opportunity to distribute resources more fairly in local government, without any authority losing money? Will she assure the House and the country that she will live up to the promise to make the settlement fairer, so that authorities such as mine receive a fairer deal over the next three years?

Ms Armstrong: We have made it clear that we are seeking to move to a much fairer settlement. There are difficult issues on the table this year. I hope that, when the statement is made to the House in two or three weeks' time, the House will recognise that the Government have listened to the representations made to them and have taken steps towards establishing fairness. The Government are putting substantial new money into local government over the next three years as a result of the comprehensive spending review. That is a demonstration of our commitment to local government and our support for the public services that it delivers.

Jackie Ballard (Taunton): I am sure that the Minister is aware that for many years local authorities, such as Somerset county council, have prioritised spending on education and social services at the expense both of other vital services and of non-statutory services. When can local government expect the Government to allow it the financial freedom to meet the needs and priorities of its local citizens?

Ms Armstrong: The hon. Lady seems to be asking for every service to have priority, but the very nature of priority is that one prioritises. The Government have a manifesto commitment to prioritise health and education. We have made it clear through the comprehensive spending review that we will lift crude and universal capping, but we have also made it clear that we regard local government as an important part of the public sector and, therefore, of the overall public purse.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): Is the Minister aware of the findings of the recent independent report produced for the county councils network that school transport costs more per pupil in rural areas than in urban areas?

Ms Armstrong: As I have said, I have received representations from the county councils network. I have met its representatives and we shall take their representations into account when reaching decisions on the settlement.

Mrs. Shephard: If the hon. Lady agrees with those findings, does she accept that the Government's decision—it was her Government's decision—to switch £100 million away from rural areas in this year's settlement was wrong? Does she also accept that boasting, as she has often done, of making a £50 million rural transport grant to the very areas that she has already robbed of £100 million, is not only naive but ludicrous?

Ms Armstrong: The right hon. Lady does not seem to learn from one Question Time to another. I made it absolutely clear at the previous Question Time that the her figures are wrong. If one takes the amount of money going into those rural areas along with that going to the shire districts and counties, one sees that there was nothing like a switch of £100 million. The right hon. Lady knows that, but she chooses to ignore it. That is politics, and I accept that. But the right hon. Lady also chooses to denigrate the £150 million that will go into rural bus services during the next three years. I do not wonder that she tries to do that, because the Conservative Government, of which she was a member, ensured that some rural areas simply had no buses. I hope that she is proud of her actions.

Incinerators

4. Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire): What monitoring is undertaken by his Department on the siting of proposed (a) animal incinerators and (b) household waste incinerators. [58607]

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Michael Meacher): Details on the siting of waste incinerators which are subject to planning permission are kept on the planning registers of local planning authorities. My Department keeps details of planning permissions granted and refused for incineration development both with energy recovery and without energy recovery, which can be used for monitoring. These records do not differentiate between animal and household waste incinerators.

Mr. Pickthall: The village of Burscough in my constituency has been under siege for some time now by developers who wish to site three animal incinerators there. Alongside that, neighbouring local authorities plan to increase the number of household waste incinerators. Does my right hon. Friend agree that we desperately need a strategic overview of the location of incinerators and, with that in mind, will he review the document issued by the Department in August 1997, which says that incinerators can be installed without planning permission where there is a building or land already designated for general industrial use? Would that not mean that, wherever there was an industrial site in Britain, incinerators could sprout up, without local people or local authorities being able to object to them?

Mr. Meacher: I understand my hon. Friend's concerns. A planning application for the development of an incinerator—whether it is made in an industrial area or not—has to be determined in accordance with the development plan, unless material considerations dictate otherwise, and in the light of planning guidance from the Department.

My hon. Friend is correct to say that we issued guidance in respect of over-30-months scheme incineration on 8 August last year, but in February this year we also issued for consultation the final draft of planning policy guidance note 10, entitled "Waste Disposal and Management". That advises on the location of waste management facilities and suggests that, although some industrial sites may be appropriate for site-specific reasons, there are a range of other options.

Travellers

5. Ms Claire Ward (Watford): What discussions he has had with local authorities about the effect of travellers on local communities. [58608]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Nick Raynsford): We have had a number of discussions with local authorities, and with hon. Members, about gipsies and travellers. These have helped us to develop our policy on unauthorised camping, set out in "Managing Unauthorised Camping: A Good Practice Guide", which we published on 29 October, jointly with the Home Office. The good practice guidance stresses the need for local authorities and the police to develop joint protocols to deal more effectively with this issue. The good practice guidance, and the associated research report, are in the Library.

Ms Ward: Is my hon. Friend aware of the substantial costs that may be incurred by landowners and local businesses in obtaining court orders, and that local authorities have powers to obtain similar court orders more cheaply and quickly than those private applicants? Will he issue further guidance to local authorities to assist local businesses to obtain court orders so that we may be able to achieve a cheaper and more efficient way of removing some travellers, who are causing difficulties and expense for local communities and businesses?

Mr. Raynsford: I understand the concerns that my hon. Friend has expressed. I draw her attention to paragraph 4.5 of the good practice guidance, which specifically identifies the extent to which local authorities may assist private owners in action where there is unauthorised occupation as one of the issues that should be developed as part of local plans. I therefore urge her to talk to her local authority and the local police to develop an effective local protocol.

Sir Nicholas Lyell (North-East Bedfordshire): Does the Minister recognise that we have a serious problem in Bedfordshire? One receives repeated representations from the farming community about the cost to farmers and other landowners of the removal of unauthorised travellers. Will he make the most urgent inquiries to find out whether the system be improved and made cheaper?

Mr. Raynsford: The evidence from the research undertaken by the university of Birmingham, on which we based the good practice guidance, was that there were wide variations in the performance of different local authorities and, indeed, different police authorities, in their response to the problem of unauthorised camping. The purpose of the good practice guidance, therefore, is to show what can be achieved, efficiently and cost-effectively, by the areas where there is the best co-operation. We want that to spread throughout the country, which is precisely why we issued the guidance, less than a month ago. I hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will commend it to his local authority and police.

Children's Parliament

6. Mrs. Janet Dean (Burton): Which parts of the country will be involved in the children's parliament. [58609]

The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. John Prescott): The children's parliament on the environment is open to all schools in England with year 6 pupils, building on the interest that young people have in their environment and giving them the opportunity to develop an understanding of the democratic process. I am pleased to announced that more than 2,000 schools have so far registered to participate.

Mrs. Dean: Given that climate change is likely to be one of the topics discussed at the children's parliament, will my right hon. Friend tell the House whether he is satisfied with the outcome of the Buenos Aires conference?

Mr. Prescott: I was pleased with the Buenos Aires conference, which followed a successful Kyoto conference at which legal targets for gas emissions were agreed. The Buenos Aires conference maintained that momentum and agreed a two-year action programme to ensure that climate change policy can be put into practice, and it sends the signal that Governments are serious about the urgent need to tackle the threat of global warming.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): As I chair a steering group that hopes to establish a UK youth parliament in 2000, may I ask what is the budget for the children's parliament?

Mr. Prescott: It is estimated at approximately £300,000.

Freeholders

7. Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): What action his Department is proposing to take to curb the activities of freeholders who demand retrospective payment from leaseholders for alterations made to their homes. [58610]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Nick Raynsford): I share my hon. Friend's concern about the large payments that are sometimes demanded from leaseholders who alter their homes. That is just one example of how leaseholders can be exploited by unscrupulous landlords. We hope to issue shortly a consultation paper on leasehold reform.

Mr. Chaytor: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Is he aware of the activities of companies such as Ladybrook Securities, Simarc Property Management, Chancery Lane Estates, Leafenvoy Ltd, Grace Favour Ltd, Compton Developments and Urban Point Property Management? They all have a track record throughout Greater Manchester, including my constituency of Bury, North, of issuing extortionate demands to leaseholders for minor administrative procedures such as retrospective consent for planning permission or notification of change of ownership. Will my hon. Friend assure the House that the scandalous exploitation of leaseholders will be tackled head on in the forthcoming consultation document?

Mr. Raynsford: I am well aware of the extensive concern, expressed by my hon. Friend and many other hon. Members from his region and other parts of the country, about the activities of some unscrupulous landlords who use loopholes in legislation to extract unreasonable sums from leaseholders. We are very concerned about it and are determined to tackle the abuse. I ask my hon. Friend to bear with us and wait for the forthcoming consultation paper to see precisely how we propose to end the abuse.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): Does the Minister accept that opportunities for leaseholders were considerably extended by the Housing Act 1996, introduced by the previous Government? Will he consider giving leaseholders an opportunity to apply directly to leasehold valuation tribunals in cases that commenced before that Act came into force, rather than simply allowing the courts to transfer such cases, as he is now considering?

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman refers to the option of transferring cases from a court to a leasehold valuation tribunal. That will apply only in cases that are currently before the courts, and it would be wrong to deny the courts an opportunity to reach a view on such cases. However, we have acted in response to concerns expressed by leaseholders to make it possible, where the courts consider it appropriate, for the more informal—and sometimes better informed—leasehold valuation tribunals to deal with those complex and technical issues. That is the basis on which we have acted.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): The Minister referred to the consultation paper, which, in 1997, was promised for the following spring. It now appears that the consultation paper will be issued in spring 1999, which is more than a year late. May I urge the Minister to speed up the process on behalf of thousands of leaseholders throughout the country who suffer from malpractice by unscrupulous landlords or who have great difficulty in enfranchising themselves—something that they expected to be able to do under the previous Government's legislation?

Mr. Raynsford: I remind the hon. Gentleman that there is a history of frequent, ill-considered change in leasehold legislation. The previous Government's motives were often good, but the legislation was not properly thought through and, as a consequence, proved unworkable. That is why we are determined to get the package right this time and have given it careful and serious thought. As I said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor), we intend to publish a consultation paper shortly, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not have to wait until next spring to see it.

Green Belt

8. Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): If he will make a statement about his policy on green-belt land. [58611]

The Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning (Mr. Richard Caborn): The Government's policy was stated in our response to the 10th report of the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee. We said:

"the Government favours robust Green Belt boundaries and a continuing presumption against inappropriate development within them."

Sir Sydney Chapman: However many houses our nation will need between now and 2016, and however great the proportion that can be built on brown-field sites or recycled land and land earmarked for industrial development, given that some will have to be built on green-field sites, why cannot the Government give a continuing commitment to protect established green-belt land, especially as it represents less than an eighth of England's countryside? Why cannot the Minister give that simple commitment?

Mr. Caborn: I want to put on record the fact that, since the Government came to power in May 1997, the amount of green belt has considerably increased. Each case will be judged on its merits. We have a specific commitment to PPG2 on the green belt. As for household growth, we are ensuring that this becomes a regional issue, we have made a commitment that 60 per cent. of building will be on brown-field sites, and we have commissioned the inquiry under Lord Rogers of Riverside. We have done more to protect the green belt in the past 18 months than the previous Administration did in 18 years.

Air Pollution (Fuel Duties)

29. Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): If he will make a statement on the impact of the level of fuel duties on pollution. [58634]

The Minister of Transport (Dr. John Reid): It is estimated that, over the period 1996–2002, the road fuel duty escalator—if continued at its current level of an increase of 6 per cent. per annum in real terms—will save between 2 million and 5 million tonnes of carbon in 2010, compared with the carbon emissions that would occur in 2010 under the alternative of no real duty increases over the relevant period.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply. What estimate has he made of the impact that this enormous increase in duties will have on inflation, our business competitiveness and the automobile and related trades? Does he agree that, even if he achieves the figures that he has given, there is a distinct risk that the price in jobs, businesses and prosperity could be very high indeed?

Dr. Reid: I remind the right hon. Gentleman that his Government introduced the policy of a real increase in fuel duty. As it happens, we agree with that policy, but he obviously does not, which is probably why he is no longer a Front-Bench spokesman. The Government have made their commitment clear. We are committed to environmental considerations to achieve an improvement in the environment, and to working with motor manufacturers to produce more fuel-efficient engines with fewer emissions, so that motorists can not only save money, but contribute to an improvement in air quality and in the general environment. I am sure that that commitment is supported by motorists and non-motorists alike. It was advanced by the previous Government and has been continued by this Government. It seems that on this, as on many other questions, the right hon. Gentleman is isolated.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): I welcome my right hon. Friend's comments, and the change in policy and momentum that the new Government have achieved. Will he examine more carefully the excellent example of the landfill tax? It is a hypothecated tax linked to landfill, and is doing much for the environment up and down the country. Could we have more hypothecated taxes that the public can see are linked to environmental improvement?

Dr. Reid: Yes, indeed. My hon. Friend will be well aware that, in a landmark decision, the Deputy Prime Minister, with the Chancellor's agreement, proposed that we should have hypothecated taxation or charging to enable local authorities to take action on congested roads. That is a major step forward for the environment and for the reduction of congestion. It allows greater transparency, and will enable people to see that the charges they pay are being put towards the real alternative of a reliable, safe and modern public transport system. Once again, the Government are contributing towards the improvement of the environment and the creation of choice for motorists and non-motorists alike.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell): Given that the last Conservative Government imposed some £25 billion in extra fuel duties on motorists and that the new Government's policies would impose another £9 billion, is it not time—if we are to sell the principle of environmental taxation—to give something back to the taxpayer? That should be done not by making a small cut in vehicle excise duty, a proposal on which the Government are consulting, but by abolishing the duty—which is a tax on ownership rather than use of vehicles—for all but the most gas-guzzling cars.

Dr. Reid: The Government have given a great deal back to the taxpayer, in both environmental and transport terms. An example mentioned earlier is the £150 million for rural transport services, part of the £1.7 billion extra for transport. The hon. Gentleman may not know about the fuel duty rebates with which we are encouraging local authorities to make buses the centrepiece of local transport plans. We are taking a number of other measures. For instance, we are considering introducing a variable car tax. Under proposals announced by the Chancellor, there would be a lower car tax for smaller, more efficient vehicles.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me an opportunity to describe the numerous benefits that the Government are delivering to the taxpayer, in transport as in so many other areas.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): Is the Minister aware that the Government's announced intention to engage in yet more consultation—this time on variable rates of vehicle excise duty—has been memorably described by Friends of the Earth as "Carry on Consulting"? When will he and his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State stop walking and talking, as his right hon. Friend keeps putting it, and start making some decisions—or are they waiting for the Treasury to tell them what to do again?

Dr. Reid: "Carry on Consulting" is slightly preferable to "Carry on Matron", which is what we see every time the right hon. Lady comes to the Dispatch Box. I am surprised that she, as a leading member of what we are now told were a caring, sharing, sensitive, listening Government, should be so opposed in principle to consulting people. Perhaps, if that Government had consulted slightly more, she would not now be sitting on the Opposition Benches.

As for vehicle excise duty, I think that there will be wide and popular support for the idea that those who purchase and use smaller, more fuel-efficient and less polluting cars should pay less tax than those who use larger, less fuel-efficient and more polluting cars. The principle has already been agreed, we are consulting on the mechanisms, and I think that the proposal will be supported throughout the country.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): It is absolutely true that those who pollute most should pay most. Does my right hon. Friend agree, however, that the longer-term prospects are for leaner-burn and more efficient, effective and economic combustion systems that will reduce all pollutants from engines, and will enable us over time to deal with the matter in a quite different way—not simply through price mechanisms?

Dr. Reid: My hon. Friend has put his point as succinctly as anyone could have.

30. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): If he will make a statement on his policy in respect of the A303. [58636]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Glenda Jackson): We are committed to carrying out the improvement of the A303 alongside Stonehenge and to a bypass of Winterbourne Stoke. The strategic role of the A303 and its remaining single carriageway sections will be considered as part of the corridor study from London to the south-west and south Wales. We will consult the regional planning conferences on this.

Mr. Heath: Can the Minister distinguish between schemes that are simply intended to make the road bigger and faster and to take people to Cornwall more quickly, and those that will save lives and relieve communities of heavy traffic? Will she look again at the section from Sparkford to Ilchester, and the slip road to the A359 which will relieve the village of Queen Camel?

Ms Jackson: I am somewhat surprised by the hon. Gentleman's rejection of an imaginative scheme that will protect what is surely one of the most important historic sites in the world, and is a clear demonstration of the close co-operation between Departments across Government.

The corridor study that I mentioned is a major multi-modal study, including not only roads but railways. The objective is to examine the scope for reducing congestion by considering better management of the road network and by shifting traffic from road to rail. Clearly, underpinning all those aims is one of the Government's primary considerations: to reduce accidents on roads.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): Is the Minister aware that the delay of some five to seven years caused by the new study will give concern to my constituents, and to those using the A303 where it meets the A30 in my constituency? She will know that the A30 from Honiton to Exeter is being dualled and is a new road, which we welcome, but that the holiday build-up, particularly in July and August—which will be alleviated when the new road opens—will cause problems further back on that stretch of the A303 where it meets the A30. Is she content that, while another study is carried out, there will be mayhem for people trying to get into the west country in summer?

Ms Jackson: I am somewhat surprised that the hon. Lady seems to have plucked out of the air the figure of seven years. We hope that, subject to the regional planning conference, the study will start next year. However, as many sections of the scheme returned with boring regularity between 1989 and 1996 under her Administration—part of that inevitable wish list that everyone knew would never be achieved—I find her remarks somewhat absurd.

Northern Line

31. Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): When the new rolling stock will come fully into service on the London Underground Northern line; and what has caused the delays. [58637]

The Minister for Transport in London (Ms Glenda Jackson): Madam Speaker—[Interruption.] Perhaps that passes in the House for the cry of, "Encore."

London Underground expects that a full Northern line service will be provided with new trains by early autumn 1999. The delivery of new trains was delayed by more than a year due to production problems at ALSTOM's train-building plant. Deliveries started during 1997.

Before the trains can be brought into service, a number of difficulties are being resolved relating to the train and associated systems. For example, there have been problems with the computer software on trains and a delay in delivering the train simulator.

Sir Sydney Chapman: I am sure that, like mine, the hon. Lady's constituents will be deeply disappointed at the delays in bringing the new rolling stock on to the Northern line. As the private finance initiative negotiated contract contained a specific clause placing financial penalties on the manufacturers and suppliers of the rolling stock for late delivery, can she say what financial compensation will be paid either to the Government or to London Transport?

Ms Jackson: On the ground of commercial confidentiality, I regret that I cannot give the absolute figure, but there is little doubt that those companies are having to pay penalties for their failure to meet their side of the contract.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South): Will the Minister take this opportunity to cast some light into the black hole of London Underground's finances? We know that the London Underground subsidy ceases in 2000, that the costs of the Jubilee line extension are up by £100 million this year, and that further losses are to be announced due to the delay in finishing the extension. How does she intend to make up those losses? Will it be by grant, or will they be added to London Underground's balance sheet?

The Secretary of State is already planning to dump the costs of his ridiculous public-private partnership on the new Greater London authority. How much extra is he proposing to add to the mayor's bill, due to his hopeless, incompetent management of London Underground?

Ms Jackson: I would have thought that even the hon. Gentleman had been in post long enough to be able to drop his usual approach, which is not only ill-mannered, but ill-informed. As he well knows, the Government have found an additional £365 million for London Underground, which means that, over the next two years, it will be able to meet the full commitment of £550 million a year, a maintenance bill that was left because of the previous Administration's failure, year on year, adequately to core-fund London Underground.

There were six increases in the proposed final budget for the Jubilee line extension between 1993, when the project was given the go ahead, and May 1997—every time under the hon. Gentleman's Administration. That is another graphic example of their lamentable failure to exercise proper stewardship of London's transport.

Strategic Roads Review

32. Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): What representations he has received on the publication of the strategic roads review. [58638]

The Minister of Transport (Dr. John Reid): We have received a number of representations on various aspects of the review following its publication at the end of July.

Mr. Mackinlay: Will the Minister help me to explain, to those who tell me their objections and share some of my concerns, the apparent conflicts in the Government's policy on widening the M25? How does he square the proposal to widen the M25, substantially on its western side, with the Government's air quality strategy, bearing in mind the fact that, within two years, PM10—particulate matter—levels, for example, will exceed levels stated in that strategy?

On the day on which the Department has published the results of the roads review and a leaflet on the M25 London orbital motorway—which states that the Government reject the option of building out of congestion on the M25, as implementing such proposals leads only to monster motorways—how are we to reconcile the proposal to widen the M25, which I think is unnecessary, with our objectives on air quality and basic objections on building our way out of congestion? I should welcome the Minister's explanation of how that conflict can be reconciled.

Dr. Reid: I shall, as ever, do what I can to assist my hon. Friend. He will be aware that there were proposals—which the Government examined very closely—to widen large sections of the M25. The Government considered and withdrew proposals to widen between junctions 15 and 16 and between junctions 16 and 19. The Government decided to go ahead with specific proposals on the area between junctions 12 and 15, because we have to start by dealing with the situation as it is. Those three junctions are acutely congested, largely because of negligence by the previous Government.

Mr. Mackinlay: Nothing to do with terminal 5?

Dr. Reid: Unfortunately, we inherited the world that was left to us by the previous Government, which was not an ideal one. We decided to go ahead with widening proposals on that section, having rejected proposals on the other two sections.

As my hon. Friend knows, the picture on air quality is complicated. I merely tell him that continued congestion and the stop-go driving of many cars can do very little but contribute to air congestion. As for his useful sedentary question, terminal 5 was in no way taken into account in any of the deliberations. A decision—over which we have no control—will be taken autonomously and independently. It is a quasi-judicial process, which we would not have allowed to enter into our consideration.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): May I remind the right hon. Gentleman that Labour Members used to tell us that widening the M25 was £100 million of motorway madness? It is comforting now to hear him using the same type of words that we used when trying to explain the situation to Labour Members when they were in opposition. Now that the transport White Paper has been launched—providing a photo-opportunity on the tube for the Secretary of State, before he skulked back to his Jaguar—and the roads review has been celebrated, this morning, with the opening of the Newbury bypass, at dead of night and in secret, what are we to expect? What exactly is the Government's transport policy?

After various consultations over 18 months, we are still waiting for policy on buses, road-user charging, vehicle excise duties, car parking taxes, shipping, sustainable distribution, road safety, local transport plans, inland waterways, ports and airports. There has been not a single piece of legislation. When will the Secretary of State give us a real transport policy, rather than policy paralysis in his Department and ever more gridlock on the roads?

Dr. Reid: In 18 months, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and the Department over which he presides produced more common sense, strategic reasoning, detailed plans and money to assist the transport systems than the previous Government managed to do in 18 years. The reason that he was able to list documents and action across a whole range of sectors—including sustainable distribution, local authority plans, congestion charging, buses, shipping and aviation policy—is that the present Government have tackled all those strategic issues which lay in abeyance for so long under the previous Government. The people of Britain deserve a better transport system and we are going to give it to them.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe): Among the representations that the Minister has received, has he had any along the lines of that submitted by the Conservative council adjacent to my constituency, which welcomed the thrust of the strategic transport policy, the roads review and the cutbacks on road projects all over the country, except for the two in its immediate vicinity?

Dr. Reid: Yes, indeed. Many councils congratulated us on our approach to an integrated transport policy—even some Conservative councils, not all of which had benefited from a new bypass. I assure my hon. Friend that there are a number of fair-minded Conservative councils. Of course, there are also councils that take the view that it is fine for everyone else to contribute to an integrated transport policy and a better environment, but that they should somehow be excluded from consideration. By and large, however, the proposals by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister that are in the White Paper have been widely welcomed, not only by local authorities, but by the transport industry and, most important, by the people of this country who have waited too long for a decent, reliable, safe transport system.

Freight

33. Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): What incentives his Department is offering to transfer freight from road to rail; and if he will make a statement. [58639]

34. Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): What steps he will take to encourage the increased use of the railways for freight transport. [58640]

35. Mr. Tom Levitt (High Peak): What measures he is taking to encourage the transport of freight by rail. [58641]

The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. John Prescott): The Government want to see more freight move by rail. Last year, we doubled spending on freight grants from £15 million to £30 million and we further increased grants to £40 million. In contrast to the previous Administration, we are spending every penny of it. Next spring, we will have a shadow strategic rail authority to ensure that freight is taken fully into account in planning and developing the rail network.

Mr. Llwyd: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for that reply. Does he agree that the transfer of freight from road to rail in Wales would be far easier and much improved if there were a direct rail link between Holyhead and Cardiff? In that context, has he had the opportunity to look at the report by Friends of the Earth Cymru strongly advocating that?

Mr. Prescott: We are studying several reports on improving the freight rail system. A number of years ago, I considered the issue of Holyhead in respect of the trans-Pennine link with Europe and the land bridge concept. There are great opportunities and we are providing support for them at the moment.

Mr. Miller: My right hon. Friend knows that, in my constituency, there have been many complaints from businesses and industries that are trying to export, but are unable to exploit the rail freight network. Will he tell us in more detail the precise effects that his announcement will have on rail freight tonnage and the longer-term plans to develop the Government's excellent policy?

Mr. Prescott: We have taken a long-term view, particularly in regard to services to Europe. We renegotiated the channel tunnel link and we are now negotiating with the French authorities to see how we can improve the European services. We have asked Railtrack to look at all possible freight rail systems and the piggyback systems, and we are about to receive a report. We are pleased that a number of companies have increased the number of their wagons and engines, leading to a 12.5 per cent. growth in rail freight services in 1997–98—for the first time in many years.

Mr. Levitt: My right hon. Friend's reply will be welcomed, not least by three groups in my constituency: those communities that live next to main roads; the quarrying industry, which has already announced its intention to increase the amount of freight going by rail; and those campaigning for the restoration of the Buxton to Matlock rail link. Will my right hon. Friend explain to the House how the strategic rail authority will help to take forward the campaign to increase the amount of freight on the rails?

Mr. Prescott: The strategic rail authority will consider a multi-modal approach to maximise the contribution of road and rail interchanges, including park-rail systems, by which cars can connect with main rail systems, or the rail interchange systems, which have increased considerably in the past 12 months. Those are ways in which we can improve the possibilities, alongside increasing grants and encouraging people to move more to rail. There are clear signs of that change, with 12.5 per cent. growth this year. To coin a phrase, we are getting there.

Territorial Army

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Robertson): With permission, Madam Speaker—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Will those Members who are not staying for the statement please leave quietly and quickly?

Mr. Robertson: I should like to make a statement about the future organisation and structure of the Territorial Army.

When I announced the conclusions of our strategic defence review on 8 July, I said that I was determined that the Territorial Army should become more relevant, more usable and better integrated with the rest of our forces. Since then, we have analysed how to put that vision into practice and engaged in detailed and widespread consultation with those most expert on the TA. The decisions that I have taken will produce a tauter, stronger Territorial Army, ready to play its part in facing tomorrow's crises. The changes are faithful to the design that I set out in my statement on 8 July.

We said that we would consult widely, and we have, especially with members of the TA, and the Territorial, Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Associations. We said that we would listen, and we have, to the many representations that have been made by hon. Members and others. The final structure reflects many substantive changes from the initial proposals circulated for consultation.

The theme of the strategic defence review was modern forces for the modern world. We no longer face a threat to our national survival, but crises and risks are still real and operationally demanding. We can expect little warning of trouble, and we are likely to have to go to the crisis, rather than have it come to us. That places a premium on armed forces that are flexible, useable and ready to react. However, we also need to retain a foundation on which we could generate larger capabilities should a strategic threat to NATO begin to re-emerge.

Tomorrow's Territorial Army will be central to both those needs, like the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force reserves, both of which will grow as a result of the defence review. The TA will no longer be a general reserve for general war in Europe, but a wholly integrated and vital part of a single capability—regular and reserve—for overseas deployment.

We can achieve that by giving the Territorial Army clearly defined operational roles in support of expeditionary forces and structuring it accordingly. There will be a clear shift of emphasis so that we can use the whole of the TA, not just part of it.

We shall make sure that the people who make up the units will be trained and available at the time that we need them. At present, most units are manned only to the extent needed to achieve low levels of readiness. That will change. More units will be held at higher readiness. The previous Government's decisions limited most TA units to only 90 per cent. of their establishments. As a consequence, the strength of the TA today stands at around 54,000. This Government will ensure that the TA of the future is fully resourced for its roles. If needs be, the Government will be prepared to call up the TA in formed units in situations short of a direct threat to the United Kingdom, such as the Gulf war. We are proposing a radical shift away from the TA's traditional image as "weekend warriors", towards a new, more heavyweight role in the world after the cold war. I believe that the TA will welcome such change.

I have set out details in a document that I placed in the Library of the House more than an hour ago. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Defence Procurement, my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces and I have written to hon. Members with an interest in the matter. The letters should have reached them before this statement. I hope that that notice has given hon. Members information that will help them in the following exchange.

The structure set out in our document will, first and foremost, enable tomorrow's TA to meet the operational demands that will be placed on it in future. Secondly, it will encompass a degree of insurance for the unexpected—should a strategic threat to NATO ever re-emerge. There are third and fourth elements to our proposals, too. The reforms will enable the TA to maintain a widespread presence throughout the nations, regions and counties of the United Kingdom. The armed forces must continue to be linked to the local and national communities that they serve, and the TA is vital in achieving that. Many hon. Members have stressed the important role of the Territorial Army as part of the visible presence of the armed forces across the country, and as a source of practical help to local communities. We share those views and took explicit decisions to reflect them fully in our plans.

Fourthly, in the forefront of our minds and of those of many hon. Members has been the need to secure and promote the cadets, and in particular to protect the units which share premises with the TA. I have made that clear on many occasions my strong support for the cadets. They are not a recruiting organisation but a self-standing and successful youth movement. Even so, whereas on average only 8 per cent. of today's Regular Army have been in the TA, 25 per cent. have experience of the cadets. Consequently, our aim has been to protect cadet units as far as possible from disruption during the transition to the new structure. We shall retain many TA centres for cadet use even when they are no longer to be used by Territorial Army units. I assure the House that we will not dispose of a centre until alternative facilities have been provided for the cadets—although some temporary dislocation is inevitable. I have set aside up to £12 million to meet those needs. In addition, I will be allocating £3 million extra to the cadets over the next four years.

In the summer, I told the House that, to meet the requirements that we envisaged placing on the Territorial Army, it would need to be about 40,000 strong. Following our detailed analysis and consultation, we have decided that a modest increase in that number is needed. The result will be a TA of 41,200. In other words, that is a reduction of 13,000 on today's strength. To put that into perspective, last year we lost almost that number through natural wastage alone. In total, only 87 of Britain's 455 TA centres will close outright. A further 27 will be retained for the cadets. Four in every five centres will therefore remain.

The decisions will fulfil both the country's operational need and the armed forces' role in the communities that they serve and in which they live. The outcome is not some number determined by an arbitrary exercise in cost reduction, but is securely rooted in a thorough analysis of policy and military need. It has the full backing of the head of the Army, the Chief of the General Staff, General Sir Roger Wheeler, and the whole Army Board. In that respect, as in its operational justification, it is no different from the rest of the strategic defence review.

I know that some would have wished us to go further and to maintain the reserves at much higher levels than we have proposed, just in case; but the nation simply does not need such large numbers and I cannot justify them either militarily, or as a Minister spending the money of taxpayers. To be frank, the self-esteem of the TA is not likely to survive if it has no real military purpose and is stuck frozen in some cold war glacier. However, we have not presumed that we can predict the future, or that it will be a continuation of the patterns of the recent past, so the TA will continue to be a basis for the regeneration of larger reserve forces, should the country ever need them.

We have also taken pains to implement change in a way that is sensitive to the pride and commitment of volunteers and to their regimental traditions and ethos. Tomorrow's Territorial Army will retain substantial, though reduced, numbers of infantry. In future, there will be 15 new infantry battalions and they will choose their own names. I am pleased to tell the House that, within those, all existing TA infantry cap-badge affiliations will be maintained at company level; not a single cap badge will be lost.

Traditions in the TA yeomanry will also be maintained through a nationwide representation of yeomanry squadrons. We shall also ensure that those squadrons will have a real job to do and strong links to the regular regiments of the Royal Armoured Corps. TA yeomanry squadrons will have access to the same equipment as their regular counterparts, including the Challenger 2 main battle tank, and to the major armoured training areas.

We have also reflected carefully on the recommendation of the Select Committee on Defence on the nuclear, biological and chemical role of the Territorial Army. The SDR included the creation of a regular unit—a joint Army-RAF organisation—to improve significantly our current capability in that important area. Under initial proposals, the TA yeomanry would have contributed a single squadron to that unit; but I have decided, in light of the Committee's observations, to retain two squadrons of TA yeomanry devoted to the support of regular forces in that role.

Tomorrow's TA structure will reflect a greater emphasis on specialists and units of the supporting arms and services than has previously been the case. Those will provide, as now, the full range of combat and combat services support for a military deployment: signallers, artillery, air defence, logistics and engineers and, of course, medical services. Both regular and reserve medical services were, I regret, neglected by the previous Government. We shall, therefore, seek to increase substantially—by more than 2,000 soldiers—the manpower available to the volunteer Army medical service.

The strategic defence review was also crucially about people. Volunteer service will be more demanding in future, but it will continue to provide rewarding opportunities unparalleled in most other walks of life. There will also be opportunities to contribute to our new mission of defence diplomacy overseas. The TA of the future will be an enterprise to which we wish to attract the best. A new recruitment campaign will ensure that that message is clearly conveyed.

Retention is just as important. In recent years, for example, up to a third of the TA's recruits have been leaving within a year of joining; that must change. Therefore, there will be a package of improvements to personnel management in the Territorial Army, in particular for individual members of the TA who volunteer for service in Bosnia and elsewhere abroad. We are overhauling antiquated arrangements for keeping track of individual TA members. A new reserves training and mobilisation centre will start training individuals for overseas deployments from April next year. We shall improve education and training opportunities and ensure, through the provision of personal development records, that the value of the individual's experience and training in service is recognised, which will be to the benefit of the individual and, we hope, of his or her civilian employer.

The Territorial Army has a first-class record of responding to the need for change. As an essential part of the Army throughout this century, it has always had to be flexible in size and in organisation. It expanded to meet both world wars. Since then, it has been disbanded, re-raised, reduced and expanded again to meet developments in warfare and a changing threat.

The changes that I am announcing today will mean that, for the first time in many years, tomorrow's Territorial Army will have a clear role and purpose for the future. Tomorrow's Territorial Army will be better manned, trained, supported and integrated, and will be able to meet the challenges of the world after the cold war. In short, it will be a Territorial Army fit for the future—both valuable and valued by the whole country. I commend the reforms to the House.

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon): First, I thank the Secretary of State for his courtesy in letting me have a look at the proposals at 12 o'clock, which was helpful. I am grateful to him for that. I wish that I could say the same about their content. However, I am afraid that our worst expectations have just been confirmed.

The Territorial Army is to be cut from an establishment of 59,500 to 41,204—a cut of 31 per cent. The number of TA centres is to be cut from 455 to 341—a cut of 25 per cent. The Secretary of State thinks that he has made a brave decision, but it is one that his predecessors resisted. The Ministry of Defence has been trying to sell this downgrading of the TA to Ministers for years, and has finally found a Minister to whom it has succeeded in selling that proposal.

Such criticism does not just come from the Opposition—this is not a party political matter. The proposals have been criticised by Government Back Benchers, the Select Committee on Defence, the media, the Territorial Army, the TAVRAs, the Director of Infantry, the Secretary of State for Scotland, many retired officers and many regular soldiers, who are not allowed to speak but whose opinions are well known privately.

Those drastic cuts are being imposed at a time when we are beginning to realise that the end of the cold war has not brought a new era of peace and security. Our armed forces are heavily committed in Northern Ireland and Bosnia. We nearly became involved in Kosovo, and may still become so. The Gulf has been looking very dangerous recently, and who can be sure that armed intervention will not be needed? What about the threats that no one has yet even thought about?

Let us look at the proposals in a little more detail. First, I wish to refer to the few things that we can wholeheartedly support. We wholly endorse the reintroduction of the two Yeomanry squadrons as part of our nuclear, biological and chemical capability. The 2,000 extra posts in the Royal Army Medical Corps and the new 500-strong ambulance regiment are welcome. Speaking personally, I am delighted that the Stratford-upon-Avon TA centre and Signal Squadron have been reprieved. The commitment to better training and equipment is very welcome, but we shall watch to see that that happens. The strategic defence review was full of cuts today for better equipment tomorrow, and that must not happen to the TA.

I am delighted that the cadets are not to suffer the same fate as the TA. [Interruption.] The former Minister for the Armed Forces, the right hon. Member for Hamilton, North and Bellshill (Dr. Reid), is obviously so embarrassed by the statement that he feels compelled to leave the Chamber. [Interruption.] We missed the right hon. Gentleman, and we are delighted that he has returned to the Front Bench. I am delighted that the cadets will not suffer the same cuts as the TA, because their role in recruitment is vital.

The Secretary of State somehow pretends that it has fallen to him to reconfigure the TA after the end of the cold war, but this process has been going on for years. We agreed that the TA should be relevant to the post-cold war environment, and that is what we ensured. The TA has evolved significantly during the past few years and, frankly, it is insulting to the TA for the Secretary of State to pretend otherwise, or to describe those serving as "weekend warriors". Those weekend warriors are, as we speak, serving in Bosnia and Northern Ireland, and their lives are in danger on our behalf. The few good things that the Secretary of State proposes are largely building on what we started.

One of the effects of closing 114 TA centres will be that the TA will now be confined to our cities and large towns. Rural areas do not seem to be on the Government's map. There will be only one TA centre in Norfolk and only one in Lincolnshire, which is also a large county. There will be only one unit in central Wales between Wrexham in the north and Carmarthen in the south. In North Yorkshire, three centres are to close, leaving only one in Scarborough. What does that say to people in rural Britain? They are told that the TA is not for them and that, as in so many matters, the Government do not care about rural England. I use the word "England" advisedly because the highly critical letter of August from the Secretary of State for Scotland to the Secretary of State for Defence has resulted in reprieves for several TA centres in Scotland.

Will the Secretary of State answer a few questions? Will he confirm that the TA infantry is to be cut from more than 16,000 to 7,100, that the TA yeomanry is to be cut from 2,500 to 1,300 and that the strength of the Royal Engineers will be cut from 5,900 to 2,700? Will he confirm that the Royal Artillery will be cut from 3,900 to 3,000, that the Royal Logistics Corps will be cut from 19 to 14 regiments and lose a third of its manpower and that the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers will lose one of their five battalions and a quarter of their men? Will he tell the House whether the Director of Reserve Forces and Cadets has endorsed those cuts?

Will the Secretary of State confirm that his new figure for the TA establishment of 41,200 includes 3,500 in university officer training corps and more than 6,000 specialists? The Select Committee on Defence recommended that those categories should be excluded from that establishment. If they are, is not its true strength little more than 31,000? Does the Secretary of State think that that is an adequate reserve?

The truth of the matter cannot be hidden by the glossy booklets and heavy spin that accompany the announcement. This is all about money. The SDR imposed cuts and efficiency targets on the Ministry of Defence which it cannot meet. It is scrabbling around for any pound that it can save, and the TA seems to be a vulnerable target. The cuts in themselves will not save much; the prospect of selling off the 114 so-called surplus properties must have been too tempting to resist.

I suspect that that is why the review has been conducted in such secrecy. The Secretary of State said that a consultation paper was circulated. It was not circulated to Members of Parliament whose constituencies might be affected and it was not circulated to the public—their opinion was not sought. Circulation was so confined that the document—uniquely for the Government and the Ministry—was not even leaked.

If there was a genuine consultation exercise, why did the Select Committee feel it necessary to write to the Secretary of State on 2 November to complain that the TA and the TAVRAs felt that they had been excluded from the process? Why was it necessary for the Commander-in-Chief of Land Command to circulate a letter threatening to court-martial any soldier who even discussed the matter with his Member of Parliament? Any consultation was very narrow, and when the Select Committee reopens its inquiry, it will have its suspicions confirmed.

The TA is our insurance policy against a national emergency. At a time when we have a small Regular Army of little more than 100,000, that reserve becomes even more important. The Government's decision on the TA is dictated by a short-term policy for short-term savings, and we could pay dearly for it in the longer run. The TA is a very British institution based on volunteers, service and patriotism. It has given and continues to give valuable service to our country, but today is a black day for the Territorial Army. The Secretary of State has made a mistake today for which he will pay politically. I only hope that our country will not also have to pay the next time that we find ourselves in a major crisis.

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for beginning his minor rant with a commendation because we provided information on some of our proposals in advance. The areas that he singled out are among the most important components of the reform of the Territorial Army that I have presented to Parliament today.

First, let me deal with the issue of weekend warriors. I was not being derogatory about the Territorial Army. I was simply saying that, if the public perceive members of the TA to be weekend warriors, involved in training for roles that are no longer relevant, that does not work in favour of the proud and professional people who give of their time and trouble. I believe that, by giving them a modernised role, giving them a vision for the future and giving them a usability that they have never had, we shall rebuild morale in the Territorial Army from the chaos that was left to us to clean up.

Obviously, although we gave the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) the document at 12 o'clock today, he has still not sufficiently understood the figures in it. I shall bear that in mind next time, and perhaps allocate more time for him to do so. He mentioned an establishment of 59,000 in the Territorial Army. That is at best a notional and technical figure. My predecessor, Michael Portillo, did not even fund the Territorial Army to the 56,000 level, let alone the 59,000 level. As I said in my statement, the actual strength of the Territorial Army is 54,000. Therefore, the reduction is 13,000 on the basis of its existing strength, and scaremongering with irrelevant figures does not help the debate. Four out of five TA centres throughout the country will remain open. I believe that that outcome takes into account the views that we heard on the Territorial Army and on the cadets.

What a strange lack of memory the hon. Member for Stratford–on–Avon has. I know that he was out of the House for a whole Parliament, and I know that he was once a Treasury Minister, but his selective memory does not help us to have a constructive debate about this great service. Under the previous Government, and since the end of the cold war, the three Ministers who were responsible for the Ministry of Defence reduced the Territorial Army by 20,000 over 10 years. The hon. Gentleman therefore has a bit of a cheek to criticise me for trimming 13,000 from the Territorial Army.

The hon. Gentleman criticised our treatment of rural England, but that criticism will not stand a moment's examination of the maps in the document. In operational and footprint terms our proposals tell an extremely good story. The hon. Gentleman's allegations that Scotland got a special reprieve are a cheap jibe, in light of the fact that I gave him figures about the regional distribution of the Territorial Army and the reductions. The new establishment in Scotland is 75 per cent. of the previous strength; the national average is 76 per cent. Therefore Scotland is exactly on the national average.

The London area—which will get three extra infantry companies—is the one that has done best out of the add-backs that we made to bring the figure up to 41,200. We have put back an infantry company in the north-west; one infantry company in the west midlands; and one infantry company, a company of the Royal Military Police and a field hospital in the north-east of England. There is, therefore, no partiality involved in the process.

The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon itemises several areas where there have been reductions. Of course there have been reductions—I said that we had trimmed the numbers while increasing the role, training and integrity of the Territorial Army. However, the hon. Gentleman did not mention the addition of 2,000 to the defence medical services—an initial cut for which his Government were responsible.

The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon asked whether the plan had the whole-hearted backing—

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk): The cuts.

Mr. Robertson: The full package has been endorsed, not only by the Army Board, but by Brigadier Richard Holmes, Director of Reserve Forces and Cadets, who made that public statement only a few minutes ago, at the Ministry of Defence.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether the OTCs are included. Of course they are: they are part and parcel of the Territorial Army now, and into the future. The hon. Gentleman made a variety of nit-picking criticisms. However, as we are talking about authorities consulted on the review and the conclusions reached, he should bear in mind the words today of Field Marshal Lord Vincent of Coleshill, the last but one Chief of the Defence Staff and a great friend of the reserve forces of this land. He said:

"the strategic environment has changed very significantly over the last decade. It is therefore essential that the Territorial Army is organised and allocated operational tasks in a manner that is clearly consistent with our new defence priorities. We simply have to ensure that the Territorial Army remains relevant and useable, or it will increasingly lack credibility in the years ahead. I believe that the Strategic Defence Review, followed by the extensive consultation process, has achieved these important objectives."

Senior and distinguished members of the British Army endorse what I have proposed today, and so too, I believe, will the country.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. I remind the House that that one exchange has taken 30 minutes. We must have brisk questions and answers from Back Benchers and the Secretary of State—I am sure that he will oblige—if I am to call everyone.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): Today is obviously a bad day, and it is a black day for Chorley. I listened to the Secretary of State's criteria and, according to those criteria, Chorley TA centre should not be closed. It has nothing to do with some threat from Russia—far from it. I have only just read that our Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers 101 Battalion is to go to Wales. Why will it not remain in Chorley? I have been told that the cadet forces will remain untouched, but not in Chorley's case—the building that they use is marked down for closure.

I presume that something has gone wrong: either the Secretary of State has not been given the necessary information or Chorley has been treated differently. I do not believe that this is a political decision: it must be a mistake. I implore the Secretary of State to look seriously at what has happened. Will he meet a delegation from Chorley to discuss what will happen to the cadet force and why the battalion headquarters are to be moved from Chorley? When Cheshire—I have nothing against Cheshire—has nine TA centres and there is not one TA centre left in south Lancashire, there is something tragically wrong. Something has gone wrong with the formula because, according to the criteria, there is no way that Chorley's centre should close. I plead with the Secretary of State to meet us and to reverse his decision.

Mr. Robertson: I respect my hon. Friend's strong feelings. In any reform or redesign of the Territorial Army there will clearly be losers as well as winners. I feel as pained as many others about the decisions that have been taken, but such decisions are in the greater interests of the Territorial Army.

My hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces will certainly meet my hon. Friend, not to change the decision—the overall package has been thought through very carefully—but to consider how best we can ensure that the area's cadets are accommodated properly and how the Territorial Army soldiers currently based in Chorley may find a proper career in the other units remaining in Greater Manchester.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife): May I also thank the Secretary of State for his courtesy in allowing me to see the documents and the statement in advance?

Notwithstanding the Secretary of State's skill in presentation and the very welcome qualitative changes that he has announced, does he accept that today's statement will cause great dismay and disappointment to those whose units are to be disbanded? Does he accept also that, regardless of how it is described, the Territorial Army is to be reduced by a third or, at best—according to the Secretary of State's figures—by 25 per cent? Some 25 per cent. of TA drill halls will be sold to developers. With a reduction of that kind, is it not inevitable that the TA's ability to reinforce Regular Army infantry and yeomanry units will be reduced substantially?

Will there not be an erosion of the unique links between the community and the armed services that the TA provides? Will not these announcements reduce the ability of the Territorial Army to give support to the civilian community in time of emergency? Finally, how many of the senior TA officers who threatened to resign because of their anxiety about the inadequacy of the consultation process does the Secretary of State think will endorse his proposals without qualification?

Mr. Robertson: We are speaking about one British Army. The Territorial Army is a component of that, but the country must properly look at the whole of the British Army. General Sir Roger Wheeler, the Chief of the General Staff, is the head of the entire Army. In the strategic defence review we examined the global issue. The consequences of the defence review are also being announced today.

I am uncertain how many of the TA colonels will endorse or live with all the proposals, but at every stage they have been properly consulted and talked to. I anticipate that the British Army will recognise, as it always has in the past, that ultimately it is for Ministers of the Crown to make the decisions.

I made these decisions on the basis of a military judgment given to me by the Chief of the General Staff and the Army Board. At the press conference before we came to the House today, I made it clear, along with the Chief of the General Staff and the Director of Reserve Forces and Cadets, that we were as one with respect to the proposed shape of the Territorial Army.

Morale in the Territorial Army will not be eroded, because the TA is being strengthened. Its role is being refreshed. It is being given greater utility and usability. In the future, it will have the right training and equipment to be in the right place at the right time. The thousands of people across the country who give their time and effort diligently in the interests of the country will recognise that this is the way forward, as part of one Army.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (City of York): I warmly welcome the decision to increase the Army medical service personnel by 2,000. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that will have a considerable impact in correcting the problems that we inherited from the previous Government, who cut the armed forces medical services in all three services?

I particularly welcome my right hon. Friend's decision to move the headquarters of the TA armed forces medical services to my constituency, York, and to move the field training centre for the armed forces medical services close to York, to Strensall.

Mr. Robertson: I thank my hon. Friend for his commendation. I know that he has had differences of opinion with me in the past, but we have made a conscious decision to locate the headquarters of the medical services in York. With the relocation of the Defence Vetting Agency to York, he can be proud of the job that he has done—the representations that he has made—on behalf of his constituents, who can be proud of him.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): Is the Secretary of State aware that, behind all the glitz of the new Labour modern speak, the cuts that he announced today are old-fashioned cuts in the Territorial Army across the land? Is he further aware that, in striking down the 10th Battalion Parachute Regiment, he is losing to the reserve forces a dedicated team of able, relevant and well-recruited volunteers whom I had the privilege of joining last weekend on exercise? Why axe them down, when the other component of the joint rapid deployment force—3 Commando Brigade Royal Marines—is to double the number of reserves that it recruits, while the paras are to be cut from 900 to 330? These are old-fashioned Labour cuts.

Mr. Robertson: I do not think that that is a fair representation, as the hon. Gentleman, who is usually fair, will recognise. A large number of defence jobs are located in his constituency. We have looked carefully at the role of the Parachute Regiment, in its regular configuration and in its Territorial Army configuration. I am satisfied that we will have an adequate number of people to perform the role that that regiment fulfils with great distinction in the Army.

Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the TA unit in my constituency at Greenhithe is one of those scheduled for closure. He will also be aware that that unit carries out an extremely important bomb disposal function for the area. Can he assure me and the members of my unit that that expertise and valuable function will not be lost, but will be moved to other units?

Mr. Robertson: I do not want to lose any expertise or function that is carried out by the TA where it is relevant to today's forces. My hon. Friend may well be disappointed at one aspect of this general review, but I hope that he will recognise that, in the part of the world that he represents, the TA's general footprint will still be there and that the TA will still do a good job on behalf of the nation.

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, when proposals were made to me for reducing the size of the TA at the end of the cold war, when there was obvious justification for making some reductions, I judged the figure of 60,000 or thereabouts to be the minimum at which the TA could be sustained and its national presence and role maintained? The right hon. Gentleman will, therefore, understand why I believe that his announcement is profoundly unwise. It is based on a judgment of the world as he sees it at this moment. The particularly serious aspect of this is that he is proposing not only these reductions, but the sale of drill halls, so that when it is evident, as it may be in the future, that the cuts were unwise, it will be extremely difficult to reverse them.

Mr. Robertson: The right hon. Gentleman, who occupied my job, made a judgment at that time about the size of the TA in the circumstances then prevailing. I have had to do exactly the same, and times do change. We have only to look at the events of the past seven days to begin to realise just how quickly we have to react in times of crisis, and how, increasingly, we will have to do so in the future.

I must also say to the right hon. Gentleman, quite gently, that my predecessor, Michael Portillo, chose to fund only 90 per cent. of the figure that the right hon. Gentleman is talking about because he believed that a figure lower than 60,000 was justifiable in the then circumstances. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman has listened to the words of Field Marshal Lord Vincent, which I have read out, because he served the right hon. Gentleman with distinction.

Times change, threats change, and we must reconfigure, not just the regular but the reserve forces, to be ready for the future. That is what we have done, that is the military judgment, and I stand by that.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye): As my right hon. Friend has paid great attention to the footprint argument, does he agree that East Sussex appears somewhat devoid of any footprint, save for one unit in Eastbourne? In particular, will he assure me that there will be some means by which civic occasions and other such functions can be serviced by some form of military presence, which is so well received by my constituents?

Mr. Robertson: I am sure that we can consider how civic occasions can be dealt with, because that is part of the footprint of the armed forces. My hon. Friend may well be disappointed at the closure of the Hastings centre, but we shall retain it as a centre for the cadet unit that uses it. Clearly, the cadets' future role will be important both in the life of Hastings and, I hope, in the wider community.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): I join others in thanking the Secretary of State for making the documents available at noon today. It is a courtesy that could be observed by other Departments. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman encourages that example.

Throughout the process, has not the argument been about the highest and the lowest bidder, and have we not reached some form of compromise? In the north of Scotland, we welcome the fact that two companies and eight platoons remain, although we would have much preferred to retain a battalion, but that is better than we had originally expected.

However, my constituents and I will be bitterly disappointed at the decision to remove RAF Squadrons 236 and 237 from Kinloss and Lossiemouth, as they are important engineering aspects of the TA and they have given huge and invaluable service to the community in civilian disasters, such as the floods that we had last year.

Those squadrons have been based at RAF Kinloss and RAF Lossiemouth at no expense whatever, and I believe that the decision should be reconsidered—perhaps there should be a combined squadron to serve the north of Scotland—because they are vital, given the geographic area that they are expected to cover.

Mr. Robertson: Far from hearing the apprehensions that have been expressed in some quarters about the TA in Scotland, I listened—very carefully, as the hon. Lady perhaps expected—to the voices that we heard in Scotland, including the strong and convincing voice of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, who is a personal and professional friend.

I can understand that, in the hon. Lady's constituency case—she is talking about a broader constituency, I presume—there will be disappointment at the closing of the two squadrons. The TA centre in Elgin will remain, however, and her constituency has been the beneficiary of a new RAF squadron coming into RAF Lossiemouth from Germany. That will boost the local economy and will increase the footprint of the armed forces in that area. I believe that we have the right shape for the reserve forces throughout Scotland, and they will serve Scotland well.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the criticism from the Select Committee on Defence was considered, unlike the rant from the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples), and one that we will explore further? Does he also agree that we welcome the restoration of the yeomanry nuclear, biological and chemical unit, which is fundamental to our response to the kind of terrorist incident that can take place? Will he reassure the House that his figure of 41,200 is real—unlike the notional figures of 59,000 and, going further back, 60,000, which were never funded by the previous Government—and the number that we intend to achieve?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend makes a good and valuable point. The figure that we have announced on the Territorial Army will be fully funded, which will be a change from figures that have been bandied about today and were bandied about by the previous Government. That will be well noted by the public.

I take my hon. Friend's point about the considered view of the Select Committee on Defence. I paid particular attention to what it said on TA numbers and on provisions for NBC protection, and I hope that the Committee—which will no doubt give this statement the scrutiny that it gives all other statements—will recognise that it made a valuable contribution to the consultation.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton): The Secretary of State intends to close the unit in Cobham—detachments of the Princess of Wales's Royal Regiment and of the cadet force—which is extremely bad news. First, is that closure taking place not for operational reasons, but simply because it is likely that that centre will be valuable on the property market? Secondly, had he noted the reply from the Prime Minister to me on 15 June about the activities of the civil contingencies committee, in which I anticipated the remarks of the Secretary of State for Scotland about the role that the TA could play in alleviating any of the problems arising from the millennium bug? Will he comment on that? What reply did he give to his colleague?

Mr. Robertson: I refute entirely the allegation that we have closed any of the centres on the basis of property value; indeed, if that had been the objective, an entirely different map would be before the House. We have looked carefully and in enormous detail at operational need in relation to the TA. That will have consequential results in respect of vacant property, which will feed into the defence budget and help to finance the global budget of the Department.

The hon. Gentleman makes a point about the problems that might be experienced at the millennium. That is a serious issue in which the Government take a particular interest, but the TA is an integral part of the armed forces and it would, if required, be available with the rest of the armed forces in any civil emergency, either actual or potential.

None of the changes that we have announced today will affect our ability to respond to any such request. We have shown that we intend to maintain a widespread TA presence throughout the UK to maintain the operational coherence of all our forces, and if there is a problem we shall be able to deal with it.

Ms Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West): I warmly welcome the commitment that my right hon. Friend and his ministerial team have shown in giving the TA a future and a significant operational role. I welcome their willingness to listen and consult, which is in marked contrast to the previous Government. I further welcome the retention of the Army cadet force in Dunfermline. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the majority of recruits to the regular armed forces come from the cadet force, not the TA? Does he also agree that a priority for this Government must be to make up the cut of one third that the previous Government made in the Regular Army by taking all possible action to encourage recruitment to the regular fores?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is right, and I thank her for her comments. Army recruitment is at its best level now since 1993—17 per cent. up on last year. It is an indication from those who would join the Army that they see a future in it because of the strategic defence review. I welcome my hon. Friend's comments about the cadet centre in Dunfermline. She is right to say that, although the cadet force is a youth movement and is not designed for recruitment, it gives young people in many parts of the country a flavour of the forces that will tempt them into a satisfying and high-quality career later in life. My hon. Friend has helped throughout this exercise, and I thank her for the energy and effort that she has put into it. By any standards, we have listened more to the outside world and the TA than any previous Government. I presume that, as a result, our proposals will get the support that they merit.

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): The proposals are open to all sorts of criticism, but in the case of my constituency they are ignorant. Page 75 of the so-called fact sheet places Shirley in Birmingham, whereas it is an important part of the borough of Solihull. I went to camp this summer with Army cadets from Shirley; I will see the air cadets on Thursday this week and the sea cadets on Friday. They will be devastated to know that the TA centre at Haslucks Green road will close completely. Will the Secretary of State write to me about where he proposes that those cadets should now parade?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces is willing to discuss that matter with the hon. Gentleman, because we have absolutely guaranteed that accommodation will be made available to replace existing cadet centres. I hope that he will tell the cadets that he mentioned—I dare say that they value the contact that they have with him—that we shall spend an extra £3 million on the cadets over the next four years because we believe in their value both to the community and to the armed forces. Their relocation will be a matter of consultation, in which the hon. Gentleman is welcome to be involved. I guarantee that suitable premises will be found.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): I acknowledge the Secretary of State's courtesy in sending me a letter and documentation before his statement, and I support his strategy for the new century. May I thank him and his Department for the decision to keep open the Queensferry centre? The whole of Deeside will thank him for that, whether they be the voluntary services that use it or the soldiers themselves. May I also acknowledge my right hon. Friend's decision to keep the Royal Welch Fusiliers' 3rd Battalion of the Territorial Army at Wrexham? North Wales recruits strongly for the Royal Welch Fusiliers, and people throughout north Wales will thank the Secretary of State for listening.

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for recognising that the decision that we took was right and proper in the circumstances. The TA is a good area for recruitment into the regular forces. That was one of the factors that we took into account in the reconfiguration of the TA. Overall, the package that we have put together satisfies the operational requirements of the Army, and is endorsed by the Chief of the General Staff and the Army Board. It will be recognised by the country as a suitable future for the whole of the TA.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): I declare an interest as the squadron leader of the Warwickshire and Worcestershire Yeomanry, although I see from these proposals that I shall not hold that appointment for much longer. What measures will the Secretary of State take to ensure that, in future, there is a sufficient number of senior TA officers at the top of the chain of command who are capable of giving advice to Ministers, so that such a stitch-up will not take place in the future?

Mr. Robertson: I am sure that we shall be able to attract the right quality of officers and other personnel into the Territorial Army, and that that will be easier to achieve at all levels now that the TA can look forward to a more usable and relevant role.

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham): It was a great relief to read the report, because I fully expected the centre in Durham to be closed. It was unthinkable that there would be no infantry presence in Durham in the near future. I thank the Secretary of State for that and for the fact that the Burma Band and Bugles of the Light Infantry will be retained. That is very important, because it would have been a terrible loss to Durham county if such a magnificent group of musicians had been disbanded.

I did not understand what my right hon. Friend meant when he referred to the names of the new battalions. He seemed to say that they could pick their own names. Will the battalion that will be based at the new headquarters in Durham be able to take the title of 7 Light Infantry, as it has been known through history?

Mr. Robertson: I thank my hon. Friend for his welcome for the proposals. I hope that it will be noticed that the pain and the pleasure are evenly shared in the House, both geographically and politically. We have sought to achieve a sensible balance that is consistent with the operational objectives of the strategic defence review.

The new regiments are described by their geographic titles, but it will be within their power to make recommendations to us about what they want their names to be. That is a sensible way of going about it, rather than commanding from the centre what the new titles should be.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): The United States Chief of the General Staff recently said that he needed all his reserves, which are larger than the Regular Army. Will the Secretary of State confirm that the cuts fall most heavily on those elements of the Territorial Army that cannot be found from civilian life, especially the infantry and yeomanry, for which there is no civilian equivalent and which would take the longest to rebuild? Will he also confirm that, although the 15 remaining infantry battalions may be allowed to recruit to their new establishments, those establishments are configured in such a way that they could not be deployed as a formed unit within any reasonable time scale? Will he confirm that the largest cut in the infantry falls on the paras, who are the most ready for war?

Mr. Robertson: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was going to forget his main point, but he rescued himself at the last minute. The hon. Gentleman has a good track record on, and a great interest in, the reserve forces. I have responsibility for all the armed forces, and for ensuring that they are ready for day-to-day operations, in which our country is engaged much more than even the American forces. It is not possible to make easy comparisons between what the reserves do in the United States of America and what our reserve forces are expected to do.

Our reserves must be much more usable, at a much higher level of readiness and trained to a much higher level of skill than the reserve forces of the United States of America. As we have seen in Kosovo, Iraq and a number of other places, we have a larger proportion of our forces engaged in day-to-day operations than the United States and practically every other country. That is why we want to make our Territorial Army much more usable and relevant.

We have considered the position of the Parachute Regiment with enormous care. The regiment has a very effective outside lobby, including a number of close friends of mine, and the decision was not made lightly. I have to balance the judgment of those outside, and those who happen to be involved in the interests of particular regiments, with the general advice that I receive and the decisions that I, as Secretary of State, must make on behalf of all our armed forces and of the country. I believe that my judgment, and the judgment of my military advisers, is right.

Mr. Martin Linton (Battersea): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his statement and, in particular, on his wise decision to site the headquarters of the London Battalion in Battersea, along with four companies of the London Regiment and two of the Royal Green Jackets. May I urge him to draw attention to the record of the London Regiment, a TA regiment that is rooted in its community and reflects its ethnic composition, with 15 per cent. of members drawn from ethnic minorities in the headquarters company in Battersea and 20 per cent. in the company in Balham, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox)?

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's words of welcome. I think that he and others will recognise that we have done the right thing in London and elsewhere. He is right to say that we have taken account of a variety of factors, including the ability to recruit from parts of the community with which we may not have had such success in the past.

I hope that it will be noticed that we have included three additional infantry companies in the London plan. One will be from the Royal Green Jackets, one from the London Scottish Regiment and one from the London Irish Regiment. I think that that will prove to be a popular decision.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): Can the Secretary of State confirm that there will be only one TA battalion in Wales, not two as at present? His document refers only to a Wales battalion. Will he also confirm that nine of the 31 TA centres in Wales are being closed? That does not reflect his claim that four out of five centres would remain in Wales; two out of three will remain—not the average relating to the United Kingdom as a whole. The recruiting record in Wales is outstanding, but I believe that the Secretary of State's proposals will seriously diminish it.

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman, normally a very fair individual, is wrong in this instance. Of all the parts of the country, Wales is doing best in terms of the numbers retained. It currently has a strength of 2,982, and its proposed establishment is 2,547. Whereas the national average is 76 per cent. of the previous average, in Wales the figure is 85 per cent. Wales has done extremely well out of the restructuring.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Territorial Army had an important role to play in Northampton in rescuing people when more than 2,000 homes were flooded at Easter? Its lifesaving work has not been publicly recognised. I assure my right hon. Friend that his decision to keep the TA centre in Northampton will be warmly welcomed by a town that understands the important role that the TA has to play in crises not just abroad, but at home.

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I, too, pay tribute to the valuable social role undertaken by many units of the TA. I hope that, by restructuring and revitalising it and boosting its morale, I am giving those units collectively a pat on the back.

At the beginning of my statement, I made the critical point that the reduction in actual numbers is only fractionally more than the natural wastage in the TA in one year. Far from attacking the TA, as some irresponsible people have suggested, we are strengthening its role. Those who have praised and admired its work, as my hon. Friend has in the past, will have even more cause to do so in the future.

Mr. David Faber (Westbury): I, too, welcome the personalised letter that all hon. Members have received from the Secretary of State. Does he not think that mine would have been of a little more use if it had been honest enough to acknowledge the fact that the Territorial Army centre in Trowbridge, the county town of Wiltshire, was to close? My constituents will be confused about why no mention of the centre has been made in my letter, although, according to the document that has been produced, it is scheduled to close?

Does the Secretary of State not understand the devastating effect that that will have on a rural community such as west Wiltshire? The centre provides a focal point for the local community, for young people, for training young people in many of the arts, such as leadership, and for maintaining a serious career, which is good for the whole community, not just for the young people who try to join the TA.

Mr. Robertson: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's thanks for the fact that he received the letter. The detail about which he talks is in the document. The letter alerted him to the fact that it would be in the Vote Office, so the information was there.

We have tried to do our best. Few Departments and, indeed, few previous Governments have gone to the trouble of giving hon. Members information in advance of statements. I am sorry that that information, however the hon. Gentleman got it, is bad for him in terms of the specific constituency, but I assure him that we have ensured that the overall TA footprint is still there in Wiltshire, and that there are still relevant centres close by, which will give people who wish to volunteer the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Army in Lancaster will face the future positively and loyally, even in the face of decisions that have reduced the headquarters of a battalion to the status of a company, which is largely based in Barrow—the battalion being based in Preston? Does he understand that the Member of Parliament for Lancaster and Wyre is more demoralised than it may be, and that I require a written explanation and rational justification for the changes that have taken place, which will not only say why those decisions have taken place, but give a real commitment to the Army in Lancaster? Can that justification be phrased rather better than the warm words and pats on the head that I have so far received in response to speeches in the House and many letters to the Ministry of Defence?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is a decent and fair person and makes a point on behalf of his constituency. He may wish to express that here today, but it is impossible to restructure, to reorganise and to modernise the Territorial Army if there is not going to be a single casualty affecting some constituency. I assure him that there will still be opportunities in Lancashire and near Lancaster for people to volunteer and to serve their country through the Territorial Army.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine): In disbanding the company in Laurencekirk, will he confirm that, should volunteers from Laurencekirk wish to continue to make a commitment to the Territorial Army, they will be able to do so in neighbouring companies? Will he confirm what the Minister for the Armed Forces said at a meeting: if we find that there are practical consequences for the cadet force that were not foreseen in the statement, he will listen to representations?

Mr. Robertson: We are always willing to listen. The answer to the first question—can people who are being moved seek places in neighbouring countries?—[Interruption.] Neighbouring companies, not neighbouring countries. Norway is probably closer than England to Laurencekirk, but those people will be able to find a role in neighbouring companies. We shall be willing at every stage to consider constructive criticism of and suggestions about the plan, and indeed about the strategic defence review. The situation is not static, as the threat is not static and the unexpected can always happen. We have to be able to evolve our regular and reserve forces in a manner that serves the country best, which is why we shall keep it all constantly under review.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): My right hon. Friend's proposals will receive a warm welcome in the hillsides and vales of Wales. The news of the retention of two viable battalions there to play a crucial new role in fulfilling the modern role of our armed forces will be very welcome. Is he aware that, last Friday, in Edinburgh, General Wesley Clark, NATO Supreme Allied Commander, described the strategic defence review as a remarkable achievement that should be used as a model for all other NATO countries? Today's proposals are an integral part of that review.

Mr. Robertson: I do not know whether I should be more flattered by the fact that the reform will be welcomed in the vales and valleys of Wales or by General Wesley Clark's commendation of them last week at the North Atlantic Assembly. I am looking not for plaudits or commendations, but to do what is right for the United Kingdom and for the armed forces, who serve us all.

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): As the Secretary of State's hon. Friends have failed to do so, may I thank him for coming to Edinburgh to the annual meeting of the North Atlantic Assembly, at considerable inconvenience for himself, having to fly from Ypres and meeting so many of our European friends, the delegates at that conference? However, may I also remind him that Mr. Solana, the NATO Secretary-General, in addressing the conference, not only reinforced his comments on the training of reservists having to be at the highest standards but said that ever more nations would have to rely on reservists if they were to be able to meet some of NATO's modern requirements and the surprise aspects of what NATO troops might have to do in the future? Today's statement seems to run entirely contrary to that advice.

Mr. Robertson: No, it does not—exactly to the contrary. Secretary-General Solana was absolutely correct in saying that we will have to rely more on our reservists, and we shall do so. We are therefore modernising and restructuring the Territorial Army, so that we can use its members, and more of them, more often in the future. I think that Secretary-General Solana—who has himself praised our defence review and commended it to other NATO countries—would recognise that the United Kingdom, more than most countries, has made our forces more relevant to the type of problems that NATO will face in the future.

I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his warm words at the beginning of his remarks, and for the help that he gave me at the reception in the old Parliament building, at Edinburgh, in meeting so many delegations that had come to my native land to hear the debate in the North Atlantic Assembly and to enjoy Scotland's hospitality and scenery.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): The Secretary of State is surely aware that, from the Haldane principles of 1908 onwards, the Territorial Army has had a particular political structure because it has required political protection. Why has he therefore not taken any notice of the recommendation in paragraph 277 of the Defence Committee's report, which would at least have led to a Territorial Army of 50,000—a figure that the central staffs in the Ministry of Defence tried to slide past Sir Malcolm Rifkind when he was Defence Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) when he was Prime Minister? The tactic was rejected then because those politicians had a proper understanding of the role of the Territorial Army in the United Kingdom. Why has the Secretary of State failed in his duty to protect the country and the Territorial Army?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman, who was an adviser to the previous Government, has clearly changed his mind—or his view, with so many others, was ignored. The previous Government reduced the Territorial Army by 20,000 in the past 10 years. I shall therefore take no preaching or lessons from those who say that I should not accept military advice but who themselves went well beyond the figure that they now claim is the absolute bedrock.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): First, may I thank the Minister for the Armed Forces for the opportunity of consulting on the issue? The Secretary of State will be mindful of my comment that premier divisions will not be going for the top place in the division if they keep reserve forces at half strength. Some have kept their reserves at half strength because they do not have sufficient money—which I suspect is the reason for the current cuts in the armed forces. May I thank the Secretary of State for the fact that my own two units—in Sunnyside street and in Hydebank—have been retained? However, as the modern Army has to do a lot of policing, he will understand our regret that the Provost company in Kinnegar will be disbanded. Where will the sea cadet unit go when the centre in Newtonards is closed? Is it a matter of HMS Never Budge becoming HMS Scuttled?

Mr. Robertson: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's words. Northern Ireland has done very well as part of the review—for good reason, too, as its recruitment record has made a serious contribution to the Regular Army.

On housing for the sea cadet unit, I have made a pledge about ensuring that alternative accommodation is available for cadet forces. The hon. Gentleman is, of course, more than at liberty to come to the Ministry to discuss how best that can be done.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): Is it not ironic that the decimation of the Territorial Army has been announced so soon after Armistice day? Was not the Secretary of State's language redolent of that of a first world war general trying to justify colossal losses? Will the Secretary of State be remembered for what he has done to our volunteer forces today as a cut-price Douglas Haig of the 1990s?

Mr. Robertson: That is pathetic, and it is unworthy of a statement in the House. In 1987, the strength of the Territorial Army was 78,000; in 1996, it was 57,000. A Conservative Government were in power all that time.

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): Although I recognise that many hon. Members are disappointed with the Minister's statement, it would be unreasonable for me not to welcome his announcement that the Dunoon TA centre is to remain open, and to thank the Minister for his personal letter, in which he mentioned Dunoon. I am sure that the Secretary of State—who knows the town well—appreciates that it would have been very wrong to lose the last Argyll TA link with the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders.

Mr. Robertson: The decision was all to do with operational reasons and absolutely nothing to do with the fact that I went to school in that area and was a member of the Army cadets attached to the Territorial Army centre there. Just as there are winners and losers, the decision was taken on the basis of what is required to ensure that there is a reasonable footprint across the United Kingdom and that the Territorial Army continues to make a huge contribution in rural and urban areas alike.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): In the forward to the document, the Secretary of State said—quite understandably, given the increase in peacekeeping by the armed forces—that there will be a shift in emphasis to logisticians, among other things. Against that background, will he explain to the House why the Royal Logistics Corps TA is being cut by a massive 30 per cent? That does not seem to be consistent with the objectives that he sets himself in the document's forward. Will he take this opportunity also to make it quite clear that he does not in any way regard the TA as weekend warriors? Considering the huge numbers of TA soldiers who served in Bosnia, the Gulf and elsewhere, it would be very unfortunate if there were any scintilla of a suggestion that the House or the Secretary of State ever thought of the TA as weekend soldiers.

Mr. Robertson: I certainly do not have that view—indeed, I am trying to fight against it. However, I fear that repeated accusations may be one reason why we lose one third of the recruits to the Territorial Army in the first year. The whole thrust of the exercise that I am undertaking is to eliminate that image completely and to make sure that the Territorial Army is valued by and valuable to the country and to the regular forces. The hon. Gentleman is an honorary colonel of a Territorial Army unit and he has made several good suggestions which I have taken on board. I greatly value his advice. He asked a fair question about the cut in the Royal Logistics Corps. There have been reductions in numbers in some units because they support a larger deployment than is likely to occur. We have made operational decisions, and that happens to be one of them.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): The Secretary of State made a joking reference to Norway in response to the question from the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir R. Smith). Is he aware that the Norwegian army can field no fewer than 101,000 reserves to operational status within 72 hours and that Sweden has 450,000 army reserves, 48,000 of whom do up to 31 days' training a year? Is not the great weakness of his statement that it fatally fails to recognise the importance of numbers in reserves? It is surely a consequence of Treasury pressure. The Secretary of State spoke of footprints. The only footprints that I can discern are Treasury footprints—great big brown hob-nailed boots.

Mr. Robertson: Perhaps the Opposition could agree to one line on this issue. Those on the Front Bench say that I have been sold some sort of pass by the General Staff, and now the hon. Gentleman suggests that it is all due to the Treasury. The fact is that the Army needs the Territorial Army, which has to be revamped and modernised to make it useful.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Norway and Sweden. I repeat what I said in response to the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier): we are not comparing like with like. Countries such as ours that are able to contribute through their regular forces on deployment have different requirements of their reserves than countries that are unable to make the same overseas deployment. That is well worth bearing in mind.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Along with many Members on both sides of the House, I am most concerned about the future of the 3rd Battalion of the Royal Welch Fusiliers. I was relieved to hear what the Secretary of State said. Will he give an assurance that their role will be further enhanced so that, when necessary, they will be able to assist in emergencies such as the flooding incident at Llandudno and undertake other civil work, as they have in the past?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman repeats the point that we have kept the cap badge. That is important not just for the operational importance of the unit, but for morale in the unit and in Wales. The relevance of the armed forces and their role will be in accordance with the needs of the Army.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): Although there will be great sadness at the fact that the Somerset Light Infantry is to be extinguished after more than 300 years, there will also be relief at the fact that a Territorial Army presence will be maintained in the county. Can the Secretary of State reassure me that the very small infantry units—the 15 complements proposed for Somerset and Cornwall—will remain viable in the long term?

Mr. Robertson: The purpose of the exercise is to make sure that we have viable units for the future.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset): The Secretary of State said in his statement that we need a modern Territorial Army more fully integrated into our armed forces. The 4th Battalion of the Devonshire and Dorset Regiment TA works effectively with the 1st Battalion of the regulars. Perhaps the Secretary of State can explain why it will be more fully integrated if it is abolished and replaced by two companies of the South-West Battalion which will have no attachment to the Devonshire and Dorset Regiment.

Mr. Robertson: It is for the simple reason that the soldiers concerned will be at a higher level of readiness than they are trained for at present. They will be able to train on equipment to which they did not have access before; therefore, they will be more usable within the Territorial Army than the present configuration allows.

Mr. Martin Bell (Tatton): I wish to speak up for an unfashionable arm of the service. The Secretary of State will know from his visits to British soldiers on active service overseas and elsewhere that none are more heavily committed than the Royal Engineers, yet the engineering reserves are being cut from nine regiments to five, which seems hard to justify. My plea is SOS—save our sappers.

Mr. Robertson: The fact is that the five regiments that we will retain will be much better able to serve at higher levels of readiness in places such as Bosnia, where our reserve forces make such a big contribution. At present, we believe that the number of Royal Engineers units is designed to support a larger force than is likely to be deployed, even on NATO operations. That is why it is the operational judgment of the Army and Ministers that they should be reduced. However, I believe that the five remaining units will be much more useful and better motivated as a result of the change.

Mr. Andy King (Rugby and Kenilworth): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement. Like him, I spent my teenage years in the Army cadet force. They may not have helped me, but they were particularly enjoyable years.

I believe that the cadet forces are very productive in channelling the positive energies of young people, and I benefited greatly from my experience. I particularly welcome the £3 million extra that is to be put into the cadet force in the next four years. Will the Air Training Corps benefit from that money or is it exclusively for the Army cadet force?

I also spent a short time in the Territorial Army, and I am delighted that 89 Signal Squadron in Rugby is to remain. I was there just two weeks ago. Its members fit the bill very well. They are highly trained, highly competent and extremely capable individuals fulfilling a useful role in complementing our regular soldiers.

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his praise. He is right to mention the contribution made by the cadets. As 25 per cent. of the armed forces have experience in the cadets, perhaps we should try to discover how many right hon. and hon. Members have the same experience. Such was the variety available in Dunoon grammar school at the time I attended it that I was able to serve in the Air Training Corps as well. I am glad to tell my hon. Friend that it will also benefit from the extra resources that will be made available to the cadets, who are a very fine movement.

Recently, I went to see the cadets in Hamilton, and I was enormously impressed by what they do and by their spirit. I was also able to make a personal visit to a large detachment in Cheltenham at a school attended by a young cousin of mine. Again, the high morale of those involved was a joy to see.

Stakeholder Pension

4.58 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require persons to contribute to a personal retirement pension scheme administered by an approved welfare supplier; to make provision with respect to contributions into and payments out of such schemes; to establish arrangements for the strategic direction and monitoring of pensions; and for connected purposes.

Our country is scarred by two nations in retirement. There are, thank goodness, a growing proportion of pensioners who have an adequate—sometimes more than adequate—income to see them through their retirement. At the same time, millions of pensioners are poor—some of them very poor. The Government have already introduced a number of measures to target resources on that group. Labour Members are looking forward to additional measures before the next election to help the poorest pensioners.

The Bill would lay the foundations to ensure that all pensioners shared in the growing long-term prosperity of our country by implementing a universal compulsory pension. All those in work would be required to become members of a stakeholder pension scheme on their 20th birthday. As each year went by, successive generations of 20-year-olds would come into the scheme. This is not a short-term measure. Pensions reform, above all else, is a long-term business and concern of the country and the House.

The aim of the Bill is to offer a guarantee. In today's terms, it would offer twice what a pensioner gets from the national insurance retirement pension—a guarantee of 30 per cent. of average earnings for a single pensioner when they came to retire. The link with average earnings is the crucial aspect in guaranteeing that future generations share in the growing long-term prosperity of the country.

That guarantee of 30 per cent. of average earnings for a single pensioner would be made up of two parts: today's national insurance retirement pension and a funded pension scheme—the stakeholder pension. The funded stakeholder part would be sold by approved welfare suppliers. Many groups and individuals could become approved welfare suppliers. They could be sponsored by trade unions, by employers, by associations of employers or by the companies that already provide pensions, such as the Legal and General and the Prudential. The crucial aspect of an approved welfare supplier is that the scheme must be owned by the members. The sponsor must set up the approved welfare supplier at arm's length from the parent organisation.

Above all, the Bill would allow for graduated contributions for the flat-rate guarantee. The scheme would have the finance to bring in the poor and those who were not part of the labour market at any given time. The groups for which the House will have most sympathy, I believe, are the parents—usually mothers, but sometimes fathers—who are outside the labour market looking after children under five and those who are doing the crucial job of looking after the long-term sick and disabled. Through that form of financing, the scheme could become universal, although it would also be compulsory.

I should like to sketch out to the House the difference that the Bill would make to our country. A Bill on compulsory stakeholder pensions would offer the Government the single most important social security change available for the extension of social cohesion, something that is one of the major aims of Government policy. It would also open up a series of other welfare reforms. We are long past the time when any hon. Member thinks that there is a single, big bang reform that would implement the necessary changes. It would be possible to use a compulsory universal scheme as a basis for long-term care insurance, if the House and the Government wanted to move in that direction. Because risks would be pooled, there would also be the possibility of cheap life insurance, offering reformers the chance to move safely from current national insurance provision, such as widows' and what will shortly be widowers' benefits, to a form of cover associated with stakeholder pensions.

If we want better pensions, we need to put more money aside for them. We cannot have better pensions by paying less. Such a reform is a vital accompaniment to the pension guarantee that the Government have already offered—a means-tested income support guarantee that properly offers extra help to the poorest pensioners. Unless that is accompanied by a compulsory savings scheme, the guarantee will send out a clear message to many that they do not need to become members of pension schemes and do not need to bother to save, because, when they come to retire, taxpayers will bail them out.

Let me conclude by declaring how the Bill would change the welfare state fundamentally. It would offer the prospect of ending poverty, which is otherwise the outlook for millions of today's workers. It would offer a guaranteed income on which everybody could build by becoming a member of another pension scheme or having savings. People would know that those schemes would be paid in addition to the stakeholder pension, not withdrawn because of it. Through the delivery of approved welfare suppliers, it would offer a growth in civil society—those organisations that are greater than individuals or families, but less than Governments, states or nations. Above all, it would signal that, in this country, welfare reform is about more welfare, not less, but that more of that welfare will be provided outside the state, through mutual associations and companies, or organisations controlled by their members.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): It was a privilege to serve with the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) on the Social Security Select Committee. He knows how much I admire his work. We had many conversations, and were party to many more, on pension reform, notably during our Committee's visit to Chile to study one of the world's most revolutionary pension reforms—imposed, interestingly enough, by a dictator. We can safely say that Frank ain't no Pinochet.

The right hon. Gentleman has risen to greater things in government. I still serve on the Committee, which continues to grapple with the intractable problems of pension reform. The right hon. Gentleman is in the happy position of being an ex-Minister, something that can provide opportunities for even more creative thinking, untrammelled by the dreary tramlines of office, laid down by the Treasury, which dictate that, whichever way one may want to turn, the points always ensure that one ends up in the station marked "means testing".

The right hon. Gentleman is a revolutionary. Like so many revolutionaries of the intellectual rather than the bruising type, he has, sadly, been devoured by his own revolution. Perhaps it is in the nature of great moralists and idealists that they can pen an idea or a concept, but cannot steer it through the muddied byways of government to fruition.

What is the great idea of the right hon. Member for Birkenhead? It is that the state can impose moral behaviour, Victorian virtues and self-reliance on all or most of us. Not surprisingly, I, too, am attracted by this antidote to libertarianism. Sadly, government is a pursuit of dreams frustrated by practicalities, particularly politics. As the Chancellor no doubt made clear to the right hon. Gentleman, the Bill simply will not deliver Labour, or anyone else who proposes it, any popularity.

Why should I care if the right hon. Member for Birkenhead or Labour does what is right at the expense of popularity? After all, we Conservatives did it often enough—eventually with fatal results. I care because any reform must be sustainable through a 40-year gestation period. The proposal is undeliverable in this sad world of spin doctors, opinion polls and elections because, with the decline in yields from gilts and the rise in annuity costs—I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight), who knows about such things and works in the City, for his help with this part of my speech—a contribution rate of 12 per cent. of everybody's salary would be required to create an effective retirement pension of the type proposed. That means a massive rise in taxation.

We would still be left with the desperate problems of those who, through disability, unemployment, bad luck or lack of effort were incapable of sustaining such contributions. As the Minister of State, Department of Social Security said off the record, "Why should people on low incomes have help in funding their pensions when their incomes might be much higher later?" Not surprisingly, the right hon. Member for Birkenhead crashed into the No. 10 buffers with his ideas. The great game of No. 10 is not the creation of a new Jerusalem but the return, at the next election, of new Labour. A massive hike in taxation is not part of that scenario to No. 10.

All that is rather sad, because compulsion to save is probably the best way forward, but, I do not believe that it is politically deliverable. Although we respect the work that the right hon. Member for Birkenhead has done, he is being disingenuous if he claims that, having battled through the arguments during 14 months in government and having had finally to resign, his ideas are acceptable to the Government. I do not believe that they are.

We cannot, of course, go on as we are. We know—or, it is hinted at—that, as a way forward, a shoddy compromise is being imposed by the Treasury enforcer who is ensconced in Richmond house, the Minister for the Cabinet Office. That shoddy compromise has been carefully crafted to leave out in the cold the non-voting poor and to leave to their own devices the influential better-off. Meanwhile, the state pension will go on declining, eventually into a miserly 17 per cent. of average earnings by 2020. Means-testing, to the disgust of the right hon. Member for Birkenhead and, indeed, all of us, will increase. The poor, and even the not-so-poor on lower incomes, will have no incentive to save because any hard-won private pension contributions will simply deprive them of income support.

Perhaps we are trying to reinvent the wheel. Perhaps we should create a political consensus—if that is possible—to restore the earnings link to the state pension, funded through higher national insurance contributions, to provide a decent living for elderly people, and not make them rely increasingly on income support. Perhaps, indeed, my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), the former Social Security Secretary and present deputy leader of the Conservative party, was right: we must devise a long-term plan to privatise all pensions, building on the world-leading role of our private pensions industry.

I fear that such a radical solution must await the next Conservative Government; we shall not get it from this Government. Meanwhile, we should vote to flush out from those on the Government Benches and their supporters just how many hon. Members are prepared to follow the prophet down the path of pension righteousness and into the path of political peril.

European Parliamentary Elections Bill

5.26 pm

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It will not have escaped your notice that the final item of business for today before the Adjournment debate is:

"Consideration of any Lords Messages and Amendments that may be received".

In view of the fact that another place has just reaffirmed its earlier decision, have you had a request from the Leader of the House to make a brief business statement? If not, would you allow the right hon. Lady to make one?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): I have no information about any statement, but perhaps the Leader of the House would like to respond to that point of order.

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): I was not intending to make a statement, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but it may be helpful to the House if, further to that point of order, I inform the House that it has already been agreed through the usual channels that the European Parliamentary Elections Bill will be taken as first business tomorrow. I also note the Opposition's warm welcome for a process whereby hereditary peers interfere with elections.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Speaker shall not adjourn the House until any Messages from the Lords shall have been received.—[Mrs. Anne McGuire.]

Scrutiny of European Business

5.27 pm

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): I beg to move,

That this House approves the Seventh Report from the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons on the Scrutiny of European Business (HC 791) and takes note of the White Paper on the Scrutiny of European Business (Cm. 4095).

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): I understand that, with this, it will be convenient to discuss the following motions:

That the Resolution of the House of 24th October 1990 relating to European Community Legislation be rescinded and the following Resolution be made:

That,

(1) No Minister of the Crown should give agreement in the Council or in the European Council to any proposal for European Community legislation or for a common position or joint action under Title V or a joint position, joint action or convention under Title VI of the Treaty on European Union—

(a) which is still subject to scrutiny (that is, on which the European Scrutiny Committee has not completed its scrutiny) or

(b) which is awaiting consideration by the House (that is, which has been recommended by the European Scrutiny Committee for consideration pursuant to Standing Order No. 119 (European Standing Committees) but in respect of which the House has not come to a Resolution).

(2) In this Resolution, any reference to agreement to a proposal includes—

(a) agreement to a programme, plan or recommendation for European Community legislation;

(b) political agreement;

(c) in the case of a proposal on which the Council acts in accordance with the procedure referred to in Article 189b of the Treaty of Rome (co-decision), agreement to a common position, to a joint text, and to confirmation of the common position (with or without amendments proposed by the European Parliament); and

(d) in the case of a proposal on which the Council acts in accordance with the procedure referred to in Article 189c of the Treaty of Rome (co-operation), agreement to a common position.

(3) The Minister concerned may, however, give agreement—

(a) to a proposal which is still subject to scrutiny if he considers that it is confidential, routine or trivial or is substantially the same as a proposal on which scrutiny has been completed;

(b) to a proposal which is awaiting consideration by the House if the European Scrutiny Committee has indicated that agreement need not be withheld pending consideration.

(4) The Minister concerned may also give agreement to a proposal which is still subject to scrutiny or awaiting consideration by the House if he decides that for special reasons agreement should be given; but he should explain his reasons—

(a) in every such case, to the European Scrutiny Committee at the first opportunity after reaching his decision; and

(b) in the case of a proposal awaiting consideration by the House, to the House at the first opportunity after giving agreement.

(5) In relation to any proposal which requires adoption by unanimity, abstention shall, for the purposes of paragraph (4), be treated as giving agreement.

That, upon the entering into force of the Treaty of Amsterdam, the Resolution on Scrutiny of European Business (No. 2) shall have effect with the following modifications:

In paragraph (1) the words "a common position or joint action under Title V or a joint position, joint action or convention under Title VI of the Treaty on European Union" are replaced by the words "a common strategy, joint action or common position under Title V or a common position, framework decision, decision or convention under Title VI of the Treaty on European Union"; and in paragraph (2)(c) the words "a common position, to a joint text, and to confirmation of the common position (with or without amendments proposed by the European Parliament)" are replaced by the words "a common position, to an act in the form of a common position incorporating amendments proposed by the European Parliament, and to a joint text".

That, with effect from the beginning of the next Session, Standing Order No. 119 (European Standing Committees) be replaced by the following Standing Order (European Standing Committees):

".—(1) There shall be three standing committees, called European Standing Committees, to which shall stand referred for consideration on motion, unless the House otherwise orders, such European Union documents as defined in Standing Order No. 143 (European Scrutiny Committee) as may be recommended by the European Scrutiny Committee for further consideration.

(2) If a motion that specified European Union documents as aforesaid shall not stand referred to a European Standing Committee is made by a Minister of the Crown at the commencement of public business, the question thereon shall be put forthwith.

(3) Each European Standing Committee shall consist of thirteen Members nominated for the duration of a Parliament by the Committee of Selection; and in nominating such Members, the Committee of Selection shall—

(a) have regard to the qualifications of the Members nominated and to the composition of the House; and

(b) have power to discharge Members from time to time, and to appoint others in substitution.

(4) The quorum of a European Standing Committee shall be three, excluding the chairman.

(5) Any Member, though not nominated to a European Standing Committee, may take part in the committee's proceedings and may move amendments to any motion made as provided in paragraphs (7) and (8) below, but such Member shall not make any motion, vote or be counted in the quorum; provided that a Minister of the Crown who is a Member of this House but not nominated to the committee may make a motion as provided in paragraphs (7) and (8) below; and the Government may appoint the precedence of notices of motion to be considered in each committee.

(6) The European Standing Committees, and the principal subject matter of the European Union documents to be referred to each, shall be as set out below; and in making recommendations for further consideration, the European Scrutiny Committee shall specify the committee to which in its opinion the documents ought to be referred; and subject to paragraph (2) of this order, the documents shall be referred to that committee accordingly

European Standing Committees	Principal subject matter
	Matters within the responsibility of the following Departments:
A	Agriculture, Fisheries and Food; Environment, Transport and the Regions; Forestry Commission; (and analogous responsibilities of Scottish, Welsh and Northern Ireland Offices)
B	HM Treasury (including HM Customs and Excise); Social Security; Foreign and Commonwealth Office; International Development; Home Office; Lord Chancellor's Department; together with any matters not otherwise allocated by this Order
C	Trade and Industry; Employment and Education; Culture, Media and Sport; Health

(7) The chairman may permit Ministers of the Crown to make statements and to answer questions thereon put by Members, in respect of each motion relative to a European Union document or documents referred to a European Standing Committee of which a Minister shall have given notice; but no question shall be taken after the expiry of a period of one hour from the commencement of the first such statement:

Provided that the chairman may, if he sees fit, allow questions to be taken for a further period of not more than half an hour after the expiry of that period.

(8) Following the conclusion of the proceedings under the previous paragraph, the motion referred to therein may be made, to which amendments may be moved; and, if proceedings thereon have not been previously concluded, the chairman shall interrupt the consideration of such motion and amendments when the committee shall have sat for a period of two and a half hours, and shall then put forthwith successively:

(a) the question on any amendment already proposed from the chair; and

(b) the main question (or the main question, as amended).

The chairman shall thereupon report to the House any resolution to which the committee has come, or that it has come to no resolution, without any further question being put.

(9) If any motion is made in the House in relation to any European Union document in respect of which a report has been made to the House in accordance with paragraph (8) of this order, the Speaker shall forthwith put successively—

(a) the question on any amendment selected by her which may be moved;

(b) the main question (or the main question, as amended);

and proceedings in pursuance of this paragraph, though opposed, may be decided after the expiration of the time for opposed business.

(10) With the modifications provided in this order, the following Standing Orders shall apply to European Standing Committees:

No. 85 (Chairmen of standing committees);

No. 88 (Meetings of standing committees); and

No. 89 (Procedure in standing committees)."

That Standing Order No. 143 (Select Committee on European Legislation) be replaced by the following Standing Order (European Scrutiny Committee):

(1) There shall be a select committee, to be called the European Scrutiny Committee, to examine European Union documents and—

(a) to report its opinion on the legal and political importance of each such document and, where it considers appropriate, to report also on the reasons for its opinion and on any matters of principle, policy or law which may be affected;

(b) to make recommendations for the further consideration of any such document pursuant to Standing Order No. 119 (European Standing Committees); and

(c) to consider any issue arising upon any such document or group of documents, or related matters.

The expression 'European Union document' in this order and in Standing Orders No. 16 (Proceedings under an Act or on European Union documents), No. 89 (Procedure in standing committees) and No. 119 (European Standing Committees) means—

(i) any proposal under the Community Treaties for legislation by the Council or the Council acting jointly with the European Parliament;

(ii) any document which is published for submission to the European Council, the Council or the European Central Bank;

(iii) any proposal to define a common position or for joint action under Title V of the Treaty on European Union which is prepared for submission to the Council;

(iv) any proposal for a joint position, joint action or a convention under Title VI of the Treaty on European Union which is prepared for submission to the Council;

(v) any document (not falling within (ii), (iii) or (iv) above) which is published by one Union institution for or with a view to submission to another Union institution and which does not relate exclusively to consideration of any proposal for legislation;

(vi) any other document relating to European Union matters deposited in the House by a Minister of the Crown.

(2) The committee shall consist of sixteen Members.

(3) The committee and any sub-committee appointed by it shall have the assistance of the Counsel to the Speaker.

(4) The committee shall have power to appoint specialist advisers either to supply information which is not readily available or to elucidate matters of complexity within the committee's order of reference.

(5) The committee shall have power to send for persons, papers and records, to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the House, to adjourn from place to place, and to report from time to time.

(6) The quorum of the committee shall be five.

(7) The committee shall have power to appoint sub-committees and to refer to such sub-committees any of the matters referred to the committee.

(8) Every such sub-committee shall have power to send for persons, papers and records, to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the House, to adjourn from place to place, and to report to the committee from time to time.

(9) The committee shall have power to report from time to time the minutes of evidence taken before such sub-committees.

(10) The quorum of every such sub-committee shall be two.

(11) The committee shall have power to seek from any committee specified in paragraph (14) of this order its opinion on any European Union document, and to require a reply to such a request within such time as it may specify.

(12) The committee or any sub-committee appointed by it shall have leave to meet concurrently with any committee specified in paragraph (14) of this order or with any committee of the Lords on the European Communities, or any sub-committee of that committee, for the purposes of deliberating or examining witnesses.

(13) The committee shall have power to communicate to any committee specified in paragraph (14) of this order its evidence or any other document relating to matters of common interest.

(14) The committees specified for the purposes of this order are those appointed under Standing Order No. 152 (Select committees related to government departments) including any sub-committees of such committees, the Select Committee on Public Administration, the Committee of Public Accounts, and the Environmental Audit Committee.

(15) Unless the House otherwise orders, each member nominated to the committee shall continue to be a Member of it for the remainder of the Parliament.

That the following consequential Amendments to Standing Orders be made:

In Standing Order No. 16 (Proceedings under an Act or on European Community Documents), line 3, leave out "Community documents" and insert "Union documents (as defined in Standing Order No. 143 (European Scrutiny Committee))".

In Standing Order No. 89 (Procedure in Standing Committees), line 18, leave out "Community" and insert "Union".

Mrs. Beckett: Our place in Europe is of vital importance and relevance to all of us. Equally, decisions taken in Brussels have an impact on all of us. That is why proper parliamentary oversight of the range of issues negotiated in Brussels and elsewhere is essential to protect our interests and, equally important, to bring Europe closer to the people. However, if we are to achieve those objectives, Parliament needs to be promptly and fully informed both of proposed European Union legislation and policies and of the Government's approach to negotiations.

That is why the Government undertook, in their election manifesto, to overhaul the parliamentary process for scrutinising European legislation. Our aims were to strengthen the role of Parliament in relation to European Union business; to improve democratic oversight of new legislation under negotiation in the EU; and to increase transparency and parliamentary awareness of how European Union business is conducted. We have explored a number of options for change and, last week, published a White Paper setting out proposals for improving the scrutiny arrangements that govern how Parliament deals with European Union business.

Arrangements for the scrutiny of European business by Parliament have been in place since 1973. Under them, the Government make available to Parliament proposals for European legislation coming before the Council of Ministers, as well as other documents that may have important policy, legislative or financial implications. An accompanying explanatory memorandum describes the purpose of the document, and the Government's views on it.

In this House, the Select Committee on European Legislation—the Scrutiny Committee, chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood)—considers each document, and may recommend that documents of particular importance are debated in Standing Committee, or by the whole House. The cornerstone of the scrutiny process is the parliamentary scrutiny reserve—an undertaking by the Government not to agree to a measure in the Council of Ministers until Parliament has completed its consideration of the proposal, unless there are special reasons for doing so. Similar arrangements operate in the other place.

The present scrutiny arrangements—which covered European Community business originally—are generally regarded as having worked well and, consequently, the Government propose today to build on that process and to make use of the experience of the arrangements that we have acquired. Although the arrangements for scrutiny have been updated periodically, they have not kept pace with developments in the EU. For example, the arrangements do not currently provide Parliament with the opportunity to comment on the full range of EU business. The common foreign and security policy, and justice and home affairs are not covered by existing procedures.

The Scrutiny Committee reported comprehensively on the scrutiny arrangements in July 1996, and made a wide range of recommendations. The Select Committee on Procedure endorsed those findings in March 1997. The Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons also considered the scrutiny arrangements as part of its wider remit to consider how the practices and procedures of the House should be modernised. In January this year, the Government submitted a memorandum to the Committee, outlining the key elements of a modern scrutiny system. The Modernisation Committee made its recommendations to improve scrutiny in June this year. The Government's White Paper sets out our proposals for meeting the recommendations.

Under the new arrangements, the Government would inform Parliament about proposals for European legislation and other important documents covering all three areas of EU activity. As before, the Scrutiny Committee would be able to examine the documents in detail on the basis of an explanatory memorandum, which would be supplemented by any further information that the Scrutiny Committee requested. The House would be able to debate any document it considered particularly important—normally in one of the European Standing Committees, although there would be flexibility for documents to be debated on the Floor of the House.

The new arrangements would allow more scope for specialist Select Committees of the House to be more closely involved in the scrutiny process—for example, where the measures under scrutiny fall within their area of expertise. The Scrutiny Committee would also be able to seek the views of departmental Select Committees on individual measures.

The scrutiny reserve would now cover not only European Community legislation but pre-legislative documents, and would be extended to cover business under the common foreign and security policy, and in the field of justice and home affairs. Obviously, the Government would continue to be able, in exceptional circumstances, to agree a measure before parliamentary scrutiny was completed.

Under the new arrangements, the Government would inform the Scrutiny Committee before a formal Council of Ministers of business expected to be on the agenda, and would provide additional evidence requested on particular items. Following the Council, the Government would provide Parliament with a written report on the outcome of the meeting. The Government will continue to make time available on the Floor of the House of Commons to debate European business before each European Council.

I turn now to the practical changes—the amendments needed to the Standing Orders and to the scrutiny reserve resolution to effect the new arrangements. The changes that we are proposing to both the scrutiny resolution and the Standing Orders follow in all but one respect the recommendations of the Modernisation Committee. The Committee recommended that the number of European Standing Committees be increased from two to five. The Committee recognised that there were practical problems involved in that, and suggested that the number of members of each Committee should be reduced from 13. After discussions through the usual channels, the best solution seems to be to keep the membership at 13, but to have only three Committees.

The proposed Standing Order change shows how the subject areas of EU documents would be divided between the three Committees. The new scrutiny resolution is set out in full, as are the two main Standing Orders affected by the implementation of the report. The new Standing Order No. 119, on European Standing Committees, will come into effect at the start of the next Session. Members will then be nominated to the three Standing Committees. The new Standing Order No. 143, on the European Scrutiny Committee, will take immediate effect.

There is also a motion on the Order Paper to appoint the current members of the Select Committee on European Legislation to the new Scrutiny Committee. There are a number of consequential amendments to other Standing Orders, mainly providing for communication between the European Scrutiny Committee and other Select Committees. The wording of the scrutiny resolution and of the Standing Orders will need to be altered slightly when the treaty of Amsterdam comes into force next year. As the changes are textual rather than substantial, the motions before the House tonight provide for those changes to be made at the appropriate time.

Before concluding, I wish to mention the effect of devolution on the arrangements. We presume that, in due course, the devolved bodies will wish to scrutinise EU business. We will be putting in place arrangements to facilitate that and to receive their comments.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): My right hon. Friend—who has been sympathetic to this view—will be aware that we desperately need a change of culture in the House if we are to have proper scrutiny of the European Parliament. Many hon. Members are quite terrified of Europe, have never been there and have never even used their one free trip per year. I see from the report that the Select Committee has suggested that the one trip a year paid for by the House is not enough. Could we have more access in the next Session so that we can have that culture change, and so that people are not terrified and can learn about how European institutions work?

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend—with a number of others—takes seriously the issue of how the House can better scrutinise European Union business, and strongly argues that a freer interchange between the House and the European institutions will facilitate that process. He will know that we are bound by the travel budget, but we are considering whether there is room for greater flexibility to facilitate the kind of exchange that he and others have in mind.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the speed with which the relevant documents can be provided to the Committees is important in making them more effective. There is no point in having an elaborate Committee system if documents arrive five or 10 hours before they are to be debated. Frankly, there are some of us who not only know where Brussels is, but worked there when we were not politicians, and have been known to speak one or two odd foreign languages—no odder than our English, I have to say. Will my right hon. Friend bear it in mind that we want to see what is being debated in time for the House to be fully informed? Otherwise, a lot of the proposals will not be useful.

Mrs. Beckett: I take my hon. Friend's point, and she is quite correct. The Government are mindful of the difficulties and problems caused to the House—and, indeed, to the Government—by the late arrival of documents. I am also well aware that my hon. Friend is in a happy position; what is very often the reason for such a delay—the difficulty in obtaining translations—is less likely to worry her, as, if I recall correctly, she speaks about seven languages, and is fluent, discursive and, frequently, more than effective as a parliamentarian in all of them.

The Government are mindful of the problems that will be caused to the scrutiny process if documents are not readily available, and we are doing all we can. My hon. Friend will know that the European Scrutiny Committee was instrumental in making proposals, which have been taken up across Europe, on the timing and handling of documents. We hope that technological developments will make the transmission of information easier. She is entirely right to say that that is the key to the working of the arrangements.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I was paying attention to what the right hon. Lady said about the possibility that the devolved Parliaments might want to scrutinise various matters. Scrutiny of fisheries legislation, which is contentious and would rank highly enough to be discussed in both Parliaments, might result in two different Parliaments reaching different conclusions. My request is merely for information. Does the right hon. Lady have any idea how we would overcome the problem of the Scottish Parliament and the Westminster Parliament coming to entirely different conclusions on the same matter? How would we proceed?

Mrs. Beckett: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's concern. We must explore the procedures and how they can interact between a fresh Assembly, or Parliament in Scotland, and this place. The hon. Gentleman knows where the responsibility for those matters lies.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): There are already arguments that a Minister from a devolved Scottish Parliament could be a lead Minister in negotiations and discussions. Does the right hon. Lady envisage the right of a Scottish Parliament not to implement a directive that this House considers fit to be implemented? That is the critical factor. How does the right hon. Lady envisage negotiations taking place to bring the Parliaments to a conclusion on those matters?

Mrs. Beckett: I have some respect for the hon. Lady. Perhaps I misunderstood her question. No doubt we shall explore that issue at length in future. I almost get the impression—I say this with respect—that she is thinking that the Scottish National party might want not only to sever the Union with England, but to leave the European Union. That seems to me to be the purport of her saying that the Scottish Parliament might refuse to implement directives.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): The right hon. Lady will be aware that a great deal of the initial work on Community business is undertaken by officials from the United Kingdom and other member states' Governments attending management committees and similar structures as they develop ideas at a formative stage. Will she consider publishing lists of the committees that are sitting and stating the type of work that they are doing? One of Parliament's problems is acquiring knowledge of business early enough for us to be able to influence it by debate in the House.

Mrs. Beckett: I entirely understand the right hon. Gentleman's point. I am not sure that publishing lists of committees that are meeting is the right way in which to proceed, because that may result in a burdensome amount of information without being very illuminating.

The Government and the European Scrutiny Committee, as it will be, chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale, have drawn attention to the great importance of pre-legislative scrutiny and involvement at an early stage. Although that is an issue for the House, rather than the Government, and must be carefully considered on grounds of cost, I suspect that it was at the back of the minds of those who suggested a national Parliament office in Brussels. We shall all, over time, give more and more consideration to how it is possible for the House to be informed and to be able to have an input in the early days, when it is possible to have the greatest influence on the formation of proposals.

The Government believe that the new arrangements for the scrutiny of European Union matters which are before the House will allow Parliament to carry out a comprehensive, thorough and effective examination of the full range of business across all three pillars. The adoption of the new arrangements and the changes to Standing Orders will contribute to making the EU policy process and EU legislation more democratic, more transparent and better understood. That can only be a benefit to the House and the country.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): The Opposition support the general drift of the remarks of the Leader of the House. We were happy to agree to the unanimous report of the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons, and we accept the reasons that the right hon. Lady gave for amending one of those recommendations and saying that there should be three Committees rather than five. We are glad that those Committees will each have 13 members.

The whole House owes a debt to the hon. Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) and those who serve on his Committee. That work is largely unsung, but not unhonoured because the Select Committee performs an extremely important task. Many hon. Members are barely aware of the Committee's existence, but those of us who are aware are exceptionally grateful to him and his colleagues for their hard work.

If one wants an indication of the hard work that is necessary, one has only to go to the Vote Office, as I did earlier during the Division, where I picked up a list of European Community documents for the week ending Saturday 14 November. As most hon. Members will know, a similar list is produced every week. The current list names 49 documents, ranging over issues as diverse and important as food law, landfill waste, air transport competition rules, sound financial management and renewable sources of energy. I shall not read the whole list. That reveals the sheer weight of paper that is coming in week by week, day by day.

It is crucial that Members of the House have the chance to have those documents examined on our behalf. I say "on our behalf" because we largely depend on those hon. Members who are appointed to the Select Committee and the European Standing Committees, and those who will serve on the three Committees that we shall, I hope, have after today's debate. It is vital that the Government honour their pledge and responsibility to make sure that important matters are not agreed to in Europe until the House has had an opportunity, via its Committees, to scrutinise the documents and, if necessary, to debate and vet them in detail.

We have to improve our relations with European institutions by scrutinising with greater care—that is no criticism of those who currently scrutinise these matters—the documents that emanate from the European Union. I do not say "from Europe" because, of course, we are in Europe. I was interested to hear that the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) does not live in Europe, but most of us think that we do.

Mr. Sheerman: Whether we disagree about being pro-Europe or anti-Europe—I am a passionate pro-European—the hon. Gentleman knows that I was referring to recommendation 39 in the report. It is strange that Britain has been a member of the European Union for a long time, but that hon. Members have one trip a year to a mainland European institution. I want the hon. Gentleman to join me in the campaign to make sure that we educate hon. Members so that they can go to Brussels and Strasbourg, and find their way around and have knowledge and perception of the culture. He will know, as do those of us who regularly go to those institutions, that we must do our homework, and if we do not travel to Europe to do so, we shall be unable to fulfil our function as Members of Parliament. Too many hon. Members do not even use their one trip a year. I get passionate about the matter because I want to educate my colleagues on both sides of the House.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I agree that it would be desirable if more of our colleagues had the opportunity to use that facility more often. We are in favour of greater flexibility in the use of the sums that are available. Of course, hon. Members are subject to no prohibition on visiting European institutions whenever they wish. I know that the hon. Gentleman is making a point about the trip that is paid for, and yes, we agree that it would be desirable that there should be greater flexibility, so that, for instance, those who adamantly do not wish to avail themselves of the facility may pass it on to others, and so that others who really want to make the trip may do so more often. I believe that all hon. Members should be able to use the facility, and I am personally in favour of extending it.

I understand why the Leader of the House is not with us any more—she courteously explained why she could not be here now—but I hope that, when the Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office winds up the debate, he will spell out more clearly the Government's attitude and say whether the Government are prepared to seek further means to enable hon. Members to visit European institutions more often.

I should also be grateful if the Parliamentary Secretary would say something about the national Parliament office. The Leader of the House mentioned it in passing, but she did not spell out the Government's response to the clear recommendation by the Modernisation Committee that there should be a national Parliament office, representing Westminster in Brussels. I should like to know precisely what the Government intend to do about that and what they envisage would be the participation in that national Parliament office of the devolved Parliament in Scotland and the devolved Assembly in Wales.

On that subject, it is my understanding—I hope that, if I am wrong, the Parliamentary Secretary will correct me—that the Scottish Parliament or the Welsh Assembly would have a specific role to play where responsibility was devolved, but that, where responsibility had not been devolved, it remained firmly and clearly with the House, so that Committees of the House would examine such subjects. I should be grateful for clarification.

To my mind, we need as much liaison and contact as possible if European institutions are to work and if enmity is not to be built up between the House and European institutions. Frequently, enmity is based on ignorance. The more people know and understand, the more they are able intelligently to debate.

Absurdities come from Brussels from time to time, and it is right that they should be denounced. It is important to ensure that the new Committees do not have sole and exclusive responsibility for debating European documents, and it is incumbent on Government to try to find more time in which those key issues may be debated on the Floor of the House. I know that hon. Members who are not voting members of Committees may attend the European Scrutiny Committees, but that is not quite the same as holding a debate in the Chamber.

I hope that, when the Leader of the House and her colleagues consider the next parliamentary Session, they will pay regard to the time that is allowed for European debates in the Chamber. It is important that such matters be debated. Moreover, given the changes that will occur within the European Union in the next few months, there will be greater and greater focus on those European institutions, and greater interest in debating what goes on there and what emanates from them. Perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary will say something about that.

Although the matter is not strictly relevant to the subject that we are discussing at the moment, I hope that hon. Members in all parts of the House will bear in mind the fact that there is an institution called the European Parliament, with which it is important that we seek to build better relations. Some years ago, I was one of those who voted against the Bill, supported by the present Baroness Thatcher, that provided for the holding of direct elections to the European Parliament. I did so because I wanted there to be a longer period in which delegated members went to that Parliament from this place; I wanted to maintain the connection between the Parliaments. I believe that that was a reasonable reason for rebelling against the Bill.

There is less contact between the European Parliament and this place than I would wish. I must not stray too far in that direction because it is not strictly relevant to the Modernisation Committee's report. I merely add that the report reveals the constructive attitude that what comes from Europe is relevant to what we do here—not more important than what we do here, but of real importance to what we do here—an attitude that I believe should be universally adopted.

In so far as the recommendations of the Modernisation Committee will enable us the better to examine and scrutinise, I welcome them. In so far as the Government's response to the report is positive, I welcome that, but I should be grateful if the Parliamentary Secretary would touch on the points that I have raised in my short speech.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): I thank my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House for publishing the White Paper and laying it before the House and congratulate him on doing so. I also thank the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, the right hon. Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery), for the work that he and the Committee have done on the subject. The hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) kindly made some pleasant comments about the work of the Select Committee on European Legislation, which are very much appreciated.

In my enthusiasm for this important exchange, I cannot escape a sense of foreboding, inasmuch as I feel that I am attending a funeral and a birth at the same time. Tonight, we are ending the life of the Select Committee on European Legislation and starting the life of its successor, the European Scrutiny Committee. I remember hearing, in my early years, that sometimes it was better to celebrate a funeral and mourn a birth, on the basis that "the newly born had all its trials and tribulations" to come, and that

"the end of a life ended the misery of living",

but I am sure that that is not the case in this regard. Nevertheless, the Committee that is about to pass on, which I have had the pleasure of chairing, has had its trials and tribulations over the years, and I very much look forward to the new life in the scrutiny process that will be engendered by the proposals.

If I may, I shall further burden the House with a short reflection on the work that has been done since the Committee's inception in 1973. As the hon. Member for South Staffordshire said, the Committee, in its 25-year life, has had one of the busiest agendas of any Select Committee. Its subject matter is not known for its sexiness, but, for the statisticians among us, the European Legislation Committee has dealt with about 35,000 directives and documents—almost four directives a day for the past 25 years.

Sadly, much of that work has not received the recognition that I humbly suggest that it might, and should, have received. Only in the past few years—and, more important, in the past 18 months, under the new Labour Government—has the Committee's work been properly appreciated. I make no complaint about that except to say that, just maybe, the great ignorance that exists—inside and outside this place—on European issues can in small measure be attributed to the lack of political will and/or understanding of the importance of our European Union membership.

The White Paper presented to us today by the Leader of the House marks a watershed in parliamentary procedures. It recognises the importance of scrutiny in our democracy. Paragraph 5 on page 2 of the White Paper states:

"the scrutiny arrangements have not kept pace with the need to ensure comprehensive Parliamentary oversight of developments in the EU and to make transparent and understandable the processes by which EU policy and legislation are made."

That is the issue that we are addressing today.

We have entered a new era of political and constitutional reform. In 18 months, the Government have passed legislation on the devolution of Scotland, Northern Ireland, Wales and London. We have held four referendums. This new era is about good, representative politics and the need for scrutiny within our parliamentary process. As we prepare to enter the next century, better, more effective scrutiny is very much part of that change.

I shall now comment briefly on specific issues in the report. These welcome proposals should be viewed not as the end of the modernisation process, but as the beginning of a modern model of scrutiny. At this juncture, I record my thanks and that of my Committee to the staff, past and present, who have served the European Legislation Committee over the years. Their task of examining, researching, briefing, investigating and reporting is a colossal responsibility which they have taken in their stride. The House owes them a great debt of gratitude, and I so record that this afternoon.

We are delighted that the paper includes most of the suggestions put to the Procedure Committee by the ELC. However, I shall offer one or two comments in order to, first, put down a marker for further consideration; and, secondly, reassure my colleagues on departmental Select Committees that the changes will serve and assist them in the special scrutiny of their Departments. It is not my Committee's intention to step into their areas of responsibility—on the contrary, most of what we do will complement and support their good work. There will be no turf wars.

The ELC did not deal with merit considerations, and the new European Scrutiny Committee will not do so in the future. Our interest in the second and third pillars will be to assess their legal and political significance and/or importance. In practice, the conduit for information will be both ways. That will improve the scrutiny of legislation and offer information support, if required, to our colleagues on other Select Committees.

Our proposal that the ESC should have the right to promote a "Floor debate" was recognised by the Government, but not accepted. The Government conceded that there was merit in our suggestion, but they have not agreed to it at this stage. That is regrettable, but I ask them to keep it in mind as we continue to learn from our experience.

The value of Standing Committee debate has been somewhat undervalued in the past. I am confident that the increase in the number of Standing Committees will add value to and encourage the specialised scrutiny of legislation and documents. That increase is welcome. The Modernisation Committee recommended an increase to five, but three is better than two. Although five would have been better still, I am reasonably comfortable with three. However, I hope that the Government will consider carefully the effectiveness of the extra Standing Committees and, if necessary, revisit the matter at a later stage.

I came to the House in June 1987 and, within a few weeks, I was a member of the European Legislation Committee. I have been its Chairman since 1992, and it has been a great honour to serve with many distinguished right hon. and hon. Members over the years. I have had the privilege of travelling all over Europe and have met Prime Ministers, Presidents and some royalty. I have many happy memories from my membership of the ELC that I will treasure and value. There is also some sadness. When the European Legislation Committee is wound up tonight, I will fondly remember former Members Jimmy Boyce and George Buckley, who served on the Committee and were good personal friends.

In my first 10 years as a member of the ELC, I found myself apologising for the then Conservative Government's xenophobic anti-Europe policy. My first announcement when I met any European colleagues at conferences or meetings was, "I am not a Tory." I am assured that several Conservatives do not share the views of the then Government. However, I am delighted to be a member of a Government who have grasped this moment in our history to embrace the collective advantages of being a major player and influence within the European Union.

The new Labour Government understand and accept readily and enthusiastically that our country's national interests are better protected and advanced by co-operation with our partners than by the narrow nationalism that has done us great harm in Europe and throughout the rest of the international community. This paper is part of that new politics. I welcome it and I applaud the Government for it.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): At the risk of contributing to this consensual atmosphere, I wish to place on record my views and those of my colleagues regarding the important work of the Select Committee on European Legislation. I pay tribute to its Chairman, the hon. Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood), his colleagues and staff who, on behalf of the House, have done extremely important work for the whole nation, which has gone largely unnoticed within this place, let alone outside it.

We would not be discussing this issue if we were not conscious of the fact that there are—in the words of the hon. Member for Clydesdale—inadequacies in the present situation and that we can do better. I agree with everything that he and his Committee and the former Procedure Committee, on which I served under the chairmanship of the right hon. Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery), have recommended in the past. The Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons has based its proposals this evening on those recommendations. As a member of that Committee, I am delighted to add my voice to the recommendations of the Leader of the House and the deputy shadow Leader of the House, the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack), that we should pass the measure without dissent.

I visited some German farmers two and a half or three years ago and I recall our conversation vividly. They said, "We in Germany implement every single tiny reference in every single directive. Every element of every directive from Brussels is implemented in full. Of course, in France, they do not take any notice and in Italy they do not know that there is such a directive." I was forced to add, "In Britain, my friends, we gold-plate directives." A constant preoccupation of hon. Members on both sides of the House is that, even when directives reach us, we discover that their implications are extremely complicated and convoluted. They are often added to—there is an accretion of different regulations when a directive reaches Whitehall. The House is still grappling with that problem.

The proposals before us improve that situation, but the hon. Member for Clydesdale is absolutely right: this is not the end but the beginning of an improved process. We cannot be satisfied that scrutiny is as effective as it should be, even when the new proposals are in place. I hope that, in trying to improve them, we shall not think that that is the end of the matter. We shall move forward on a transitional and experimental basis.

The terms of reference and the name of the Committee are of little importance, except in demonstrating to the House and to the world outside that we shall take the issue a great deal more seriously than we did in the recent past.

The question is not what we should scrutinise, or even how we should scrutinise it, but when we should do so. The right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) and the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) both spoke of the need for the House to be aware of proposals as they are developing in the European institutions, rather than when they have become a firm proposition. The proposal that a Minister who may be about to attend a meeting of the Council of Ministers should come before the Committee, and explain the range of options that may be available to him and his opposite numbers in the Council, is extremely important.

The section on the Council of Ministers in the document before us represents a significant step forward. If, for example, next week the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, after meeting his colleagues at the Agriculture Council to discuss the important issue of the beef export ban, could come back and explain the process whereby a decision was reached and what the decision was, that would contribute to the transparency and open government to which the Government are committed.

I share the view of the hon. Member for Clydesdale that it would have been preferable if there were five Standing Committees with a smaller membership—perhaps nine. That would be only a slight increase on the proposed three Standing Committees, each with a membership of 13.

[Mr. Paul Tyler]

That would be a sensible way to move forward, as there will still be a considerable work load on the three Committees.

There would have been another advantage, which has not yet been mentioned in the debate: there could have been some cross-reference between membership of the departmental Select Committees and the more specialist Standing Committees. That is difficult to achieve at present and will continue to be difficult with only three Standing Committees, because the necessary range of expertise and the work load will be so great. Some cross-reference and sharing of expertise would be helpful.

My final point relates to the way in which we deal with European business in the Chamber. I have not served on the Standing Committees but, in many cases, after careful analysis of the peculiar way in which a directive has developed and how it will apply in this country, and possibly after a Minister had retreated from his initial position on the proposal, the way in which the Committee reported back to the House left much to be desired. Many hon. Members have felt frustrated that the exercise of scrutiny did not result in effective decision making by all Members in the House. The proposals may offer the possibility of genuine improvement in that process.

We must have enough time to deal properly with European matters in the Chamber. I know that the Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle), is not a member of the Modernisation Committee, but I hope that he will take back to the Leader of the House the message that the effective involvement of the whole House in the scrutiny process will mean that more business must be transferred from the Floor of the House to some other procedure in a different part of the House.

All the proposals are tentative and experimental, and their effect will be cumulative. We would not expect a dramatic change—that is not how we change our procedure in this place. I know that, having battled on the issue for many years, the right hon. Member for East Devon will agree.

The proposals are an important step forward, but I have one remaining concern. Paragraph 47 states:

"We recommend that Departments individually and the Government collectively provide timely and accurate information to Parliament on European Union matters. If mistakes occur, corrective action must be taken to meet the needs of Parliament. For this purpose, a designation of responsibility as outlined above is essential. The European Legislation Committee"— which, I think, is a reference to the European Scrutiny Committee—

"should continue to monitor the situation."

As the experiment moves forward, it is important that we monitor it closely. There is a long way to go, and this is a step in the right direction. It is a strength of the House that we never stop permanently—we are always prepared to move on. I believe that we shall have to return to the matter in a few years, to ensure that the process continues to achieve more effective scrutiny of important legislation that affects all our fellow citizens.

Ms Jenny Jones (Wolverhampton, South-West): I shall not depart from the consensus that is apparent in the debate. I am one of the newest members of the Select Committee on European Legislation. I was keen to be on the Committee and was extremely pleased to be appointed to it, but it was interesting to hear the reaction of some of my colleagues. They wondered why I wanted to be a member of that Select Committee and suggested that it was not the sexiest one. I found that an astonishing remark, as I had not realised that there was a beauty contest among Select Committees.

In the short time that I have served on the Committee, two features have struck me. First, its work is important, because the European Union impinges on all our lives. I have been impressed by the expertise and experience of the members who have served on the Committee much longer than I have. It is pleasing to know that that well of experience has been recognised. There is a good base for the Committee's enhanced role.

Secondly, I was struck by the dedication and hard work of the staff. The hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) said that he was astonished at the amount of work that we get through. I was pleased that the Chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood), paid tribute to the work of the staff.

I do not disagree with anything that any of the previous speakers have said, but I shall add two comments. First, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House rightly said, whatever we may feel about the United Kingdom's membership of the EU, it touches on all our lives. As an institution, it has changed rapidly and developed significantly since scrutiny in this Parliament began. The way in which we scrutinise European business must keep pace with the rapid developments there.

Another reason why we must improve scrutiny arises from the democratic deficit in the European Union. Everyone knows that the only elected part of the EU, the Parliament, is probably the weakest in terms of balance of power, and the Council of Ministers is probably the strongest. We alone cannot do anything about that, although the Select Committee discusses the matter from time to time.

One of the most significant recommendations is the introduction of pre-Council and post-Council scrutiny, to which the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) referred. That will enable us to find out much more about what goes on at the Council of Ministers. As that is probably the most powerful of the three institutions that make up the EU, and the one accused of meeting in the greatest secrecy, anything that this Parliament can do to shine a light on the work of the Council of Ministers and to bring greater transparency not only for our sake, but for the sake of the people who voted us here, is valuable.

My second comment relates to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) in an intervention. The efficiency and effectiveness of any scrutiny system depend partly on what supports and facilitates it.

The Committee has long advocated the use of information technology and e-mail—the electronic transmission of documents from the EU to the member state Parliaments. Documents have to be received and scrutinised and questions have to be asked within the tight time scale of six weeks, so e-mailing would reduce the time taken to receive documents from 10 days to a matter of hours.

If we are to strengthen scrutiny, we must allow as long as possible for that scrutiny to be effective. We need every minute that is at our disposal. I am pleased to say that, buried in the back of the report, there is a discussion on the electronic transmission of documents. Last autumn, the Select Committee raised that matter with the then Minister responsible and we were assured that pilots would take place to assess its feasibility. I hope that that matter will be pushed forward, because we are particularly concerned about it.

As I said, I welcome the Select Committee's recommendations. I look forward to the transformation of the European Legislation Committee into the European Scrutiny Committee. I have taken the precaution of looking at the Order Paper and I am pleased to see that my name has been put forward for membership of that Committee, which is a relief.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House was right to say that this is an opportunity to bring greater transparency to, and understanding of, the work of the EU which, in turn, will mean greater democracy.

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): First, I thank those hon. Members who have paid tribute to the original Procedure Committee which made the recommendations on which the scrutiny procedures of the House have been based. I rather feel as though I have been here before, and I have no doubt that I shall be here again.

It is interesting to elaborate on what the Leader of the House said about the success of our scrutiny activities, inadequate though some of us may think they have been. Without doubt, Britain considers the details of European regulations to a much greater extent than any other member state.

There are two interesting alternatives. Members of the Belgian Parliament meet Belgian Members of the European Parliament, but to debate broad European topics rather than regulations. There is no real consideration of regulations at all. Danish Ministers cannot approve a decision in the Council of Ministers until the matter has been considered by the Danish Parliament, but, again, the Danish Parliament does not consider the regulations. They are more or less approved en masse, and they are no great restriction on the Council of Ministers. Therefore, the amount of detail into which the two Committees have gone deserves the greatest praise.

I thank the hon. Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) for his work as Chairman of the Select Committee. When he entered the House, he was something of a revolutionary, but the Committee has made him a most responsible Member of the House, something about which I am delighted. As he will know, I say that in the nicest way possible.

The hon. Gentleman is correct about the number of the Committees. He will recall that the original recommendation, way back in the mid-1980s, was that there should be five. At that time, my Government rejected that. I moved an amendment to the motion before the House and, with the Procedure Committee, divided the House, because we believed that there should have been five. Given the range of material to be considered, the relatively small number of 13 Members have a massive job to do, and that frequently discourages the experts from coming forward.

We recommended five then and I am sad to say that, again, the Government have rejected the recommendation of five, limiting it to three. I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) is willing to go along with that. The original Procedure Committee felt that the experts in the House on certain subjects should serve on those Committees. If those Committees are broken down, as is suggested in the Modernisation Committee's report on the scrutiny of European business, one sees how the division into five would allow experts on agriculture and health to specialise in one Committee, experts on the Treasury and home affairs to specialise in one Committee and experts on foreign affairs and trade and industry to specialise in one Committee. In those circumstances, specialists would be much more willing to serve on those Committees than they are at the moment.

Even I can quickly calculate that 13 times three is 39, but, as the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), and the Select Committee, suggested, a Committee could easily comprise nine Members and, as nine times five is 45, only six additional Members would have to be allocated. In this Parliament, that would be four Labour Members and two Opposition Members. I cannot believe that the Whips could not find that number of Members. Even 11 times five, which is 55, would mean only 16 additional Members—11 Labour Members and 4 Conservatives and one Liberal or other Opposition Member, or three and two, whatever the division may be. With a Labour majority, there would be no great difficulty in finding that number of Members to man the Committees. Therefore, a great opportunity has again been rejected by the House in moving to only three rather than the original recommendation of five.

Mr. Tyler: As the right hon. Gentleman will have heard me say, I very much support him on that. However, he must choose his words with care. Just now, he said that the House has rejected this proposal. Technically, at this moment, the matter has been agreed only through the usual channels—between the main Opposition and those on the Government Front Benches. I support the hon. Gentleman and I hope that, in due course, the Government and the Conservative party will think again.

Sir Peter Emery: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I shall do my best to make the Conservative party see sense on this. I have been trying for 16 years now. I might succeed in another four or five years. We move slowly. We have gone from two to three, but I hope that we can make the last dash fairly quickly.

One thing that has not been dealt with in the report is the problem that arises in a Committee if a Committee decides on something that is contrary to the original motion moved by the Government and contrary to what the Government wish. That may be the Committee's decision but, when the matter then goes to the House, the Government may move the original motion, which is not what the Committee had agreed. Many people do not realise that what the Committee has decided is not what comes before the House.

The great difficulty is that a motion has to be moved by a Minister, and the Government will not move a motion that they do not agree with. To that I say that we should have amended the Standing Orders so that an hon. Member would be allowed to move an amendment to a motion, although the Government would, of course, be able to reject it and then table their own amendment. The aspect that only the original motion, but never the decision of the Committee, is referred to the House is misleading; it should have been dealt with, but it has not.

[Sir Peter Emery]

"The Scrutiny of European Union Business", which was presented to Parliament by the Leader of the House, recommends:

"Informal links with the European Parliament should be encouraged."

Labour Members have said that there should be more visits by all Members of Parliament. That is something with which I do not necessarily disagree, but I believe that Select Committees should take the opportunity that exists within the present regulations on visiting to set up links with European Parliament Committees dealing with the same areas.

Each Select Committee should appoint a rapporteur who would make it his duty to visit either Strasbourg or Brussels—whichever was necessary—to see what a European Parliament Committee was getting up to. In that way, we could have an input before reports were decided. Once those reports have been published, the chances of us having any input are nil.

That process would be fairly involved, but it would mean more direct contact between our Select Committees and the equivalent Committees in the European Parliament. I am not saying that that would be perfect—in many ways, it would be difficult—but it would be a step towards achieving an input for Members of Parliament in decisions made by the Committees of the European Parliament. There would certainly be a strengthening of links between this Parliament and the European Parliament, something that I should like to see happen.

I am delighted that the Government have moved in this direction in respect of the Modernisation Committee's recommendations. With the exception of the Government's proposal on the number of Committees, I commend them to the House.

6.32 pm

Mr. Roger Casale (Wimbledon): I am delighted to participate in the debate as a member of the European Legislation Committee, because this is a watershed in our development. This morning, I awoke as a member of that Committee, but, having checked the Order Paper, I know that I shall awake tomorrow as a member of the European Scrutiny Committee because today we are about to change our Committee's name.

Hon. Members have mentioned the lack of recognition by some of our colleagues for the work of the European Legislation Committee. My constituents sometimes ask what Committee I am on. When I say that I am a member of the European Legislation Committee, they ask, "What is that and what are you up to?" Some of them think that I am involved in some sort of seditious activity to do with Europe.

The right hon. Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery) made the unusual suggestion that my hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood), the Chairman of our Committee, was something of a revolutionary before he had any contact with Europe, but has now become a rational man. I venture to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that some of his colleagues—perhaps through their contact with Europe—have gone in the opposite direction.

The work of our Committee is important in terms of safeguarding the interests of my constituents and of the national interest in Europe, and I am proud and pleased to be a member of it. I sometimes liken our work to that of customs officers at a border. All sorts of directives, regulations and recommendations from the European Commission and the Council of Ministers come across for decision by the Government and the House. Our Committee stands next to the conveyor belt, and when we see something that may have political, legal or financial implications, we stop the belt, unpack that directive or regulation and examine it more closely.

We do this aspect of scrutiny work very well, and that is reflected in the report of the Modernisation Committee and the Government's response. As we come to the end of this Session, the work of our Committee has been given a clean bill of health and our Chairman and the Committee have received a good end-of-term report. However, the recommendations in the Modernisation Committee's report and in the Government's response are shaped by much wider processes than procedural considerations in the House—important as they are—or by the work and the momentum of our Committee itself.

I should highlight the dynamic context which has resulted in the new proposals. On the proactive side, there is a clearly defined need for greater scrutiny of decisions taken in Brussels. My constituents want that, the country wants that and it is good that the Government want that, too. The Committee has the ambition, which I think is shared by the Government, for not only more, but better, scrutiny, and the proposals before us go in that direction. What we do, we should do well, and if anything can be done to enable our Committee to do its work better, that is all to the good.

Many of the proposals in the report and in the Government's response are shaped by that ambition. In particular, the closer co-operation that is foreseen with other Select Committees, the European committees of other national Parliaments in the EU and the European Parliament will lead to a greater level of experience, better information about EU decision making, an exchange of best practice and improved communication between the Government and the House. Other Committees of the House and committees across Europe will be partners, not competitors, in the scrutiny role with a common endeavour to do the job well.

On the reactive side, we should consider these reforms in the context of the evolving nature of the EU, and especially in the context of the treaties of Amsterdam and of Maastricht. In many ways, the report could be read as a parliamentary response to the intergovernmental treaty signed up to at Maastricht by the previous Government.

The Maastricht treaty is worthy of particular emphasis, because much in the report is aimed at scrutiny of the second and third pillar structures. Third pillar scrutiny represents a pyrrhic victory for the Committee, because, subsequently at Amsterdam, many of the those third pillar responsibilities and functions were transferred into the first pillar. Moreover, the present Government have opted out of the aspects relating to asylum, immigration and border control.

The remit of our Committee is being broadened and its responsibilities strengthened. All that will lead to greater and more informed dialogue with our Government about what they are doing in Brussels on our behalf. Thanks to the report and the Government's response, if we do move towards the stars of the European Union—towards closer co-operation—we shall do so with our feet and those of this Parliament firmly on the ground.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking): I speak with caution because other right hon. and hon. Members have contributed greatly to the scrutiny of European legislation in the House. I wish to make just one point. Last week, as a member of the Home Affairs Select Committee, I went to Brussels for a European Parliament conference on EU fraud and cross-border crime. During the conference, Members of the European Parliament of different parties asked me what the British public thought about their proposals to create a common EU criminal law system to cope with those problems, a common judicial area and a common police force. I had to scratch my head and tell the truth: the British public are not aware of such proposals. "All right," they said, "What is the British Parliament's view on those proposals?" Again, I scratched my head and said that many of us in the House were unaware of much that comes from the European Parliament and other institutions.

Some of our Select Committees, such as the Home Affairs Select Committee, should take a real interest in what happens in the European Parliament and elsewhere. Whether we like it is irrelevant; we should know more. I do not feel well informed enough. If this discussion results in better oversight and scrutiny, and more awareness among our colleagues of what is happening among our European colleagues, that must be good.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) for his work. I have felt the heat when he has scrutinised me, as a former Minister, on fishery matters and I know the excellence of the job that he did. The role of Fisheries Minister introduced me to Europe and made me realise that the House gets involved far too late in the process of scrutiny to have a real influence on shaping United Kingdom policies when they go before the Council. I urge the Parliamentary Secretary who will reply to this debate, and the Leader of the House, to look again at mechanisms whereby Parliament may be advised much earlier on some of the formative thinking that is going on.

When I was a Minister, both in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and at the Treasury, I used to get my officials to produce for me a chart showing all the Committees that they attended regularly in Brussels so that I knew of the forthcoming attractions. I was surprised and sometimes shocked at the amount of new ideas and legislation that was coming along, on which I had not received proper briefing. I therefore urge the Parliamentary Secretary and the Leader of the House to find a way of advising the House what is going on so that we may have a much earlier sight of what is happening and can take action.

I strongly support other hon. Members who mentioned greater transparency. The more we know about what is happening, and the earlier we know it, the better. I also endorse the comments of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), who wanted greater opportunities to travel to Europe. Some colleagues do not use their one trip a year because one visit is not enough to develop a relationship, specialise in a subject, make appointments to visit officials, and so on. If there were proper opportunities to visit, we would be better informed and scrutiny would be much improved.

We should all do as much as we can to improve newspapers' reporting of European activity. If we are to get the necessary backing from the public, they must be much better informed about European legislation and activity. I endorse and support the House's attempts to improve scrutiny, but it would be better if we could be involved earlier.

Sir Patrick Cormack: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) talks about the newspapers reporting Europe. Would that they report what goes on in this place more fully. I doubt whether a single word will appear on the non-existent parliamentary pages tomorrow about this short, informative and important debate. I congratulate all those who have taken part in it, including seven Back Benchers. It is good to listen to the wise experience of those who have served for a long time on Committees. We heard from two new Members—the hon. Members for Wolverhampton, South-West (Ms Jones) and for Wimbledon (Mr. Casale)—who were on the Select Committee and will be translated on to the new Committee, and we heard from the hon. Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood).

We should all ponder what they said, just as we should take extremely seriously the points made by my exceptionally experienced colleague, my right hon. Friend the Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery). I take his strictures in good part. It is important that we look at new Committees and see exactly how they work. Although we were persuaded by the Government's arguments that, to have three with 13 members had a lot of merit, my right hon. Friend made a good point about having five with 11 members. The hon. Member for Clydesdale echoed that point. When people with so much experience and knowledge of examining European documents and directives say that, we must listen carefully. I hope that the Minister agrees that we must monitor carefully just how the new Committees work.

I do not want to divide the House this evening. I hope that, in the spirit of consensus that has prevailed throughout the debate, we can agree to the new orders and then monitor their operation carefully. It has been instructive to listen to my right hon. Friends the Members for East Devon and for Fylde and my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Malins) discuss closer liaison with the European Parliament. As I said in my opening remarks, we must have closer liaison. We should listen to the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for East Devon in that regard. When the new parliamentary building opens in a couple of years' time, it would be sensible to have one room available for our friends and colleagues from the European Parliament to use as of right on a regular basis to meet Members of this House. I would welcome such an innovation and I hope that it would commend itself to other right hon. and hon. Members.

I promised the Minister that I would not erode the time in which he wishes to respond. With those few words, therefore, I wish the orders good speed.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Mr. Peter Kilfoyle): I have listened carefully to the views expressed during the debate and I am pleased that the House has welcomed the package of measures that we are presenting today to improve the process by which we consider European business. May I add my personal commendation to my hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) who, the whole House agrees, has done a splendid job in chairing the European Legislation Committee? I hope that the Committee will shortly be reborn and he will again take up the challenge of ensuring that legislation that comes before the House is scrutinised even more widely and deeply than hitherto.

I commend the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) on the generally supportive stance that he has taken on behalf of the official Opposition, and the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), who has offered, in the nicest possible way, constructive support in the criticisms that he has made of some of the measures before the House this evening.

Ensuring that the House can properly scrutinise European Union business and hold Ministers to account for their actions in the Council of Ministers has universal support throughout the House. The measures proposed today are the culmination of a thorough examination of the scrutiny process undertaken by the European Legislation Committee, the Procedure Committee and the Modernisation Committee, as well as by the Government, and respond to the range of recommendations made by those Committees.

The changes cover matters of principle—for example, they will allow the House fully to scrutinise business under the second and third pillars—and will extend coverage of the scrutiny reserve resolution. In addition, the procedural elements of the current process will be improved, including arrangements for debating European issues and providing a framework for other departmental Select Committees to become more involved in the scrutiny process. The three Committees are to be commended on their work.

The hon. Member for South Staffordshire talked about taking these matters on the Floor of the House. The House will recall that, as well as specific debates on European Union documents, each year the House has two more general debates on developments in the European Union, particularly the business to be taken at European Council meetings. In most instances, a Standing Committee debate is the earliest opportunity and most effective way for hon. Members to question Ministers and debate European Union documents. The Modernisation Committee did not recommend any change in the procedure for debates on the Floor of the House. However, it is our intention, where appropriate, to bring matters on the Floor of the House.

The issue of a national Parliament office was also raised. The House authorities have done considerable preparatory work for today's debate. If the House approves the Modernisation Committee's report, a formal proposal will be made for consideration by the House of Commons Commission at the appropriate time.

A number of hon. Members, including the hon. Member for South Staffordshire and my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), referred to the EU travel scheme. The current scheme was introduced in 1991 by resolution of the House, and has a set budget of £250,000 per annum. The cost of individual journeys comes from the vote for MPs' paying allowances, so the Leader of the House is responsible for that, not the domestic Committees.

In recent years, some hon. Members have availed themselves of that allowance to visit European institutions, so as better to apprise themselves of the work of those institutions. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has made it abundantly clear that she is prepared to consider how we can deal with those matters with greater flexibility and within budget constraints, so that hon. Members can make such visits on a different basis.

The hon. Member for South Staffordshire asked about the arrangements after devolution. I repeat what my right hon. Friend the Leader of House said. We shall ensure that proper arrangements are put in place for the devolved bodies to scrutinise European Union business, and for their views to be taken into account by the Government. The precise arrangements are still being considered, but the devolved bodies themselves will examine how best to carry out their scrutiny function and how their views can be fed into the wider scrutiny process.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): It would help the scrutiny and information process if the explanatory memorandums attached to each piece of European legislation were published. They set out the arguments for it, including information on ministerial responsibility, policy implications, compliance cost assessments and the process of consultation. They are available on the yellow forms, but if a consolidated weekly edition were laid before the House and made available to the other Assemblies and Parliaments in the United Kingdom and to pressure groups and organisations, that would help us to understand what is going on.

Mr. Kilfoyle: The Government consistently look for ways to reduce the paper chase. We are committed to reducing the amount of paper produced by government. However, we shall consider my hon. Friend's suggestion.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall referred to the need to have more debates on the Floor of the House. I am mindful of the difficulties faced by smaller parties in the scrutiny process. One reason for keeping the size of the Standing Committee at 13 is to ensure that the representation of other parties is maintained. The Government have eight members, the official Opposition have three and other parties have two. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will welcome that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South–West (Ms Jones) referred to the electronic transmission of EU documents. Only last week, I attended a meeting of Ministers in Vienna, at which the United Kingdom Government were seen as a brand leader in trying to achieve a better system of electronic communication. Work on that specific issue is under way to produce an effective system for the electronic receipt of EU documents in capital cities throughout the European Union. A pilot system is being developed and evaluated. It has been particularly difficult to secure agreement on the systems and the architecture required to introduce such a system across all 15 member states.

We respect the view that the right hon. Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery) has expressed for some years. We must reflect what the Committee has agreed.

The Modernisation Committee did not recommend to the House any such change. As the right hon. Gentleman said, he did not persuade the Conservative Government to change the procedure. It must ultimately be for the Government to decide what is contained in the motion they put to the House.

The hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Malins) rightly drew attention to the importance of departmental Select Committees examining European Union issues. The Government agree with that, and some of the minor Standing Order changes are designed to effect that improved relationship.

I believe that the improvements that the House is asked to support represent a truly comprehensive package that will continue to keep our scrutiny arrangements among the most effective in Europe. That is shown by the consensus that has been reached this evening.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House approves the Seventh Report from the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons on the Scrutiny of European Business (HC 791) and takes note of the White Paper on the Scrutiny of European Business (Cm. 4095).

Resolved,

That the Resolution of the House of 24th October 1990 relating to European Community Legislation be rescinded and the following Resolution be made:

That,

(1) No Minister of the Crown should give agreement in the Council or in the European Council to any proposal for European Community legislation or for a common position or joint action under Title V or a joint position, joint action or convention under Title VI of the Treaty on European Union—

(a) which is still subject to scrutiny (that is, on which the European Scrutiny Committee has not completed its scrutiny) or

(b) which is awaiting consideration by the House (that is, which has been recommended by the European Scrutiny Committee for consideration pursuant to Standing Order No. 119 (European Standing Committees) but in respect of which the House has not come to a Resolution).

(2) In this Resolution, any reference to agreement to a proposal includes—

(a) agreement to a programme, plan or recommendation for European Community legislation;

(b) political agreement;

(c) in the case of a proposal on which the Council acts in accordance with the procedure referred to in Article 189b of the Treaty of Rome (co-decision), agreement to a common position, to a joint text, and to confirmation of the common position (with or without amendments proposed by the European Parliament); and

(d) in the case of a proposal on which the Council acts in accordance with the procedure referred to in Article 189c of the Treaty of Rome (co-operation), agreement to a common position.

(3) The Minister concerned may, however, give agreement—

(a) to a proposal which is still subject to scrutiny if he considers that it is confidential, routine or trivial or is substantially the same as a proposal on which scrutiny has been completed;

(b) to a proposal which is awaiting consideration by the House if the European Scrutiny Committee has indicated that agreement need not be withheld pending consideration.

(4) The Minister concerned may also give agreement to a proposal which is still subject to scrutiny or awaiting consideration by the House if he decides that for special reasons agreement should be given; but he should explain his reasons—

(a) in every such case, to the European Scrutiny Committee at the first opportunity after reaching his decision; and

(b) in the case of a proposal awaiting consideration by the House, to the House at the first opportunity after giving agreement.

(5) In relation to any proposal which requires adoption by unanimity, abstention shall, for the purposes of paragraph (4), be treated as giving agreement.

Resolved,

That, upon the entering into force of the Treaty of Amsterdam, the Resolution on Scrutiny of European Business (No. 2) shall have effect with the following modifications:

In paragraph (1) the words "a common position or joint action under Title V or a joint position, joint action or convention under Title VI of the Treaty on European Union" are replaced by the words "a common strategy, joint action or common position under Title V or a common position, framework decision, decision or convention under Title VI of the Treaty on European Union"; and in paragraph (2)(c) the words "a common position, to a joint text, and to confirmation of the common position (with or without amendments proposed by the European Parliament)" are replaced by the words "a common position, to an act in the form of a common position incorporating amendments proposed by the European Parliament, and to a joint text".

Ordered,

That, with effect from the beginning of the next Session, Standing Order No. 119 (European Standing Committees) be replaced by the following Standing Order (European Standing Committees):

".—(1) There shall be three standing committees, called European Standing Committees, to which shall stand referred for consideration on motion, unless the House otherwise orders, such European Union documents as defined in Standing Order No. 143 (European Scrutiny Committee) as may be recommended by the European Scrutiny Committee for further consideration.

(2) If a motion that specified European Union documents as aforesaid shall not stand referred to a European Standing Committee is made by a Minister of the Crown at the commencement of public business, the question thereon shall be put forthwith.

(3) Each European Standing Committee shall consist of thirteen Members nominated for the duration of a Parliament by the Committee of Selection; and in nominating such Members, the Committee of Selection shall—

(a) have regard to the qualifications of the Members nominated and to the composition of the House; and

(b) have power to discharge Members from time to time, and to appoint others in substitution.

(4) The quorum of a European Standing Committee shall be three, excluding the chairman.

(5) Any Member, though not nominated to a European Standing Committee, may take part in the committee's proceedings and may move amendments to any motion made as provided in paragraphs (7) and (8) below, but such Member shall not make any motion, vote or be counted in the quorum; provided that a Minister of the Crown who is a Member of this House but not nominated to the committee may make a motion as provided in paragraphs (7) and (8) below; and the Government may appoint the precedence of notices of motion to be considered in each committee.

(6) The European Standing Committees, and the principal subject matter of the European Union documents to be referred to each, shall be as set out below; and in making recommendations for further consideration, the European Scrutiny Committee shall specify the committee to which in its opinion the documents ought to be referred; and subject to paragraph (2) of this order, the documents shall be referred to that committee accordingly

Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That Ms Elizabeth Filkin be appointed Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards on the retirement of Sir Gordon Downey, KCB, on the terms of the Report of the House of Commons Commission (HC 1143), dated 9th November 1998.—[Mr. Kirkwood.]

6.57 pm

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): It is only right that we should welcome the new Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards and pay tribute to the retiring commissioner, Sir Gordon Downey. One of the advantages we have in this country is that a number of individuals have come up through the public service and have felt it right to dedicate themselves to public service, even though the financial rewards are not as great as they may be elsewhere. Gordon Downey is an exemplar of such an approach.

After the war, there was a common feeling among some people that they should repay the work that was done for them by their predecessors. In the 1980s, that attitude did not receive high favour. It was almost mocked, and it was felt that those who did not make use of their talents and make a lot of money were failing the country and themselves. That was an appalling attitude. Some people were scorned for their work for the country and for the community. The idea that society was not as important as the individual failed to take account of the enormous value that we get from people who devote themselves to raising and maintaining standards of public life.

Gordon Downey is an outstanding public servant. It is a great privilege to be in public service: it is not a job like any other. The fact that we have so many such people is a tribute to the dedication that they have brought to the public service and to the civil service. Sir Gordon also worked with the Public Accounts Committee for some years. When I was asked whether he would be a suitable Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards, I was delighted: I could not imagine that anyone else could do the job as well as he could. My judgment has been borne out by events.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): Does my right hon. Friend feel that Elizabeth Filkin should be given more resources than have been given to Sir Gordon Downey in order to carry out the work as effectively and comprehensively as possible?

Mr. Sheldon: Sir Gordon never claimed to be short of resources, although few were available. He carried out his duties with great dedication and, through his ability, was capable of dealing with every question that arose. Of course, he had a superb background for the job. He was in the Treasury—I knew him there more than 20 years ago—and then became Comptroller and Auditor-General of the old Exchequer and Audit Department before it became the National Audit Office. He retired from there to become chairman of the Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Regulatory Association. As he says himself, he retired from numerous jobs to take up ever more jobs that fitted his experience and abilities.

Sir Gordon retired from that job to become ombudsman for two newspapers. He retired from that job to become a regulator of hospital authorities. If we ever wished to appoint a "conscience of the nation", Sir Gordon would clearly be a prominent candidate. He has undertaken his work splendidly. Following his examination of more than 40 complaints that were brought to the Select Committee on Standards and Privileges, the results were unanimous. Unanimity flowed from the work that he produced for the Committee. When he eventually retired, we asked him for his views, which are contained in our 19th report.

A growing tradition is for an outstanding public servant to be asked, at the end of his service, to describe the lessons that he has learnt, so that they can be passed on. That was done on a number of occasions in the Public Accounts Committee, and—as can be seen from our 19th report—it was done in the case of the retiring parliamentary commissioner. Sir Gordon told us that the disciplinary system had worked well. He also told us that he would like to see a statute of limitations—that in too many instances people had delved far into the past, when attitudes were rather different, and that such actions might not have been in accordance with the standards that we now expect.

If the public perception of the work of the House of Commons has improved—as I hope it has—much of that improvement must be due to Sir Gordon's work. That, I think, is the finest farewell tribute that could be offered. We should be judged according to whether the public perceive us in a way that would be recognisable 20 or 30 years ago—allowing for some criticisms; the House will always receive criticisms.

When Elizabeth Filkin appeared before the Standards and Privileges Committee this morning, we were able to discuss her role. She will be taking on the kind of work that Sir Gordon did so well. It is intended that she should work four days a week, but that may not be necessary: we hope that the amount of work, which was initially large, will diminish as new standards are more widely recognised. People now accept standards that were produced two or three years ago, and I trust that that will mean that far fewer representations will be made to the commissioner.

We thank Sir Gordon Downey for all the splendid work that he has done. He laid down a road for others to follow, and that is one of the great tributes that we can pay him.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): I want to say two things, very briefly. First, let me join the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) in paying tribute to Sir Gordon Downey's work. The first holder of any post has a huge responsibility, because he establishes the framework within which the post develops, and maps out a way forward. Sir Gordon found himself in the middle, between two of the most powerful forces in a democratic society—a sovereign Parliament and a free press—at a time when relationships between the two were deteriorating. He discharged one of the most difficult jobs in the public sector with patience, diligence and tact. As the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne said, he has helped to begin to restore the House's reputation, and we all owe him our gratitude.

Secondly, I want to support the appointment of Elizabeth Filkin. As Financial Secretary to the Treasury, I encountered her when she was adjudicator for the Inland Revenue. I was impressed by her commitment to her job and her staff, but, crucially, I was impressed by the fact that she retained the confidence of the Revenue, the body that she was investigating. That showed that she was fair, and that her work commanded respect. I looked at her latest report, which was commended for a welcome contrast to the legislative prose with which most of us deal for most of the time.

I support Elizabeth Filkin's nomination, commend her to the House and wish her well.

7.5 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): I promise to be brief.

I add my grateful acknowledgement to Sir Gordon Downey. As the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) said, Sir Gordon's integrity and sterling work have helped to restore the reputation of Members of Parliament, which was at a low ebb when he was appointed.

I hope that Elizabeth Filkin will be given the resources that she needs. My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) said that Sir Gordon Downey never complained about what might have been seen as sparse resources and facilities. Let us hope that Elizabeth Filkin's work load diminishes over time—that would be a fine reflection on this place—but I hope that, if she needs more resources, the House will ensure that they are provided.

Let me repeat my thanks to a fine and honourable man.

7.7 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): I cannot promise to be as brief as the other speakers, but I consider this to be an important debate. I think that the House should take the appointment of a new Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards very seriously, because it is a sensitive appointment. Apart from anything else, it commands a salary that is almost twice what Members of Parliament receive, for four days' work a week. I invite any hon. Member who works for only four days a week to put his or her hand up. I doubt that I shall see many hands rise.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): They are the ones who are not here.

Mr. Howarth: They have been sent on an away day by the Labour Whips.

When Sir Gordon was appointed, his salary of £72,000 was more than double that of a Member of Parliament—then about £33,000. In an article written in 1995, Lord Renton, then Member of Parliament for Mid-Sussex, said of the discrepancy:

"This is like paying the company night watchman twice as much as the sales director."

He made a valid point. It needs to be taken into account when we consider these matters.

Sir Gordon Downey's appointment unquestionably reinforced in the public mind the idea that the House had something to be ashamed of. The vast majority of hon. Members work extremely hard. They are diligent. They generally pursue issues in the way in which they believe they need to be pursued, promoting not a partial interest, but one that they have formed out of conviction, so it is unfortunate that Sir Gordon Downey's appointment—far from helping to reduce the public disaffection for the House, as the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) believes—helped to reinforce the idea that there was something deeply dishonourable about the House. I do not believe that to be true. Of course there have been problems, but they did not warrant the sort of attack that was made on the honour of the House.

I do not know Elizabeth Filkin; I have not had the privilege. I was not on the House of Commons Commission. I am not a member of the Select Committee on Standards and Privileges, so I have not met her. Therefore, I have relied only on what I have read in the newspaper. Last week, I read an interesting article in The Times that suggested that her credentials were excellent:

"For the past five years she has gained a reputation as an investigator of complaints made against the Inland Revenue, Customs and Excise and the Contributions Agency."

It was also suggested that "The world of Westminster may seem a fitting job for a former social worker and childcare expert who has written several academic books on dealing with errant charges."

I hope that she has left all that behind her, because we are not errant charges in need of being taken in hand by a schoolmistress.

One of the things that I noticed on returning to the House after a five-year absence is how much we are now employees. I felt like an employee rather than an hon. Member: the number of forms one has to fill in; we have to do this, that and the other. Therefore, I hope that Elizabeth Filkin will not regard her task as primarily to bring people to book.

I draw some comfort from something that Elizabeth Filkin was quoted as saying by Valerie Elliott in The Times:

"I am aware that all of us can make mistakes and look foolish. One can always reflect on how things could have been done better."

I hope that she will bring that outlook to the discharge of her responsibilities. As every right hon. and hon. Member knows, we have immense pressures on us. There is no spare time in the day, and hardly any at night. For what it is worth, I was telephoned at a quarter to 6 this morning by Talk Radio and invited to give my views on an issue.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): Did Talk Radio pay you?

Mr. Howarth: Talk Radio pays, does it? Well, it did not pay me. I put the telephone down, but I shall be looking for a handsome apology for having been roused from my slumbers, having got to bed at 2.30 am, after working late in the House.

Hon. Members work hard. There are great pressures on us. There are many competing priorities: our duties to our constituents, in the House and to our families. It is possible that, being frail and human, occasionally we will make mistakes. I am sure that all hon. Members think that there are things that they have done or omitted to do that may have been better not done or done, and that they regret. I hope that, in acknowledging human frailty, Miss Filkin, or Mrs. Filkin, whatever she is, will be good enough to understand our frailties in this place and not encourage those elements of the media who are sitting up there like vultures, seeking to trip up Members of Parliament at every turn.

The other day, I was rung up by a newspaper, not a radio station, that suggested that I had tabled three questions on which I should have declared an interest. The whole tenor of the conversation was that, somehow, I had behaved, "Of course, not improperly, Mr. Howarth," but that I had been in breach of the rules.

I checked with the Registrar of Members' Interests and I was not in breach of the rules, but there are journalists sitting there, some aided and abetted by Labour Members, who do not like the idea of Members of Parliament having outside interests, and who seek simply to trip up Members of Parliament for some minor omission that in no way reflects on their integrity or the way in which they conduct themselves in the House. Therefore, as I say, I hope that Elizabeth Filkin will bear those points in mind.

I hope that Elizabeth Filkin will learn some of the lessons of the past few years. It is going to be her responsibility, if the House is minded to approve her appointment, to uphold the dignity of Parliament; that is one of the charges that will be upon her, but I urge her to regard that as a two-way street and not simply a question of investigating complaints against Members about things that they may have omitted to do.

I hope that Elizabeth Filkin will regard it as her duty to protect the integrity of Parliament by ensuring that those who bring unfounded and serious allegations against Members pay some penalty, once it is decided that their charges are baseless. That is why I shall not join those right hon. and hon. Members who wish to salute the departure of Sir Gordon Downey; I do not. I think that he has been a disgrace—[Interruption.] The House may not like to hear it, but we have free speech in this place and I believe that he has behaved, in some respects, disgracefully. I shall tell the House why I am particularly exercised.

Soon after returning to the House last year, I went to see Sir Gordon Downey in respect of one investigation that he had recently undertaken and concluded, a serious investigation where allegations were made against the then Home Secretary, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), that he had been guilty of taking bribes of no less than £1 million from Mr. Tiny Rowland—the complaint was made by Mr. Al Fayed.

That was duly investigated by Sir Gordon. Shortly before the general election of 1997, he dismissed the allegations as baseless, but they had all been paraded all over the newspapers, and Labour Members could revel in the idea that there was no smoke without fire and that a senior Minister was involved; it was great stuff for the sleaze machine and all the rest of it. When Sir Gordon found, of course, that there was no case to answer, that appeared as a footnote in the newspapers, but the damage had been done.

I said to Sir Gordon, "Having found that the accusation was baseless, why did you not require that Al Fayed be summoned to the Bar of the House to apologise?" "Oh, Mr. Howarth, we could not possibly do that," he said. "Why not?" I asked. "Because that would deter other people from making complaints," he said.

That was an absolutely disgraceful dereliction of the duty of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards. He should have been far more robust. A grave charge was made against an hon. Member, which reflected on all of us, at least all of those who were in the House at the time. Sir Gordon failed miserably in upholding the dignity of the House by failing to require, or at least to recommend to the Committee, that Mr. Al Fayed be brought before the House to answer for what he had done. It was on the basis of that conversation with Sir Gordon that I felt deeply depressed about the way in which he had conducted his business.

The House will know, because I have raised it here before, that I believe that the manner in which Sir Gordon dealt with the case of Mr. Neil Hamilton was also a dereliction of duty. Sir Gordon's whole case was based on compelling evidence that Mr. Hamilton had taken money. He could not determine how much money Mr. Hamilton had taken from Mr. Al Fayed, how he had taken the money, when he had taken the money and, despite having crawled through his accounts, what he had done with the money. Nevertheless, it was good enough for Sir Gordon Downey to find that there was compelling evidence.

The truth is that Sir Gordon Downey rejected the original claims made by The Guardian—which has been part of the overall conspiracy, in cahoots with some Labour Members—that Mr. Hamilton had been paid via Mr. Ian Greer. Nevertheless, after finding that those claims had not stuck, Al Fayed made other accusations—which, when they too did not stick, he changed for a third time.

In his "compelling evidence", Sir Gordon relied on the evidence of Mr. Al Fayed's employees. If I may detain the House for a moment—I have rather a lot of l[illegible] on the matter—I remind hon. Members that, at para[illegible]h 800 of the Committee's first report, last July, Sir Gordon said that Ms Bond, who is Mr. Al Fayed's right-hand lady, and Mr. Bromfield, who was the doorkeeper at 60 Park lane, the location of Mr. Al Fayed's headquarters—

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West): Will my hon. Friend allow me to intervene?

Mr. Howarth: When I have finished this point, I shall of course allow my hon. Friend to intervene.

Sir Gordon stated that those people

"impressed me as reliable witnesses and I found no discrepancies in their evidence which could not be accounted for by uncertainties of recollection after a period of 10 years."

Unlike Mr. Bromfield, Mr. Hamilton was allowed no such deficiency in his recollection.

Mr. Bromfield testified that Mr. Hamilton had picked up envelopes at 60 Park lane—which of course never happened. It has now been revealed that, for about four months, Mr. Bromfield regularly handed over envelopes to Miss Francesca Pollard, who was, and acknowledges that she was, in Al Fayed's pay. Mr. Bromfield could not remember her, but he could remember Mr. Hamilton, who was never there. He was a totally unreliable witness. He was one of many such witnesses.

Sir Gordon completely failed in pursuing a course of natural justice. Charges of such a nature should have been judged on the standard of beyond reasonable doubt—which Sir Gordon did not apply—and not on the balance of probabilities. It is extremely interesting that he failed to call key witnesses who would have told him that those employees were unreliable. I remind the House that those employees appeared only at the 59th minute of the 11th hour. They had held their tongues for three years, and came forward only three days before the case was due to go to court.

Sir Gordon completely refused to take the evidence of Mr. Christoph Betterman, who had been no less than a director and vice-chairman of Harrods.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me, I said that I would give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, West (Mr. Bottomley). I should do that, and then I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I say this with some hesitation. If my hon. Friend has already dealt with the issues with which he wanted to deal, my remarks will be unnecessary. However, if he is thinking of going into the matter in some depth, I should tell him that, when I was involved in a High Court action, I was cautioned to be rather cautious about taking up issues that might be further determined by a court. I do not want to say any more than that, but I have a fear.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing that point to my attention. He makes a fair point, to which I shall of course have regard. I do not want to take much longer, but I should give way to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell).

Mr. Mitchell: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I do not have a legal warning, but merely say that—on the occasion of the retirement of a very distinguished public servant—the tactic of raking over old, dead coals and going over evidence again is not only ungracious but downright wrong. However, if the hon. Gentlemen is going to do that, why does he not declare his own interest as a close friend of the man about whom he is talking, and as someone who was coupled with him in a libel action and gained damages with him from the BBC?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. We should not deal with issues concerning the BBC and events of some time ago, as they have nothing to do with the motion. The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) is speaking within the rules of debate. If he were not, I would soon stop him. However, I also remind him that hon. Members have a tradition of being careful not to malign those with no protection.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As the mover of the motion, on behalf of the House of Commons Commission, may I have some guidance? The report that we have tabled deals with the nomination of a candidate and is essentially about welcoming a new person to the job. Therefore is it technically in order—as the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said—to rake over the coals?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As I said to the hon. Member for Aldershot—and as he should know by now—the occupant of the Chair would not allow the debate to go out of order. The report mentions the work done by Sir Gordon Downey. The hon. Member should have mentioned occasionally the new commissioner, which he has done. However, I reiterate that there is a tradition in the House of being careful in dealing with privilege. An hon. Member who is attacked by another hon. Member will have an opportunity to rebut, but hon. Members are careful about using our privilege in the Chamber.

Mr. Howarth: Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am most grateful to you for making a very considered response. I have attempted to conduct myself in a manner that I hope the House will regard as being as courteous as possible in the circumstances.

I tell the hon. Member for Great Grimsby that every hon. Member knows that I am a close friend of Neil Hamilton; I do not have to declare that. Moreover, I tell the hon. Gentleman that his comments were unworthy of him as a man of principle. I am fighting for a principle, and he, too, should be prepared to fight for a principle. The principle is that a man in this country is innocent unless proved otherwise.

Neil Hamilton has not been proved to have taken the money. The Committee concluded that it did not have evidence that he had taken the money. I am therefore not attempting to rake over old coals. However, I shall not join in the tribute paid by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) to Sir Gordon Downey. I do not share my right hon. Friend's view. I believe that Sir Gordon has failed to discharge his duty, and I am entitled to say so in the House.

I have publicly expressed that view, and I have told Sir Gordon Downey on the telephone that I wish to call for his dismissal. He has not been shy in replying to me. He is an unelected appointee of the House who should be accountable to the House. I feel that he has not been properly accountable to the House. When challenged about my views, he asserted in The Daily Telegraph that my opinions were a matter of "total indifference" to him. All I can say is that no public official has the right to speak in such terms about the opinions of an elected Member of this place.

Sir Gordon has been quite happy to defend himself. He has made some outrageous remarks. After seeing something about the 19th report in The Times and learning its basis—wishing Sir Gordon well—I have only just picked up a copy of it. However, I shall not join in the general euphoria—forgive me—because I believe that the public are entitled to know about those matters. I am grateful to hon. Members who are giving me a fair hearing.

The essence of my argument—of why I believe that Sir Gordon Downey has failed—is that he has failed to discharge his responsibility to uphold the integrity of the House by requiring those who make baseless allegations to be brought to book. That is where he has failed, and that is why I wish to say to his successor that I hope that she will not make the same mistake.

I believe that Sir Gordon Downey also does not deserve the eulogies of the House because of the way in which he dealt with a case in which I have declared a close interest. I have argued why. I am not simply asserting that Sir Gordon Downey is a bad chap; I am giving chapter and verse as to why I do not believe that the House should give the bloke a happy send-off. One of my reasons is that he chose to rely on the evidence of people who were totally and completely committed to a known crook and liar, in the words of the Department of Trade and Industry report. He failed to take into account the evidence of Mr. Christoph Betterman, a former vice-chairman of Harrods, who ended up banged up in a gaol in the middle east for nine months in squalid conditions. In evidence to Sir Gordon Downey, he said:

"In my bitter personal experience, Mr. Al-Fayed is a compulsive liar who will stop at nothing to achieve his objectives. Any statement of his and of his close employees seeking to corroborate him should be treated with the greatest circumspection."

Let me ask the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne, who is a member of the Committee, why he did not require Sir Gordon Downey to invite Mr. Betterman to give evidence. Sir Gordon failed in his duty. He invited only those who would support the case for the prosecution, as it were.

We have now seen exhibited to public view the activities of Mr. Al Fayed in raiding the safe deposit box belonging to Tiny Rowland. He has now pulled out of the case, which cost £2.5 million and has now ended. It is further evidence that he and his colleagues have been crooks.

My basic point is that Sir Gordon Downey failed to discharge his responsibility.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): The hon. Gentleman condemns the work of Sir Gordon Downey, but surely he should respect the decision of the Select Committee on Standards and Privileges to find Mr. Neil Hamilton guilty on seven out of the eight charges brought against him. I believe that the fact that Mr. Hamilton admitted to those seven charges would have resulted in his suspension from the House. Does the hon. Gentleman not respect the decision of the elected Members on the Select Committee?

Mr. Howarth: I am afraid that I do not, because the whole issue has been imbued with enormous partisan advantage, and I shall tell the hon. Gentleman why. The evidence is in paragraph 814 of the report. The Prime Minister himself has been hauled before the Select Committee on three occasions and been accused—and found guilty—of minor transgressions which ought properly to have been recorded; yet Sir Gordon Downey asserts that the fact that Neil Hamilton was found guilty on a number of counts puts him completely beyond the pale. I am sorry, but I cannot find the exact quotation.

Sir Gordon Downey does not deserve the approbation of the House because he was partial. He took a more lenient and favourable towards some Members than towards others.

I am not alone in that view. On 20 October, The Daily Telegraph—a newspaper of repute and undoubted independence of mind, a fearless fighter for worthy causes—[HON. MEMBERS: "They are not here."] No; but they will be watching on the box, and I did not vote to bring television into the House.

On 20 October, The Daily Telegraph said:

"Under pressure to show that the new system of parliamentary regulation could handle corruption, Sir Gordon appears to have jumped to conclusions. Had he conducted a thorough investigation, he would have realised that allegations made by employees under Mr. Fayed's direct control were highly suspect. The reason is obvious. Mr. Fayed carries out dirty tricks campaigns against staff who cross him. In the specific case of Alison Bozek, her claims are categorically denied by former members of Mr. Fayed's operations."

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Member for Aldershot gives way, I have something to say. The hon. Gentleman has made his point about Sir Gordon Downey and has said that he does not wish to join his hon. Friends in congratulating him. He has a perfect right to do that. He has put the case as to why he should not congratulate Sir Gordon Downey, but the House should not have to listen to every piece of evidence. The hon. Gentleman has made his point and I hope that he will not give us chapter and verse of what Mr. Al Fayed or anyone else has done. The hon. Gentleman has made the point that he does not like Sir Gordon Downey.

Mr. Hoyle: Will the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) consider withdrawing his remarks? He has cast aspersions on certain right hon. and hon. Members by saying that the Select Committee treated some hon. Members more favourably than others. That raises questions about the right hon. and hon. Members on that Committee, and I think that he should withdraw his remarks.

Mr. Howarth: I am sorry, but I cannot withdraw what I said, as I believe it to be the case. The hon. Gentleman has not been in the House for very long. He and I worked together on aerospace matters and I respect him, but I do not believe—

Mr. Hoyle: Name the hon. Members.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman asks me to name the hon. Members involved. I have named the Prime Minister, whom I believe to have been treated more favourably and more leniently. I also believe that the Select Committee treated the Paymaster General more leniently than he warrants. Some of my right hon. and hon. Friends feel very strongly about that.

Dr. Godman rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Once again, let me say to the hon. Member for Aldershot that it is time that he concluded his remarks. The House has heard his case and knows exactly where he is coming from. [Interruption.] I hope that the hon. Gentleman is listening, because, if he intends indulging in personal criticism of any right hon. or hon. Member, he must table a motion and put it before the House.

Mr. Howarth: I accept your strictures, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I mentioned to the Paymaster General—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is not good enough for the hon. Gentleman to mention something to any right hon. or hon. Gentleman. If he is going to make personal criticisms of right hon. or hon. Gentlemen, he must put a motion before the House.

Mr. Howarth: Let me remind you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that an hon. Member lost his seat because of false allegations that were made against him. They are serious charges. You invited me not to adduce an extensive range of evidence. I hope that I have introduced to the House sufficient evidence to support my claims. I invite Labour Members to be fair-minded and to imagine how they would feel if they were the victims of persecution.

Dr. Godman rose—

Mr. Mitchell rose—

Mr. Howarth: I remind the House that Mr. Hamilton was the Minister for Corporate Affairs who refused to do Al Fayed's bidding. It was crystal clear that the man had a motive and that is another reason why I feel Sir Gordon Downey has failed.

The purpose of my raising the issue is not to rake over old coals, but to ensure that the new commissioner, if her appointment is endorsed by the House tonight, is aware that there is not a one-sided view of the issue in the House and that there are serious matters to which she has to turn her mind. In order to uphold the integrity of the House, I invite her to look carefully at the way in which she discharges her responsibility. I have not met the lady and I have no idea about her. Like other right hon. and hon. Members, except those on the House of Commons Commission, I have to rely on their judgment. The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) has had the benefit of considering the candidates. I have not. I have not been able to put my points and encourage the candidates to consider the nature of their responsibilities.

Mr. Mitchell rose—

Mr. Howarth: I shall give way one last time, because I know that you want to move on, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) is raking over the coals of the case by attacking Sir Gordon Downey, but the problem about which he is complaining is the office of the independent commissioner for standards. If we have such an office—and we should—it is bound to work in the way in which Sir Gordon Downey worked.

The hon. Gentleman should cast his mind back to what would have happened with such accusations before we had the independent commissioner. The issue would have been dealt with entirely by a Committee of the House. There would have been accusations of chaps judging chaps and there would have been little faith outside in any verdict, for or against Neil Hamilton, because people would have said that we were being judge and jury in our own case. The issue would have been worse and more muddied. Why does the hon. Gentleman not compare what happened with what would have happened before?

Mr. Howarth: I believe that such matters should be dealt with by Members of Parliament. I do not believe that we should appoint outside people to judge them. The experience of Sir Gordon Downey proves the point to my satisfaction. I accept that it does not prove it to the satisfaction of other hon. Members. The guy is accountable, for goodness sake. Is he supposed to be untouchable? Can we not criticise him or say anything about him? Of course we can say something about him. If we appointed him, we can jolly well hold him to account. That is all that I am trying to do.

I do not wish to strain your patience, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You have been very gracious towards me, and I appreciate that. I know that you know how I feel about the matter. I have not been raking over the coals. New evidence has appeared in the book by Mr. Tom Bower and in the excellent book called "Trial by Conspiracy" by Jonathan Boyd Hunt, a copy of which I shall let the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) have, for an appropriate fee—he insisted that he wanted to pay for it and did not want it for free. It is subtitled "The Lies, Cover-ups and Injustices Behind the Neil Hamilton Affair".

I shall ensure that Ms Filkin has a copy of the book, because I should like her to read it before she embarks on her job. It sets out what I believe to have been the gravest miscarriage of justice. I accept that it happened to a friend of mine, but I make no apologies for that—why should I? The House should recognise that it has been guilty of not having satisfactorily resolved a matter pertaining to one of its own. This is unfinished business. I hope that the new commissioner will look at the issue again and will take into account the matters that I have tried to put before the House.

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): I profoundly disagree with the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood). It is appropriate to dwell on the report and some of Sir Gordon Downey's parting shots to mark his retirement. It would have been dreadful, not least because of the entertainment that we have just had, if we had simply nodded the motion through.

I am a relatively new Member of Parliament and I bow to most others in experience, but I am a keen watcher of politics. I note in passing that until the last election, in Mr. Julian Critchley, Aldershot was represented by someone with a good deal more dignity than the current incumbent.

It is right that the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) was able to have his say in the context of welcoming Ms Filkin and marking the retirement of Sir Gordon Downey, however much others of us may disagree with what he said. The pound sign on the hon. Gentleman's lapel has just been drawn to my attention. I do not know whether it represents a subliminal signal of solidarity with Neil Hamilton, but I shall let that pass.

Mr. Gerald Howarth rose—

Mr. McNulty: The hon. Gentleman is about to tell me that the lapel badge is about saving the pound.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman was right the second time—and I think that he knew it at the outset. Of course it is to do with saving the pound.

Mr. McNulty: It may still be subliminal.

If ever there was evidence of the need for Sir Gordon Downey and his good works and the appointment of Elizabeth Filkin, it is what we have just heard. That eloquent, if petulant and ungracious, soliloquy from the apologia for the Neil Hamilton club shows far more clearly than anything that I could say that Sir Gordon Downey and his successor are sorely needed. To revisit an event at the general election, what we have just heard takes the biscuit in all sorts of ways and is entirely wrong. I wish Ms Filkin good luck. Given what we have just heard, she will need all her experience in looking after errant charges and children. The distortions that we have just heard on the clear evidence against Neil Hamilton that Sir Gordon Downey refers to were a travesty.

The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) has a right to his say. He has united most hon. Members behind a complete exoneration of and welcome for everything that Sir Gordon Downey has done. If Sir Gordon and Ms Filkin needed an enemy in the House, they could find no less a man than the hon. Gentleman.

Like the hon. Gentleman, I know precious little about Ms Elizabeth Filkin. I fully accept what the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire and other members of the Committee have said about her expertise and experience and I am sure that she is a more than appropriate successor to Sir Gordon Downey, but it might have been useful if we had had a detailed CV, perhaps in the Vote Office, for us to peruse, purely for information.

Sir Gordon Downey rightly did not mention it, but the issue of resources may need to be investigated. Some key points in the report are worth noting, not least the point on page vi about penalties. There is a real concern about the level, extent and manner of penalties imposed. I draw particular attention to the last paragraph of that page, which talks about the present range of penalties. Sir Gordon Downey says that they are adequate and appropriate, but a broader range could be employed by the Committee, beyond public censure, required apology, suspension and expulsion. Sir Gordon says in his retirement note that public opinion may feel that the Committee is a bit soft. We have moved from a zero base with no sanctions all the way to public apologies, public censure, suspension and expulsion, which crudely brings to mind being publicly executed for shoplifting. There must be a range of sanctions and penalties.

Sir Gordon's points about the lack of collective memory are also well made. Perhaps my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Committee or the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire will let me know afterwards whether there is to be serious training and reflection for future members of the Committee. They may need more than just half a morning from time to time.

I am not entirely sure that there should be any limitations, save perhaps for death. Seven years may be enough, except for issues of a particularly serious nature, as Sir Gordon Downey says, but there may be more to it. Seven years may be appropriate, but I am not sure.

It is worth dwelling on the report. The whole House should join the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire in wishing Ms Filkin well in her job and the best of luck. Given the drivel that we have heard from the hon. Member for Aldershot, she will clearly need it.

Mr. Martin Bell (Tatton): It had not been my intention to say anything in this debate, but it is hard to remain silent following the remarks by the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), who has every right to stand by his friend—and I applaud him for that. One can have doubts about the way in which the House dealt with my predecessor in matters of the appeal procedure, as I have. None the less, I have been a Member—I became one rather by accident—for a little more than 18 months, and I found the hon. Gentleman's remarks the saddest and most melancholic and graceless that I have heard. To turn against him a word that he used, I would even say that his remarks were disgraceful. They were very sad to listen to.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman found my remarks graceless. If Mr. Neil Hamilton is successful in his libel action against Mohammed Al Fayed, the hon. Gentleman will have fought a baseless campaign.

Mr. Bell: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his remarks. I will be very surprised if the people who made the difference in this matter—the electors of Tatton—are proved wrong.

I turn to the remarks by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), whom I regard as my friend, although I am not of his party or any other. I thoroughly endorse his remarks about Sir Gordon Downey—a remarkable public servant. People in public service who are not elected representatives normally do not expect to be exposed to the vilification to which he has been subjected in the past two years. He has dealt with it with enormous calmness and dignity, and the House and the nation owe him a debt of gratitude. To draw on my previous occupation, Sir Gordon Downey has shown a particular quality which one normally finds only in soldiers in difficult situations: courage under fire.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Kate Hoey): I want to use this opportunity, on behalf of the Leader of the House, who, unfortunately is not able to be present but has sent her apologies, to put on record the Government's support for and tribute to the work of Sir Gordon Downey. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have spoken of his record. I pay tribute to him, particularly for the way in which he has performed the duties of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards. He has been a most effective first occupant of the post. He has handled the setting up of the new arrangements for standards and privileges with great skill. He also had to handle some very difficult cases at the end of the previous Parliament. He set a high standard of service to the House, and has ensured that the office of parliamentary commissioner is highly respected. In doing so, he has helped to restore the reputation of the House. We wish him well.

We also welcome and support the House of Commons Commission's recommendation on the appointment of Elizabeth Filkin. Her recent role as the adjudicator for the Inland Revenue, Customs and Excise and the Department of Social Security Contributions Agency will ensure that she brings to the post a wealth of experience and a reputation for independence and integrity. We wish her well. We know that she will receive the full support of the House in her very important role, and we fully support the recommendation to appoint her.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West): There has been a range of contributions to this debate; I shall make a fairly limited speech.

The vast majority of the public do not know who Sir Gordon Downey is. There is no particular reason why they should. Although the post is a public appointment, the office-holder is not constantly on the radio or the television. Sir Gordon was almost invariably asked to discover whether there was evidence behind a complaint, and if there were, to consider the facts and put them to the Standards and Privileges Committee, of which the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) is the distinguished Chairman—not just as a result of his background but because he manages to get the Committee's members to agree. I endorse what he said in private that, if the Committee agrees unanimously, it carries far more weight.

One case fell out of the ordinary—the one considered in the eighth report. Paragraph 10 spells out clearly that the Speaker asked for something to happen that did not follow the usual way forward. Although I do not want to go further into events that may be considered in other places, it is worth noting that those who read the eighth report carefully will have an understanding of what happened and of the responsibilities of the commissioner and the Committee. In the appendix to the 19th report—the commissioner's valedictory report, if I may put it that way—people can see the range of disposals of complaints. Some were upheld, and some were not.

I have known Elizabeth Filkin in the past. She has been well chosen by the Commission. We should thank members of the Commission for their work. The Standards and Privileges Committee has thanked Sir Gordon Downey—not at great length, because the paragraph that thanks him does so properly and well. I hope that, in time, when we consider a successor to Elizabeth Filkin, the Committee will have earned as much respect as the commissioner. I hope that the House will have done so, too.

Anyone who believes that there are hon. Members who behave as badly as those in the past does not understand. According to the Cross-Bencher articles in the decade after the war, Members of Parliament engaged in a range of activities which make even the worst of us look pretty good. I take comfort from the fact that members of the public consider the standards of their own Member of Parliament to be high. Members of Parliament as a whole are considered not to be as good as we might be—although it is worth noting that we are generally considered to be better than Ministers as a whole. That may be the wrong way around; it is just the way that the public see it.

Let us stick to our responsibilities. I join those who congratulate Sir Gordon, who, when the Committee did not accept everything that he proposed, did not object. Let us remember that any recommendations made by the Committee were ours and not the commissioner's. Let us hope that, in future, the partnership between the people, Parliament, the Committee and the commissioner is as good as it has been recently.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I am grateful to hon. Members for their speeches. The only complaint that I would make about the remarks of the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), who is an old friend, is that he chose an inappropriate occasion on which to make them. Of course he is entitled to the views that he expressed; he has expressed them before. On reflection, he may consider that a substantive motion would have been a much better way in which to bring such important matters before the House.

The hon. Member for Aldershot is entitled, too, to his view of Sir Gordon Downey. Speaking on behalf of the House of Commons Commission, I certainly disagree with him. We should bear in mind the fact that Sir Gordon Downey took up the post of commissioner in the middle of a Parliament, when the new process was in gestation. It fell to him to adjudicate, in the light of common sense and reason, on many questions of interpretation posed by hon. Members. He discharged his task with great dignity. In co-operation with the Clerk of the Standards and Privileges Committee, he was able to include a corpus of detailed guidance in the code of conduct and the guide to the rules on which the House now relies. More than anything else, that is his legacy. Of course the process will evolve; of course there are lessons to be learned; of course there will be pressures on the individuals whom we appoint commissioners. The role that Sir Gordon established, which set standards for the future, will serve the House well in years to come.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will the hon. Gentleman address the important issue that I raised? If somebody makes false allegations against an hon. or right hon. Member, should that person be brought before the House to apologise and brought to book? Does the hon. Gentleman think that it is just a one-way street?

Mr. Kirkwood: Some of the facts and circumstances as related by the hon. Gentleman seem to me to show his misunderstanding of the position, because he is, indirectly or directly, criticising not the parliamentary commissioner, but the Committee itself. He is entitled to do so, but I should have thought that the appropriate way of doing so would be to table a substantive motion, which could then be amended and debated in the House in the proper way. He is investing the post with a degree of authority that the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards retiring and the prospective Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards do not have.

Let me direct the hon. Gentleman's attention to the annexe to the report that we are debating. The final point in the section detailing the job description states clearly that the principal duties are, inter alia,

"Receiving and investigating complaints about the conduct of Members (whether related directly to alleged breaches of the Code or not) and reporting her findings to the Committee."

Surely, that is the point. Any substantive complaints about past events should be directed at members of the Committee. That is right and proper.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) has raised an important issue. I hope that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) agrees that it is right to put it on the record that, in any future complaint, the complainant will be expected to carry the burden of providing evidence so that the commissioner will know whether there is something worth investigating. If the commissioner were satisfied that there was prima facie evidence that justified an investigation, I suspect that people who gave false evidence would find themselves in trouble, but those who gave evidence that did not fully substantiate the case would not necessarily face any penalty.

Mr. Kirkwood: I am only a humble member of the House of Commons Commission, but those points cover territory that should be considered by the Committee itself. I am sure that the new commissioner will closely examine our debate, which will be a positive step. I am happy to take back the points raised and ensure that the new commissioner gives them some thought, albeit in conjunction with the Clerks and the members of the Committee, because they are the people who will consider and develop our future procedures.

I can put my hand on my heart and give a cast-iron assurance to hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty), who was, quite rightly, concerned that the Commission should in future take the time to set out more details about a prospective candidate before the report came to the House for a final decision. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that a comprehensive and detailed board was set up in accordance with all the civil service equal opportunities provisions. There were 19 applications, reduced to a shortlist of five, consisting of three men and two women. The process of deliberation was exhaustive and resulted in two excellent final candidates. Others have not had the advantage of being able to cross-examine Elizabeth Filkin, but having had the benefit of doing so, I have no hesitation in saying that she is an appropriate person for the job.

The debate has been useful, albeit slightly tense at times. We on the Commission will certainly reflect on the substantive points raised. I hope that other hon. Members, including those who have spoken, will also reflect. To return to the main business, I urge the House to endorse the recommendation that the report contains.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That Ms Elizabeth Filkin be appointed Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards on the retirement of Sir Gordon Downey, KCB, on the terms of the Report of the House of Commons Commission (HC 1143), dated 9th November 1998.

Prisoners (Northern Ireland)

8.3 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Adam Ingram): I beg to move,

That the draft Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998 (Specified Organisations) (No. 2) Order 1998, which was laid before this House on 16th November, be approved.

Under the Good Friday agreement, both Governments promised to put in place an accelerated programme for the release of prisoners. That part of the agreement has caused deep heart searching for many, including those who have to implement it. For many of the victims of horrendous crimes over the years, it has renewed the pains and hurts that they still bear. The Government are working with them to address their needs and we shall continue to look at ways in which we can support and help the all too many victims of the past 30 years and their families.

However, despite the pain and the doubts, the issue of releases was and remains an integral part of the agreement, which was adopted by the participants, endorsed by the people and implemented by this Parliament in the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998. In the agreement, a clear condition was attached to the release of prisoners in paragraph 2, page 25, which states:

"Prisoners affiliated to organisations which have not established or are not maintaining a complete and unequivocal ceasefire will not benefit from the arrangements. The situation in this regard will be kept under review."

The Act passed by the House on 28 July reflects that condition in full. It also reflects the four factors that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, in the course of the referendum campaign, said would be taken into account in reaching an overall judgment on whether an organisation could benefit.

The agreement clearly linked the release of prisoners to the maintenance of a complete and unequivocal ceasefire. It is not for us to overturn the agreement and add new conditions or make new linkages. If we did so, what authority would we have to insist that others should also hold to their commitments without adding new conditions?

The draft order recognises that the Loyalist Volunteer Force has declared a complete and unequivocal ceasefire. The effect of the draft order is that the LVF will be removed from the list of specified organisations. Therefore, individuals affiliated to it will be eligible for the benefit of the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998. That benefit is the early release of prisoners convicted of scheduled offences committed before 10 April 1998, the date of the Good Friday agreement.

If an organisation is specified, members of that organisation do not qualify for early release. The draft order shows that the organisations that remain specified are the Continuity IRA, the Irish National Liberation Army and the Real IRA. The draft order is the result of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State keeping the security situation and relevant organisations under continual review. That review of our earlier judgment of the organisations to be specified has taken account of the ceasefires called by the LVF, the INLA and, more recently, the Real IRA.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): I hope that the Minister will take this opportunity to explain something that increasingly mystifies and disturbs many people, principally those on the mainland. How is it that the prisoner release process is proceeding apace, when nothing whatsoever appears to have happened regarding decommissioning of arms, explosives and other weapons? Can the Minister explain to frustrated voters on the mainland why that is happening, when earlier so much stress was laid on the fact that the two had to be intimately connected?

Mr. Ingram: Conservative Members could help to spread understanding of the Good Friday agreement. The agreement was not about that linkage, although aspects of the agreement related to decommissioning. I was going to refer to the totality of the agreement later in my speech, and I hope that that will provide an explanation. I call on everyone who has an understanding of the agreement not to create new parameters, or to try to define new dimensions or establish new preconditions; if they do so, they are no longer supporters of the Good Friday agreement, which the vast majority of people in Northern Ireland and in the Republic supported in overwhelming numbers. That is not to say that the issue has not been addressed: it is being addressed. Every Member of Parliament wants full decommissioning to happen.

I was saying that the review of our earlier judgment of the organisations to be specified had to take into account the ceasefires called by the LVF, the INLA and the Real IRA. Although our current conclusion is that no additional organisations should be specified, the situation will remain under review.

Let me deal with the organisations that are now specified in the order. The Continuity IRA has not declared a ceasefire and will, therefore, remain specified. The Real IRA announced a ceasefire on 7 September—a most welcome development. The worth of that ceasefire will have to be proved in word and deed over a longer period. I do not need to remind the House that this was the organisation responsible for the horrific events at Omagh which resulted in 29 deaths and many hundreds of others injured and traumatised. The Government are far from convinced that its ceasefire represents a genuine and lasting commitment to exclusively peaceful means.

The INLA also remains specified, since we are not yet persuaded that its ceasefire is complete and unequivocal. Its ceasefire was called on 22 August and, like the Real IRA, it still needs to demonstrate by word and deed its commitment now and in the future to exclusively peaceful and democratic means to pursue its objectives.

The Government will pursue those responsible for past terrorist crimes, and bring the full weight of the law to bear against those who continue to plan and perpetrate such evil acts.

Let me now refer to the Loyalist Volunteer Force. The Secretary of State is now satisfied that this organisation has established a complete and unequivocal ceasefire, and has done so over a significant period. Since May this year, the LVF has demonstrated that its ceasefire is being maintained. The decision that it should no longer be specified also recognises the significant contacts that the LVF has made, via an intermediary, with the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning.

The decision also takes into account the LVF's public commitment to make a start to decommissioning within a short period of its ceasefire being recognised.

Although other organisations have maintained their ceasefires for longer, no other organisation has committed itself to a start to decommissioning. We welcome the LVF's commitment. We look forward to it being honoured.

All the participants in the negotiations committed themselves to the total disarmament of all paramilitary organisations. Paragraph 3 of page 20 of the Good Friday agreement says:

"All participants accordingly reaffirm their commitment to the total disarmament of all paramilitary organisations. They also confirm their intention to continue to work constructively and in good faith with the Independent Commission, and to use any influence they may have, to achieve the decommissioning of all paramilitary arms within two years following endorsement in referendums North and South of the agreement and in the context of the implementation of the overall settlement."

In common with all commitments in the agreement, we look for tangible evidence that that commitment also is being implemented. The Government are living up to our commitments under the agreement; we expect everyone else to do so as well.

As I have said, all of those issues are kept under continuous review, taking into account all the evidence available on the best security advice, and taking into account all the factors prescribed in the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998 and the Good Friday agreement itself. We are working to ensure that, as the vast majority of people in Northern Ireland have indicated, there is no future for violence—it must be consigned to the past.

The future is in peace, in following the democratic path and in acknowledging other people's rights as one would expect them to acknowledge one's own. Arguments can and should be settled through discussion, consensus and the rule of law, and not through perpetual distrust and recourse to arbitrary and brutal violence. The Government are committed to seeing this process through, facing up to all the difficulties and, importantly, looking for resolutions to them. The way forward is through the implementation of the Good Friday agreement in all its parts. The order is part of this process. I commend it to the House.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Bracknell): First, I believe that the Secretary of State's timing is about right in reviewing her earlier judgments on specifying—or unspecifying, as the case may be—the various terrorist organisations. I welcome the fact that the Minister has come to the House with the order. I will not second-guess the security advice that the Secretary of State and the Minister have been given. I trust that advice and, therefore, the Opposition will not oppose—indeed, we will support—the order in any Division tonight.

Having said that, it is worth while reflecting that the Loyalist Volunteer Force has been one of the most evil, sectarian and psychopathic organisations that this country has had the misfortune to experience. Nothing that we do tonight by voting for the order in any way diminishes the evil of what has taken place.

I have noted carefully that, over the past few months since its ceasefire began, the LVF has promised that, once it has been unspecified by the Secretary of State, it will immediately start decommissioning all its illegally held arms and explosives. I hope that the LVF sticks to its word—it is vital that it does. It will be a useful nudge to those who have been extremely dilatory and have been dragging their feet by not decommissioning in any shape or form, even though they have signed up to the Good Friday agreement.

I wish to take issue, gently, with the Minister, who gave the impression to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) that there was no link between decommissioning and the early release of terrorist prisoners. On 20 April in the House, the Secretary of State said:

"I am sure that he and his colleagues understand that, according to the nature of the agreement, several things must happen in parallel in order to build confidence. That has always been the situation, whether it be decommissioning, the release of prisoners".—[Official Report, 20 April 1998; Vol. 310, c. 484.]

I agreed with the Secretary of State then. I fear that many will feel let down that that has not happened.

On 6 May, in reply to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister said:

"Yes. As the right hon. Gentleman rightly says, it is important to emphasise that people must sign up to the whole agreement and not to bits and pieces of it. The whole agreement stands as a package, and everyone who says yes to it is saying yes to all the agreement. They cannot say yes to the bits they like and leave aside the bits that they do not like; they must sign up to the agreement in its entirety."

Clearly, the paramilitaries have not done that, as shown by the lack of decommissioning.

Later—again in answer to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition—the Prime Minister said:

"Again, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman. It is essential that organisations that want to benefit from the early release of prisoners should give up violence. Decommissioning is part of that, of course".—[Official Report, 6 May 1998; Vol. 311, c. 711.]

That has not happened.

During the referendum campaign—when we rightly campaigned for a yes vote in the Province—the Prime Minister, at the Balmoral showgrounds, said on 14 May:

"The Agreement is what has to be implemented, in all its parts. In clarifying whether the terms and spirit of the Agreement are being met and whether violence has genuinely been given up for good, there are a range of factors to take into account . . . progressive abandonment and dismantling of paramilitary structures actively directing and promoting violence; full co-operation with the Independent Commission on decommissioning to implement the provisions of the Agreement".

Again, the people of Northern Ireland have a right to feel let down, because there has not been that co-operation. Although 204 terrorist prisoners have been released early by the Government, there has been no sign of any decommissioning of illegally held weapons—not one gun, not one ounce of Semtex.

Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes): Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that, when the previous Government were in power, early prisoner releases were taking place, yet there were no unequivocal ceasefires?

Mr. MacKay: There was a change in the rules to release prisoners, and the hon. Lady is correct. I am not saying that there should be no release of prisoners. That was in the Good Friday agreement, as the Minister of State has rightly pointed out. The Government have shown their good faith to the paramilitaries by releasing prisoners early. I object to the fact that they have continued to release prisoners—204 terrorist prisoners have now been released early—even though there has been no sign of decommissioning of illegally held weapons. I have said on a number of occasions that the Prime Minister should have drawn a line in the sand and said that no more terrorist prisoners would be released early until there was substantial and verifiable decommissioning.

Reasonable people on the mainland and in the Province cannot understand why there is continuing early release of terrorist prisoners when there is no sign of decommissioning. As the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) might recall, I put that to the Secretary of State at the most recent Northern Ireland Question Time on 28 October. She replied:

"I have made clear to the right hon. Gentleman on other occasions the words of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I shall repeat them. He said that decommissioning is crucial, that it is a central part of the agreement and that we want all dimensions to move in parallel. If there is no progress, we will review it."—[Official Report, 28 October 1998; Vol. 318, c. 322.]

Clearly, the dimensions are not moving in parallel. The Good Friday agreement is now seven months old, and if there is no decommissioning, but there are prisoner releases, the dimensions are not running in parallel as the Secretary of State and I rightly believe they should. I therefore suggest that a review of the situation is long overdue. The right hon. Lady willingly admitted to me that it should be reviewed.

I warn the Minister of State, in the gentlest way, that the agreement made in Belfast on Good Friday, which he and I strongly support, will be in jeopardy if there is continuing early terrorist release without substantial and viable decommissioning, not to mention the problems that the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble), the First Minister in the Assembly, has in appointing Ministers to the Executive. The right hon. Gentleman has correctly said that he is not prepared to appoint Sinn Fein Ministers until there is substantial and verifiable decommissioning. I hope that the Minister agrees that no politician can hold ministerial office, with all the responsibilities that that entails, while his paramilitary associates retain their guns and explosives.

The House must remember that the IRA and Sinn Fein are one and the same.

Mr. Ingram indicated assent.

Mr. MacKay: The Minister nods vigorously. I am always pleased to hear the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State say that the IRA and Sinn Fein are inextricably linked. There is, therefore, absolutely no doubt in my mind that, if Mr. Adams and Mr. McGuinness were in favour of decommissioning, there would be no problem in achieving it. They have seen a substantial number of their terrorist friends released from prison early without any decommissioning taking place, so they have said, "It does not look as though there is any need for decommissioning. We can have what we want from the bargain. We can cherry-pick and have our prisoners released and retain all our arms and explosives."

The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State will have to say to all the paramilitaries, whether they are so-called loyalist or republican, "You will not have one more terrorist prisoner released early under the agreement unless you comply with the rest of the agreement and start substantially to decommission." It is not good enough for Mr. McGuinness to say, as he did in an interview on the same radio station as me last week, "Well, we have two years to do it." Any reasonable person would say that, seven months on, if there is absolutely no sign of decommissioning, that is not satisfactory.

Conservative Members are not saying that every gun and every ounce of Semtex should already have been handed in or handed in before any prisoners were released. We are certainly not saying that any of the terrorist organisations must publicly hand in their weapons. All we want is for decommissioning to be verifiable by the decommissioning commission because we, like the Minister, have full faith in General de Chastelain. The method is secondary to the process taking place.

Mr. Ingram: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with the assessment of the Secretary of State and of me that the Provisional IRA is currently engaged in an unequivocal ceasefire? It is, therefore, a beneficiary under the Act and should remain so because that is the basis on which the Act was passed by the House in response to the Good Friday agreement.

Mr. MacKay: An unequivocal ceasefire, as the Prime Minister said at the Dispatch Box on 6 May in response to the Leader of the Opposition, my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), has to include decommissioning. I warmly welcome, as does the Minister, the fact that there has been a cessation of violence, but it is not an unequivocal cessation. He and I cannot sit comfortably until all the paramilitaries, not just the Provisional IRA, fully comply with the conditions that they signed up to in Belfast on Good Friday, and they are clearly not doing so. Let us be blunt—there is absolutely no decommissioning going on.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): We speak of an unequivocal ceasefire, but weapons have been used by terrorists. That is a sham when it is claimed not by the IRA or UVF, but by others. However, is it not more significant that the spokespersons representing the UVF and the IRA, who sit with the general on the decommissioning commission, have said publicly that they will not decommission?

Mr. MacKay: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. I know that the Minister has said publicly that the remarks of Mr. Adams and Mr. McGuinness that the Provisional IRA will not decommission were deeply regrettable. I hope that they will think again, but I fear that they will do so only if they are told by the Prime Minister that no more of their terrorist friends will be released early from prison.

To take up another point made by the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth), although it strays slightly wide of the order, none of us can be comfortable with the punishment beatings and intimidation that continue, and while they continue, there is no complete and unequivocal renunciation of violence. On balance, that is not serious enough for us to respecify organisations, but I hope that the Minister and the Secretary of State will make it clear that if punishment beatings continue, the organisations proved to be involved will lose their status under the order. That is a wicked and evil form of violence, which the Minister and I know intimidates some of the weakest and most vulnerable members of the community in the Province.

Mr. Ingram: I assure the right hon. Gentleman that, as I said in my opening remarks, all the elements on which any paramilitary or terrorist organisation is judged are continually kept under review, and we act on the basis of the best security advice available. The Secretary of State has made it clear that she will not hesitate to exercise her judgment correctly and proportionately on any breach of those conditions.

Mr. MacKay: I am, as usual, grateful to the Minister of State. It is important that, when we are debating this sensitive issue in the House, we never let those who are the victims of so-called punishment beatings and intimidation, who are often those in the poorest areas of the Province, feel that they have been forgotten or that they are vaguely expendable in the greater political process in which the Minister and I are engaged. It is vital that the House sends a clear message; I am extremely grateful to the Minister for doing so.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): Does my right hon. Friend recall that, last month, he and I met representatives of a newly formed group, Families Acting for Innocent Relatives, and does he recall the deep sense of injustice felt by those representatives of the Protestant community of south Armagh in particular, about early release without decommissioning?

Mr. MacKay: I most certainly do remember the occasion. I have been in correspondence since, and I am due to meet representatives of Families Acting for Innocent Relatives. The families concerned, especially those that live in and near south Armagh, have a genuine grievance. Substantial terrorist activity is continuing. Innocent people on both sides of the sectarian divide are being intimidated, and are very scared. I am sure that the Minister is well aware of that and that, like me, he would like that to be stopped as soon as possible. I hope quite soon to visit south Armagh to see for myself at first hand what that organisation of very brave people has to show me. I very much concur with my hon. Friend.

Tonight the House must give the following clear message. Yes, we pass the order unspecifying the LVF, but we insist that the LVF decommissions as it promised and declare that, if it does not do so, the matter will be reviewed again; moreover, we shall stop releasing terrorist prisoners early until we have substantial and verifiable decommissioning on behalf of all paramilitaries, whatever side of the sectarian divide they come from.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): The right hon. Member for Bracknell (Mr. MacKay) knows that I share his profound revulsion at the murderous psychotic members of the LVF, and others like them. I am sure that all hon. Members share that revulsion. I have said often enough in this place that we live in a mature parliamentary democracy, and that the activities of such psychotic people are those of the mobster—of Chicago in the 1920s and 1930s.

I believe that the right hon. Member for Bracknell acts in good faith when he offers legitimate criticisms of the utter lack of progress on the almost insoluble issue of decommissioning. However, I believe that the Minister has acted with good sense and courage in relation to the order—it is a curious way of putting it—in unspecifying those psychotic people. I sometimes wish that we could unspecify them out of our hair, but that may be too much to hope.

The hon. Members for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) and for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) know that I have often said—as did the right hon. Member for Bracknell earlier—that I detest the dreadful punishment beatings. They are the acts of gangsters, some of whom claim—absurdly and obscenely—to be engaged in a military campaign, either defending the Union or seeking its partial destruction where the north of Ireland is concerned.

I agree that the decommissioning issue was always going to be the most difficult problem to tackle in relation to north-south relations, east-west relations and other developments. I do not have the answers. I believe that, in the fulness of time, decommissioning will take place—that it will be brought about by the efforts of the Government and of all those actively involved in politics in Northern Ireland. General de Chastelain has an important role to play. His patient, painstaking work and that of his colleagues will help enormously in this matter, but I believe that it will be a slow process.

Like the right hon. Member for Bracknell, I should love to see what he called substantial and verifiable demonstrations of decommissioning. Yes, we all desire to see such gestures by those psychotic people. I should also like those members of the American Congress—some of whom I met in Washington—who appear to be fully paid-up members of Sinn Fein-IRA, to urge their friends, or "comrades", in Northern Ireland to act more constructively. I wish that, now that the peace process is in operation and the House is legislating for radical constitutional change in the United Kingdom, they would play a more constructive part vis-a-vis their friends in the north.

I believe that progress in decommissioning will be brought about to a large extent by what I have called the patient or painstaking work of General de Chastelain and his colleagues and others, but it will be a hard road to follow. Sinn Fein-IRA could do much more to help things along. Recently, we have heard some very disingenuous—to put it mildly—statements by Sinn Fein representatives. For the people of Northern Ireland—the men, women and children represented by the two Northern Ireland Members present, the hon. Members for Belfast, South and for Fermanagh and South Tyrone—let us have a substantial and verifiable form of decommissioning. However, as I said to the Minister, it was right and proper to bring the order to the House.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): The issue of prisoner release is creating immense difficulties for those who are set the task of putting in place a devolved structure in Northern Ireland that can meet the expectations of society as a whole.

I agree with all that has been said about the LVF to the effect that its members are ruthless killers. Those are sectarian killers. They are not people for whom I or any of my colleagues have the slightest sympathy.

[Mr. Ken Maginnis]

I shall raise one small issue with the right hon. Member for Bracknell (Mr. MacKay), who has said that those in the LVF are the most ruthless and sectarian killers. For someone who has lived in Northern Ireland for the past almost 30 years of violence, there is no such thing as the most ruthless. Each terrorist organisation—

Mr. MacKay: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maginnis: I shall not give way at this stage. I may be nit-picking—

Mr. MacKay: I said "some of the most ruthless" killers.

Mr. Maginnis: The right hon. Gentleman will perhaps allow me, at his expense, to make my point.

Each and every terrorist organisation—whether it be a terrorist organisation that has a political wing, that political wing having been involved in a talks process, or whether it be a terrorist organisation that is without a political wing—has displayed the utmost ruthlessness at some time during the past 28 years. One must look at what is being achieved by accepting the declaration of the LVF—an organisation with no political wing. The LVF obviously feels that it will not be taken seriously unless it makes an offer to Government—remember that self-interest is involved—regarding the release of prisoners. To secure their release, the organisation is prepared not only to declare an end to violence but to surrender its guns, disarm or decommission—whatever euphemism is most acceptable to it.

That creates a difference between the LVF and other organisations such as the Provisional IRA, the Ulster Defence Association and the Ulster Volunteer Force. Those organisations have politically linked parties. There is much real linkage between the politicians—the Adamses and the McGuinnesses—and organisations such as the IRA. Others in other political parties are linked in the same way. One must now ask whether we have made good progress and whether the Government are as assiduous in seeking to make progress at this stage as they were in March and April this year. I believe that both our Government and the Irish Government are failing to show the enthusiasm for implementing the agreement that they demonstrated in achieving the agreement in March and April. That is a fundamental mistake.

We must remember that the LVF did not accept that agreement; it rejected it. That is why the organisation continued its violence after agreement was reached. We must not forget that fact because it may have repercussions: members of that organisation may be imprisoned for long periods as a result. We must wonder at what stage, having achieved its objective of getting prisoners released in return for decommissioning, we shall see the LVF resume violence—they are ruthless people—under that or some other convenient name, as part of a campaign to have others released.

The Minister shakes his head. I have been around for too long to trust any terrorist. I know how terrorists on both sides are willing to exploit what they perceive as weakness on the part of the Government—and that weakness has been displayed by both parties in government during my time in the House.

When taking stock, one must get over the notion that, because the LVF does not have a politically linked group, it is somehow worse than the UDA or the IRA. As the IRA, through Sinn Fein, is likely to be involved in the Executive—although certainly not immediately because it has not qualified—we should remember what Martin McGuinness and Gerry Adams, in particular, stand for. Let me remind the House who Gerry Adams is. He is the person who, in 1983, said:

"The IRA does not need an electoral mandate for armed struggle. It derives its mandate from the presence of the British in the six counties."

In 1986, he said:

"For our part, this leadership has been active in the longest phase of resistance to the British presence. Our record speaks for itself . . . The tactic of armed struggle is of primary importance."

So we move down the years. In 1988, Gerry Adams said:

"Armed struggle is seen as a political option. Its use is considered in terms of achieving national political aims and the efficacy of other forms of struggle."

We move on to 1989. Gerry Adams complained:

"The British government rarely listens to the force of argument. It understands only the argument of force . . . Armed struggle, however, is not merely a defensive reaction by an oppressed people. It sets the political agenda. Thus armed struggle can advance the overall struggle to the advantage of those in whose interests it is waged . . . armed struggle is a necessary and morally correct form of resistance in the six counties."

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maginnis: I shall give way when I have completed these quotations. It is important to recognise that the thinking of IRA-Sinn Fein and its leader, Gerry Adams, has not changed down the years. In 1990, he said:

"We believe that Irish people have the right to use armed struggle in the context of seeking Irish independence and in the conditions of British occupation of the six counties."

In 1994, he said:

"The causes of conflict are still on-going".

That was at a time when he was considering calling a ceasefire. Therefore, we must put that ceasefire in context—if we need to do so after Canary Wharf. He continued:

"Every so often there will be a spectacular to remind the world."

Gerry Adams summed up his attitude to violence by saying:

"The tactic of armed struggle is of primary importance because it provides a vital cutting edge. Without it the issue of Ireland would not even have become an issue. So, in effect the armed struggle becomes armed propaganda."

We must look carefully at an organisation linked to a paramilitary force that has never repudiated or retracted that philosophy. When the Secretary of State said last week in her speech to the Royal United Services Institute for Defence Studies that the IRA had said that it had accepted a partitionist solution, she was indulging in a flight of fancy. The IRA—and hence its paramilitary linked party, Sinn Fein—has never accepted any such thing.

Mr. Winnick: As the hon. Gentleman quoted Mr. Adams, perhaps he would be interested to know that, in September 1983, at a meeting with Mr. Adams, I asked him what mandate he had from the Irish people as a whole for the terrorism of the IRA. I also said that no British Government would ever surrender to the IRA against the wishes of the majority of people in Northern Ireland, and I was not proved wrong. The peace process demonstrates that terrorism will not bring about the kind of unitary state that Mr. Adams wants. It can be brought about only when the majority of people in Northern Ireland say that that is what they want.

Mr. Maginnis: The hon. Gentleman's intervention is helpful and bears out much of what I believe. I am trying to impress on the House the fact that we are going through a process in which, whatever we achieve—I supported what was achieved on 10 April—cannot be implemented by only one party to the agreement, while the other party procrastinates.

I illustrate that by pointing out to right hon. and hon. Members that the issue of prisoner releases had to be addressed over a two-year period. No start date was specified for prisoner releases, yet the Government moved ahead at the earliest opportunity, and within five months of beginning, have released more than half the prisoners who may be eligible.

If that is the way in which the Government are prepared to implement the agreement, with all the risks attached, it cannot be improper for those of us who want disarmament and verification of that process to say, "No, there never was a specified starting date for disarmament, but in the agreement it was predicated on the same basis as prisoner releases." It had to be completed within two years of the date of the referendum, and it could not possibly happen in the last week, as Martin McGuinness suggests. It must be an on-going process.

Reassurance and confidence building are a two-way street. Many of us have accepted the advice of people such as Michael von Tangen Page of the department of peace studies at the university of Bradford, who pointed out that, in most civil conflicts, it is usually necessary to release prisoners in order to bring about a clean cut-off from terrorism as one moves towards democracy. That is what I read into what Michael von Tangen Page has written, which is cited in a research paper produced by the Library.

If I accept that, I must look to see whether there has been a clean cut-off between the violence and the new democratic process. That is what I voted for on 22 May and again on 25 June. I believe that it is what most of the 70-plus per cent. of the people of Northern Ireland voted for on those occasions. If Government—perhaps I should say if the parties to the agreement—do not meet their obligations in that respect, confidence will be undermined and it will become virtually impossible to make the political process work as we had hoped that it would.

My party leader asked the Prime Minister on 13 May whether he would "make clear that those obligations"— the obligations to disarm and so on—

"which are clearly set out in the agreement, will be made effective and reflected in forthcoming legislation?"

The Prime Minister replied:

"Yes—I intend to make it clear that the commitment and the obligations in the agreement must all be fulfilled and that no one can choose to fulfil some parts of the agreement and not others."—[Official Report, 13 May 1998; Vol. 312, c. 365.]

We must build confidence at each and every opportunity that presents itself. That is why I welcome the decision to test the LVF, but I do not want that organisation tested softly. I want it tested in the most stringent manner.

Since 10 April, there have been two sides to the situation in Northern Ireland—not Protestant and Roman Catholic, and not nationalist and Unionist. The two sides now are the terrorists who have yet to cross the psychological hurdle of abandoning terrorism, with all that that implies, and the law-abiding citizenry of Northern Ireland, both Protestant and Roman Catholic. The Minister, the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister must begin to reassure us that their enthusiasm for implementation, their attention to detail and their expectation in respect of all parties are as strong as was their desire for an agreement in the first place.

There are various indicators of the progress that has been made. Particularly in respect of Sinn Fein-IRA, which will be in the Executive of a devolved Government if it meets the criteria laid down, there are a number of indicators that must be examined carefully at this stage. We must ask ourselves why the entire energies of Sinn Fein-IRA are now directed exclusively against the Royal Ulster Constabulary, in every respect possible, down to intimidating a football team in West Belfast into refusing to take part in a football competition because the RUC was the team that it drew in the competition.

I have listened to members of the Roman Catholic tradition in Northern Ireland—people for whom I have the highest respect, such as Monsignor Denis Faul. I have heard them tell what it is really like, from the Catholic side of the community, to have to face up to the IRA's intimidation. I also hear exactly the same thing from people within my own tradition in respect of the UVF and the UDA. I always feel obliged to say that all organisations that indulge in terror are equally obnoxious to me.

The Government of the Irish Republic have been found wanting. I am particularly disappointed that Bertie Ahern, who I believed had the courage to move things forward, has been equivocal about those who sit in the Northern Ireland Assembly.

When it was announced that the LVF was to be brought aboard the scheme for prisoner releases because of its ceasefire and willingness to disarm, Bertie Ahern had no need to say, "But this does not mean anything as far as the IRA is concerned." How does Bertie Ahern, the Taoiseach of the Irish Republic, know that, unless that is the message that he has been getting? If that is the message that he has been getting from the IRA, he should be sharing that message with our Secretary of State and with our Prime Minister, and they should act immediately to bring an end to prisoner releases and the process that was intended to allow us all to move into a devolved democratic mode in Northern Ireland.

Those are the questions that I must ask. I do not have an answer to all the questions. When I put my hand up for the agreement on 10 April, I never believed that everything would be easy; that it would not take time; that there would not be fears and suspicions; that there would not be delaying processes—

Dr. Godman: I have listened to the hon. Gentleman closely. He may criticise the lack of enthusiasm shown by

[Dr. Godman]

Ministers here and by the Taoiseach and his Ministers, but he cannot deny that they are all utterly committed to progress in these matters. Surely commitment as well as enthusiasm is important.

Mr. Maginnis: Commitment is a wonderful thing, but in this case the energy to realise one's ambitions is more wonderful still.

The two Governments have the power and authority to insist—it is not within the power of my party to insist—that all meet their obligations as we advance what is now called the peace process.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) has done everything in his power. He has been assiduous in putting into place every measure that can encourage even those who have been our enemies for the past 28 years.

I leave the House with this thought, which may help it to understand. Sinn Fein-IRA, through Adams and McGuinness, used to clamour to speak to a Minister in the Northern Ireland Office. That happened. Then they clamoured to speak to a member of the Cabinet—the Secretary of State. That happened. Then they clamoured to speak to the Prime Minister, and the day they walked out of No. 10 Downing street for the first time, they did not tell us what progress they were going to make. They did not tell us how they would remove the threat that they pose to society in Northern Ireland, and they did not even tell us what they had said to the Prime Minister. They said that they had to meet my right hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann. Hon. Members will remember that my right hon. Friend was persuaded, from both sides of the House, that he should concede that particular point, and he has done so. Again, he has seen no reward for his industry.

It is time for stocktaking. This is the first opportunity that we have had to consider the prisoner issue and other issues relevant to progress in Northern Ireland. I hope that the Minister will give us some small suggestion of the time scale within which he hopes to stocktake in public and tell us where the Government are going in relation to the problems that we face.

9.5 pm

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): In our judgment, the order is good news because it suggests that the process is working. If the Secretary of State has the evidence to make her confident that the Loyalist Volunteer Force should be removed from the specified list, that suggests that other organisations are leaving the path of violence and accepting that there is a more attractive, peaceful alternative.

As for the related issues that were mentioned by the right hon. Member for Bracknell (Mr. MacKay) and the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis), it is clear that there is a relationship between prisoner release, decommissioning, specified organisations and the peace process. As the Minister has said, however, and it needs to be emphasised repeatedly, we cannot renegotiate the Good Friday agreement and, as a result, there are clear consequences for prisoner release in respect of that text, which must be honoured. I do not imagine that any hon. Member is suggesting otherwise. The issues relating to the Good Friday agreement are now accepted, implicitly at least, but the relationships between decommissioning and removing specified organisations from the list, and the prisoner releases that that entails, seem to be the biggest sticking point.

We must recognise the importance of flexibility in the process. If there had not been flexibility in the debate before the Good Friday agreement and thereafter, we would not be making such progress. One of the biggest difficulties in Northern Irish politics was the unwillingness of anyone to move an inch from often dogmatic positions, but we find ourselves in a much more fluid environment. It is a testimony to all sides in Northern Irish politics that the sometimes risky moves that have been made have led to the breakthroughs which appear to be consolidating the peace as it stands.

To that extent, notwithstanding the examples cited by the right hon. Member for Bracknell from the Prime Minister's quotations, we must recognise that flexibility remains a key consideration—a key concern—as we attempt to find a way forward on the sticking point of decommissioning.

Decommissioning will be a problem, although some people regard it as a merely symbolic issue. I regard it as more than that, and other hon. Members have said the same, but it is appropriate for us to keep our eye on the ball and on the big picture—the elimination of violence in Northern Ireland and its replacement with a peaceful alternative. To that extent, the flexibility that Ministers, as well as Northern Ireland politicians, have shown has led to a direct reward in terms of the progress that we have made.

What is more, apparently intransigent comments on both sides have sometimes led to surprising breakthroughs. Forty-eight hours before the Good Friday agreement was settled, one hon. Member said that the chance of a successful outcome was less than 5 per cent. I understand why he said that, but let us not fool ourselves: it is sometimes expedient for individuals to make strong statements in defence of their position, which could shift. On that occasion, it did so radically. I was so surprised by the odds and the result that I seriously thought about doing the lottery.

If we are realistic and honest with ourselves, similar breakthroughs could occur in respect of those who resist decommissioning. It has been a testimony to Northern Irish politicians that they have often not accepted that failure is an option in this process. The public in Northern Ireland have been clear that they want lasting peace. There have been acts of faith all down the line. The religious interpretation of an act of faith is believing in something that one cannot see. Perhaps nothing short of a political miracle is required before we can make progress on decommissioning, but breakthroughs have been made repeatedly in the past few years, beginning with the previous Administration's courageous efforts to kick the process off and continuing with the current Government's efforts and successes. Therefore I do not entirely share the concerns of the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone. I am an optimist, based on the evidence so far.

A subject that has already been mentioned is punishment beatings. Although bombings and shootings seem to have declined massively as reported in the traditional sense on the "Nine O'clock News", and, in the case of many organisations, disappeared altogether, punishment beatings remain at a high level. Evidence suggests that the occurrence of punishment beatings far exceeds the official police record. One need not be a genius to understand why many are not reported. The victims suffer appallingly and some have their lives threatened. Will the Minister assure the House and the public at large that the Government do not find the current level of punishment beatings in the Province acceptable? Will the Government tackle the problem directly with those who may have an influence, and indirectly through the security forces, as a short-term concern that must be headed off?

The hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone showed great insight into the relationship between the LVF and political bodies. To the best of my understanding, the LVF has no clear connection with a particular political group in Northern Ireland. He is right to point out that other dangers lie ahead. Some individuals who are intent on pursuing a course of violence may be tempted back to that bankrupt philosophy. I hope that the security forces and the Government will watch for the danger signs, because violence is bound to corrupt the peace process and we want no backward steps.

The order represents progress and I am pleased to support it. It is a credit to the generally sensible speeches that we hear in the House and a testament to the people and politicians in Northern Ireland who have shown great courage in exploring, in a flexible way, new processes to achieve the result that we all want. The current circumstances show great promise. We have heard about the issues, but so long as we build up a momentum behind the peace process and keep making it clear that results are being achieved in a practical way, our discussions may be instrumental in achieving the necessary breakthroughs in decommissioning and punishment beatings, so that we may make peace a lasting and consolidated outcome. At the moment, the process promises to deliver an awful lot more than many of us imagined possible.

Mr. Ingram: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I do not intend to go over all the points, because I dealt with many of the issues raised in the debate in my opening remarks. I pay tribute to hon. Members who have contributed to the debate, because they have raised important issues. Everyone welcomed the order, although such a welcome was not forthcoming when the first order was placed before the House.

I shall deal with two key points that the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) made. He said that there was no obligation on the Government to deal with prisoner releases within a time frame. I shall quote to him from the Good Friday agreement. On page 25, paragraph 3 of the section on prisoners says:

"Both Governments will complete a review process within a fixed time frame and set prospective release dates for all qualifying prisoners. The review process would provide for the advance of the release dates of qualifying prisoners while allowing account to be taken of the seriousness of the offences for which the person was convicted and the need to protect the community. In addition, the intention would be that should the circumstances allow it, any qualifying prisoners who remained in custody two years after the commencement of the scheme would be released at that point."

Importantly, paragraph 4 says:

"The Governments will seek to enact the appropriate legislation to give effect to these arrangements by the end of June 1998."

We were not able to do that, but we completed the legislation, which was endorsed by the House, in July 1998. I want to make it clear that the Government will continue to honour all their commitments under the Good Friday agreement. We expect every other party to that agreement to do the same.

The hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone warned that the Government and Ministers responsible for such matters should be wary of the LVF returning to its violent ways after it has achieved the release of its prisoners, under its own name, by redefining itself under another name or by using a proxy organisation. I again want to make it clear that, if any organisation returns to violence and is in breach of its ceasefire, it should understand that its prisoners will have been released on licence, and released prisoners will be recalled to prison if they either give support to an organisation that re-engages in terrorist activities or re-engage in such activities themselves.

That was made abundantly clear when the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998 was being passed. Prisoners of a despecified organisation who have been or are likely to be released in the future are on licence, and the position will constantly be reviewed. Their organisations and any acts that they may carry out in support of those organisations will be monitored.

Mr. Maginnis: I am grateful to the Minister for his comments, but that is such a conditional assurance as to be meaningless. We have already pointed out that, once prisoners are released, the onus is on the Government to prove not that the organisation has changed its name and is active again, but that released prisoners are acting in support of that organisation, which means that everything has to start from the beginning.

The Minister knows that records are being pushed to one side and destroyed. People may have been out of prison for some time, so it will be virtually impossible for any effective action to be taken—in a normal society that may be acceptable. The Minister should recognise that this is a useless measure, because that would make him and those responsible more alert to what they are doing as prisoners are released.

Mr. Ingram: I do not want to open up a debate on this matter. I ask the hon. Gentleman to take the assurances that I am giving him from the Dispatch Box, which the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister have also given, about the nature of the sentencing legislation. It is specific and has not been put in place merely to be implemented and then forgotten about. We rigorously hold to those conditions. If an organisation returns to its violent ways, any individual who has been released as a member of that organisation and who subsequently participates in support of the organisation or of any organisation that is acting as a proxy for that organisation will be returned to prison. I ask the hon. Gentleman to accept assurances that have been given in good faith, and with determination and commitment.

We must hope that all the organisations that we have despecified maintain the ceasefire, and that the organisations that are the subject of the order hear what has been said and understand the message—that the people north and south in the island of Ireland want a peaceful future. They do not act other than for their own approach; they do not represent any body of opinion. The hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone made that point in his speech. The good people of the island of Ireland—both Northern Ireland and the Republic—made their view clear in the referendum, and I think that more people are signing up to what the future will entail if we can move the process forward.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) raised the issue of what people describe as punishment beatings. As I have said from the Dispatch Box before, the word "punishment" should not be used in this context, because it gives a form of justification to paramilitary assaults performed on people within their own community. The hon. Gentleman asked for a number of assurances in regard to the Government's approach. I have given them before, and I now give them again. We are resolute, and will continue to monitor the position. When we can exert pressure to end such action, we will.

The Royal Ulster Constabulary is active in that regard as well, but we must prove the case, and we must have evidence of where the action is taking place. We cannot act on the basis of what people may be saying to the newspapers, or what some people may believe to be happening; in all instances, the case must be proved before we can act. Nevertheless, the conduct of those who perpetrate such acts against their own people is unacceptable and should cease forthwith, as I said in response to the right hon. Member for Bracknell (Mr. MacKay).

We have had a useful discussion. I think that the motion has enabled us to make progress, and I hope that we can build on that.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998 (Specified Organisations) (No. 2) Order 1998, which was laid before this House on 16th November, be approved.

COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Ordered,

That Mr. Stephen Twigg be discharged from the Committee of Public Accounts and Mr. Derek Twigg be added.—[Mr. Hanson.]

PETITION

East Kent Health Authority

9.22 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): The petition has been signed by 34,000 people gathered by an organisation called Concern for Hospitals in East Kent, which opposes the rundown of Kent and Canterbury hospital in my constituency. The petition was prompted by outrage about the consultation process organised by East Kent health authority, following which the views of no fewer than 27 organisations were misrepresented in the authority's document. In view of that, the petitioners say that they lack confidence in East Kent health authority to provide appropriate health care for the population of east Kent.

The Petitioners therefore ask that the House of Commons urges the Secretary of State for Health to take steps to replace the current members of the East Kent Health Authority with people who will truly respect the health needs of the people of East Kent.

I thoroughly endorse every word of that.

To lie upon the Table.

Clothing and Textile Industry

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Hanson.]

9.23 pm

Mr. Phil Woolas (Oldham, East and Saddleworth): It is delightful to be able to introduce a debate on the prospects of the clothing and textile industries. The debate refers to the carpet and footwear industries as well, because a newly re-established all-party group is attempting to reach across the spectrum of the sector, and those industries constitute an important part of our work. Indeed, my work as chairman of the new group has been rewarding, although it has coincided with a huge fall in the number of jobs in the industry; I hope that it is a coincidence and not cause and effect. The group is working hard on behalf of the sector. I should like to place on record my thanks to all the members of the group who have taken part.

One of our main achievements has been to establish an industry advisory group, which brings together industrialists, academics, employers and trade unions from throughout the sector. It is to that body that we turn for advice, on which some of my remarks will be based.

Another implication of the establishment of that group is that I am forced, although it is a pleasant duty, to wear British-made clothing on every public occasion. My suit and tie were made in the United Kingdom. Indeed, everything that I wear that you cannot see, Mr. Deputy Speaker, was also made in the UK. After close conversations this evening, I am delighted to be able to report that the Minister is also wearing a British-made suit.

The advisory group to the all-party parliamentary group estimates that, this year, some 25,000 jobs have been lost in the industry. In the trade-unionised sector alone, job losses have been running at about 500 a month. I give just one example of how important the industry is in one region. In the east midlands, the Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire Clothing and Textiles Association reports that 3,000 jobs will be lost this year; that represents some 6 per cent. of the sector in the region.

I do not want to be a merchant of doom—far from it; we must not, whatever we do, talk down the industry. Nor is it responsible to talk down the manufacturing sector as a whole. However—it is a big however—there is no doubt that the industry is in what the Governor of the Bank of England has described as an exposed sector of the economy.

The industry is important to many communities, to seven regions and, of course, to the national economy. According to House of Commons statistics, based on the industrial classification statistics that are available, the industry directly employs some 359,000 people. That makes it larger than the farming industry, car industry and chemical industry, to name just three. In answer to a question, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said:

"The textiles industry is one of the largest manufacturing sectors in the United Kingdom, with sales of more than £17 billion."—[Official Report, 13 May 1998; Vol. 312, c. 369.]

The total value of exports last year was £8 billion.

This debate is not, however, about macro-economic policy. Sustained, stable growth within the context of low inflation is what our industry needs. Having said that, there is no doubt that the value of sterling recently has caused problems. Nor, however, must we over-egg the pudding. Sometimes, the value of sterling has been used by industrialists as an excuse to bring forward a process that was happening anyway. However, I cite the case of Saddleworth woollen mill in my constituency, which closes tragically this Friday after 150 years in the woollen business—woollen spinning on the site can be traced back 1,000 years—with the loss of a further 110 jobs. There is no doubt that it was the value of the pound, particularly in the second half of last year, that was the straw that broke the camel's back.

Overall, the value of exports in the first half of this year has fallen by 20 per cent. That coincided with a number of events throughout the world: the collapse of the far east, or certainly the significant fall of the far east market, and the near collapse of the Russian market. Interestingly, the mild summer has added to the problems. I know that even the Prime Minister could not solve that one, although I have heard people in my party demanding a solution. Whatever the problems, whether they be short term or outside the influence of Ministers, all of us in the industry know that globalisation has been going on throughout this century.

I do not wish to base my appeal for support of the clothing and textile industry on nostalgia or heritage—although the United Kingdom continues to produce the best cloth and clothing in the world. I could mention Nottingham lace, Savile row suits or even—given my Lancastrian background—Yorkshire wool, but I could not do justice to them. Kidderminster carpets are the best in the world. In my own region, king cotton is, and has been for many years, the market leader. The clothing and textile industries in Northern Ireland and Scotland produce some of the world's finest products. If I have omitted to mention the constituencies of any colleagues, it is not to be rude, but only because the list is very long. As I said, I do not want our appeal to be based on nostalgia; it must be based on the importance of the industry to our economy, and on the industry's many future opportunities.

Globalisation brings new problems. Production in a clothing factory can be switched offshore with one telephone call from a buyer—as many factories across the country have regularly discovered. Despite the appalling exploitation of labour, including child labour, in the developing world, developing areas are developing a very sophisticated clothing and textile sector of their own. Exploitation is still occurring in our country, too, although I hope that that will be dealt with by the minimum wage and other measures. For all those reasons, the industry has to have a strategy, and to work in partnership with the Government on it.

The group and our advisers have identified various elements of a strategy. The first element is that we must work to the action plan that has been drawn up by trade unions and employers as part of the social partnership process, and will be discussed next week with my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry. The document will be the manifesto of the lobby of the House that will take place next Wednesday.

We must address the productivity problem. According to the plan, our productivity is 30 per cent. below that of our European competitors—although I should think that many workers in the industry would find that figure hard to believe. I do not accept, as some have said, that the minimum wage and other employment rights, such as the 48-hour week, will make matters worse. We have to increase standards and quality if the industry is to have a future.

There is absolutely no future in chasing down employment costs. We could never compete with Morocco, for example, where the average hourly rate for clothing worker is 5p an hour. Some hon. Members—I have heard them say it—think that we should compete on such a basis.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): My hon. Friend mentioned Morocco. The work force of Bairdwear, in my constituency, were told just a few weeks ago of the closure of their plant. Their work is being transferred to Morocco, where slave labour rates operate. Does he agree that a job could be done collectively, perhaps within the European Union, to address such issues?

Mr. Woolas: I very much agree. I have been told of cases in which employees in the industry have been videoed doing their jobs, so that the videos can be sent overseas to teach other people how to do those jobs. I very much agree with my hon. Friend's comments.

We need high investment, high-tech solutions and marketing and design inputs. Many of our industrialists are already taking action on those matters, and good luck to them. The footwear industry is a good example of an industry that has turned the corner. It has a social partnership plan, which is working. That industry has gone upmarket and is successfully marketing its goods. We need to address the question of how the Department of Trade and Industry can help our exporters, as there is no doubt that export is our future.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley): Does my hon. Friend share my concern at the statement made to our advisory group last week by the British Apparel and Textile Confederation that the DTI has agreed to support only 19 exhibitions and seminars overseas, compared with 31 last year? Does he agree that our textile and clothing industry can compete overseas only on the basis of the excellence in design and innovation shown by the best firms in my constituency and his, and that that requires the Government to put every possible effort into promoting that excellence overseas?

Mr. Woolas: Yes. We should be encouraging more rather than fewer overseas trade missions and exhibitions. I shall be interested to hear what my hon. Friend the Minister has to say about that.

We are telling our manufacturers to move upmarket, to increase design input and to go for niche markets, but those markets can only be global. Therefore, the value of sterling becomes even more important to our international sales force, notwithstanding the cheapening of imports. We must support the work of our sales force.

I do not wish to sound over-critical. I congratulate my right hon. Friends on their superb success in getting rid of the cotton dumping duties in the European Union. Many of my constituents are grateful for that. However, I think it was General Jiap who said that we must fight on all fronts at all times. In a very exposed market, we need to be reassured that our Ministers are following that philosophy in relation to clothing and textiles, if not in other activities.

We need quickly to establish national training organisations. Training is too fragmented and we are not providing the industry with what it needs. We need to ensure that the assisted area status maps, which are being redrawn, prioritise the clothing and textile industry. The ending of objective 2 regional funding could hit the clothing and textile sector in particular as it is regionally based. I plead with Ministers to prioritise the clothing and textile industry when they draw up submissions on the new European regional funding model.

Retex has been a great success, but we are about to lose it. We must not forget that negotiations on the multi-fibre agreement will soon be on us again. Goodness knows what will happen when MFA protection is removed.

In addition, we need to address the major structural problems that underpin the process. It has nothing to do with the value of sterling—the value against the major currencies that affect the sector is lower than it was two years ago—but relates to the relationship between retailers and manufacturers. Some of the problems are outside the Minister's control, but none of them is outside his influence.

The DTI-funded work of the apparel and textile challenge comes close to achieving the correct solution. We cannot have a retail sector that bullies the manufacturers or a manufacturing sector that is not flexible and responsive to the retail sector, as that will push production overseas. We must address that problem.

Nor can we base our appeal for the future of the sector just on patriotism. If we want consumers to buy British, we must make British best. There is no premium on the label "Made in Britain" in this country, although British goods sold overseas carry a huge premium because of their label. It is ironic that manufacturers label goods for overseas "Made in Britain", but often fail to label goods intended for the domestic market. The Government can give enthusiasm to the process. We need to examine the labelling laws, perhaps to take into account ethical production issues such as child labour. I believe that consumers have a right to know whether production methods are unethical and the country of origin of the goods that they buy. I also believe that the best badge of quality in this sector and many others is the label that says "union made". In the United States, that is the kitemark of quality. If it is good enough for the entrepreneurial United States of America, it is good enough for my constituents.

The industry must shed its rag trade image. We cannot continue to talk the industry down; it is too important. We cannot treat the industry as a Cinderella sector, because it is not. We have the best cloth makers, the best shoe makers, the best carpet weavers and the best designers. This country has a great reputation for quality; we should build on that. I urge Ministers to do all in their power to support the social partners in their endeavours.

9.40 pm

Mr. David Lock (Wyre Forest): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth (Mr. Woolas) on securing this debate on such an important sector of British manufacturing industry. I have the privilege to represent Wyre Forest, which includes Kidderminster—the home of the British carpet industry. More carpets are made in Kidderminster than in any other part of Britain.

My hon. Friend has referred to the problems of the high pound. I endorse what he has said. They are long-term problems, not short-term ones. The markets that have been lost in Europe were lost long before the Labour Government came to power. With stability in macro-economic policy, those markets are now back within the grasp of the manufacturers that I represent, but there is still a feeling that the high pound is detrimental to our ability to sell to Europe. I hope that, as interest rates come down over the next 12 months, the value of the pound will ease slightly, to the benefit of manufacturers in my constituency.

I thank Ministers at the Department of Trade and Industry for their excellent work in preventing a ban on carpets by Russia, which was threatened during the summer and would have removed a substantial market. We were particularly worried in Kidderminster, because the prospect of a large amount of cut-price carpet from Belgium, much of it produced in circumstances that are, at best, very close to breaching EU rules, caused great concern. Despite all the good work of the DTI, other circumstances have caused the Russian market to collapse. We now fear a substantial ingress of carpet from Belgium. I ask Ministers to bear that in mind when considering the sector in the coming months.

My constituency is not in an EU-funded area. Will Ministers bear in mind the detrimental effect that substantial grants to carpet companies in parts of the United Kingdom that are fortunate enough to be in EU assisted areas would have on companies in my constituency, which are in direct competition, when considering applications for grants or support? I am thinking particularly of companies in Ulster, which have received substantial grants in recent years and are now competing directly with Kidderminster.

There are several high spots. I do not want my hon. Friend the Minister to think that the progress made in the carpet industry in Kidderminster has not been noticed or that the achievements should go unrecorded. World-class companies are being built and investment is high. Investment in marketing, technology and computers is impressive. Companies manufacturing carpets in other parts of the world are being taken over and run by British companies in Kidderminster, with the benefit of the manufacturing know-how of the west midlands. That means that, at the moment, jobs in the traditional industry in Kidderminster are reasonably secure. I hope that the industry there will expand, not contract.

I shall conclude by making two points. First, will the Minister bear in mind the fact that those of us who are concerned about the housing market do not view it purely as a construction issue? When people move house, they spend considerable amounts of money on white goods and carpet. A steady housing market—not a boom or a bust—is essential to the health of the domestic carpet industry.

Secondly, will the Minister use his influence, as those of us in the all-party group do, to encourage members of the public to buy British? By buying British, they are not only buying the best but securing and creating jobs in some important areas of the country.

9.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Dr. Kim Howells): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth (Mr. Woolas) on the way in which he has raised this important issue, as I do my hon. Friends the Members for Wyre Forest (Mr. Lock) and for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber) on assisting him. I notice the huge interest among the Opposition parties—Tories, Liberal Democrats and nationalists—in this extraordinarily important debate on manufacturing. It is a disgrace that they cannot even be bothered to turn up for such a debate.

I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth on reviving the clothing, textile, carpet and footwear industries all-party group, and especially on the formation of the sectoral advisory committee. Such joint approaches are the way forward. We have suffered too often from being unable to tap the enormous potential in our work force in many sectors. My hon. Friend has taken an imaginative approach to moving forward at a difficult time for the industry.

The Government recognise the substantial contribution that the United Kingdom's textile, clothing and footwear industries make to the economy. As my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth has reminded us, they have a turnover in excess of £17 billion a year and employ about 350,000 people. That is a huge number. We have had many debates on the steel and coal industries, but I cannot remember when we last debated the textile industry—still less the carpet or footwear industries. Yet many are located in some of the most vulnerable industrial areas, very often on the edge of rural parts, where the alternatives to such employment are very few and far between. This debate is very timely, and I wish that many more hon. Members were present to take part in it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth mentioned exchange rates as a factor in closures. As he said, the exchange rate is now broadly the same as it was when the Government came to power. The important difference, as I am sure he will tell his constituents and those in the industry who are trying to do something about the situation, is that inflation is firmly under control. In addition, long-term interest rates are at their lowest for 35 years. That makes a difference; it makes the industry less vulnerable, and poses new challenges. Although growth is expected to be slow, no one is forecasting a re-run of the early 1990s, when, under the previous Government, manufacturing output fell by 7 per cent. and 1 million jobs were lost as the economy suffered its longest recession since the second world war.

I turn for a moment to the support that my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry is giving to the effort that everybody is making to try to drive up productivity.

A stable macro-economic environment is an important external factor that provides the opportunity for the industry to flourish, but it is not enough. Our industries have to be globally competitive as well, and the Government have a role to play in that respect. My hon. Friend reminded us of studies that show that parts of our textile sector are 30 per cent. less competitive than those of our main European competitors. There are all sorts of variables in that equation, but I am absolutely convinced that one in particular is the key—investment.

[Dr. Kim Howells]

I have no doubt that, if firms here had invested in the way that Italian and American firms have invested over the years, we would not be facing the current situation—my hon. Friend reminded us not to talk down the industry by referring to a crisis. There are some superbly efficient firms in operation, but the difficulties would have been far less had there been proper levels of investment. It is all part of the British malaise—refusing to invest and assuming that firms can stagger along by paying lower wages, without realising that technology is advancing around them.

My hon. Friends mentioned the problem of technology transfer to places such as Morocco, and it is true that technology transfer has never been easier than it is now. My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth mentioned videos that show workers in Morocco how the job is done. Such technology transfers will not stop and no rules will be introduced to prohibit them. The economies of the world are opening up and captive markets are becoming fewer. We have to try to understand how we can compete in the new world.

The way to compete is to ensure that we add real value to the carpets we create. We have some of the best art colleges and fashion houses in the world, and fashion and design are crucial to the textile sector. I want a rocket to be put up many of our universities and institutions of higher and further education, so that they start to talk to industry and embark on joint projects with sectors such as textiles. That will encourage everyone to become involved in a crusade to exploit the marvellous design capabilities that this country has. The Government, through the Departments for Trade and Industry and for Education and Employment, have a role to play in encouraging such a partnership approach.

Mr. Lock: Does the Minister recognise that, in some parts of the country, local further education colleges are more innovative and imaginative than their traditional university counterparts? I am thinking particularly of Kidderminster college in my constituency, which runs an impressive textiles degree and works closely with industry. It is now finding that students from across the world, especially the far east, are coming to Kidderminster to study carpets and carpet design, because of the expertise that is found nowhere else in Britain.

Dr. Howells: Kidderminster has a great reputation and long may it flourish. I was an art student in the 1960s, although I must admit that I was far more interested in revolution than in art. I remember giving up painting on 28 May 1968, because it was bourgeois individualism. My mother called me mad, and she was dead right.

We are only just beginning to understand what value our universities and colleges can add. My hon. Friend is right to say that further education colleges often outstrip our best universities, which have a stultified view of the relationship between academia and industry.

Mr. Miller: Will my hon. Friend invite another partner into that equation—the major high street chains? They are the buyers of the products and the cause of some of the closures, such as that of Bairdwear in my constituency. After all, unless they become involved in the debate, those of their customers who currently work in industry will not be able to afford to buy their products in future.

Dr. Howells: My hon. Friend makes a good point. My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth is looking carefully at ways of bringing major buyers of textiles, footwear and carpets into the debate so that they understand that their symbiotic relationship cannot be allowed to wither on the vine. The best buyers are interested in talking about that relationship.

Buyers should want to buy from nearby producers, and their relationship is so important. Why must products be produced in Morocco or China? It is logical for products to be produced on demand, quickly and to meet changing market demands as closely as possible to the markets. We should start celebrating that fact and find out how to achieve it—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I realise that most of the Minister's hon. Friends are sitting below the Gangway, but I am here and it is to the Chair that he should address his remarks.

Dr. Howells: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is late and I have clearly forgotten that fact.

My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley referred to the tangible ways in which we can help the industry. I wish to refer to the support for the exhibitions and seminars abroad scheme. I am delighted that we have received a record 1,000-plus bids for support under the new scheme. I take that to indicate broad satisfaction with the new arrangements. We have included about 40 per cent. of the bids in the programme for 1999–2000. With 45 of the clothing sector bids included—some 62 per cent.—the industry has, in fact, done much better than the average.

Organisations bidding for support have told us that they expect to take well over 900 supported clothing firms to the 45 events. Despite the slightly smaller programme, that is well above the 770 firms expected to be supported in 1998–99. My statistics and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley diverge, and I shall check to ensure that we arrive somewhere near the truth as quickly as I can.

The DTI is not only helping companies to identify and exploit market opportunities overseas, but at home. The Department provides support to the apparel and textiles challenge, which is dedicated to the improvement of the textiles and clothing supply chain. The challenge organises meet-the-buyer forums around the country, which provide the opportunity to bring textiles and clothing manufacturers together with potential customers. Six events have been held so far this year, with each event generating, on average, £500,000 of new business for the participants.

More generally, we understand that the UK high street is—as my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) pointed out—a very demanding market, and that retailers here have very high expectations of their suppliers. Through the apparel and textiles challenge, we want to encourage a dialogue between UK suppliers and retailers that will help each of them to understand more thoroughly the other's needs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth and his delegation will discuss these matters with my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry next week, and they will explore the ways in which the industry can be helped. The days are long gone when we could bail out firms that were failing—nor would we want to. The textile, carpet and footwear industries have the experience and the wherewithal to compete with anyone in the world. It is a question of having the confidence and the will to invest in those sectors, and not to be frightened by those who would preach a gloomy message—that the whole of world production will move to China or another part of the world where poverty wages are paid. I do not believe that that is the case.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): It may interest hon. Members to know that the Stroud valleys were built on the textile industry. The Government could provide help by encouraging organisations such as business links and development agencies to give training the emphasis that it deserves. I am sure that that would be very helpful to industries such as textiles.

Dr. Howells: That is an important point, and a good one on which to end. If we have the confidence to invest in new machinery, new technology and new techniques in training an already excellent work force to learn new skills, we will be able to compete with anyone in the world.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Ten o'clock.

House of Commons

Wednesday 18 November 1998

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Environmental Taxation

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

9.34 am

Mrs. Helen Brinton (Peterborough): The ballot has given the House the opportunity to hold a timely debate—timely because it is taking place soon after the return of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister from the climate negotiations in Buenos Aires. I was fortunate to be called to speak last July in the Adjournment debate secured by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) on the preparations for the Buenos Aires talks. I am sure that the House will join me in paying tribute once again to the Deputy Prime Minister for his considerable achievements in that vital process.

The Government pledged to put the environment at the heart of policy making. We all know that they are committed to ambitious targets for reducing emissions that are seriously damaging the environment both directly and indirectly, through climate change. The two are often connected.

The Select Committee on Environmental Audit, of which I am proud to be a member, was set up to be, in the Deputy Prime Minister's words,

"a terrier snapping at the Government's heels".

Some of us believe that we have been not a terrier, but a rottweiler. We have tried to live up to those expectations.

Today's debate should be seen as an extension of that activity. Its subject is the environmental effects of taxation. There are many aspects of that—such as transport, housing, energy and agriculture—on which other hon. Members will want to speak. I shall give a brief introduction and concentrate on some aspects of energy taxation, a matter that is relevant to my constituents in Peterborough.

The basic aim of green tax reform is to shift the burden from "goods" to "bads". "Goods" are economic activities such as income generation, job creation and added value. "Bads" are pollution and excessive use of resources such as energy—excessive from the point of view of society. For example, petrol creates costs in terms of pollution and congestion, which are borne by society. Thus, the consumption of petrol is excessive from a societal point of view. Measures could be designed to help energy-intensive industries to adapt.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Brinton: No, I have just started and I want to make progress.

Other policy instruments could protect potentially disadvantaged groups, such as the rural poor, who are more reliant on cars and would suffer unduly from increased fuel duties.

There is a much greater role for indirect taxation in promoting energy efficiency. Far too many anomalies discriminate against energy conservation materials, whose present high VAT rating is a disincentive for householders to invest in them.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Brinton: I am pleased to give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Hoyle: I thank my hon. Friend, and I welcome the debate. As she considers it important to conserve fuel, does she agree that it would have made more sense if the battalion headquarters of the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineer 101 Battalion, which was based in my constituency, had stayed there, where there is a population of 300,000, rather than being moved to Queensbury, where there is not a similar population, which will mean more vehicle movements from Lancashire to Wales?

Mrs. Brinton: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments and sympathise with the sentiments that he has so eloquently expressed.

In his March Budget the Chancellor announced partial VAT relief, with a drop in VAT from 17.5 per cent. to 5 per cent. on the installation of energy-saving materials funded under certain Government grants. That was designed to help people suffering from fuel poverty. My right hon. Friend said that the cut in VAT would help to insulate 40,000 more homes a year, which is good, but it is not a significant benefit to the environment, and it does not cover payments by householders over and above Government grants received.

I know that the Government are pursuing with their European partners the legality of a reduced or even a zero rating, about which there has long been disagreement. Perhaps the Minister will tell us later about progress on that front. I look forward to his comments.

Mr. Forth: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Brinton: I am making progress.

Low-polluting road fuels such as liquefied petroleum gas and so-called city petrol produced by Sainsburys are on sale in my constituency, Peterborough, among other places. Their use would similarly be encouraged by a lower VAT rating. I welcomed some moves in that direction in the last Budget. There is a much larger potential market for such fuels, but if manufacturers and distributors are to make the necessary investment and commitment, they need to know that any policy changes will remain in place and progress for a number of years.

Last February, the Treasury promised

"a new approach to environmental taxes that will be fair to future generations."

[Mrs. Brinton]

In the recent pre-Budget report, we read that the Government are "committed to exploring scope for using taxes in the strategy of sustainable development".

However, there are few clues as to when we might expect the results of apparently on-going deliberations. Bound with the bundle of pre-Budget reports issued to all hon. Members—and appearing to be part of them, in the same green and white format—was the Marshall report on economic instruments and the business use of energy. When Sir Colin Marshall, the former chairman of British Airways, was appointed to head a panel of industrialists tasked to investigate energy taxes, one commentator said that it was like "putting King Herod in charge of child care since aviation is one of the worst contributors to climate change and the industry has lobbied hard to ensure that it pays no green taxes."

None the less, the report concluded:

"there probably is a role for a tax if businesses of all sizes and from all sectors are to contribute to improved energy efficiency and help meet the UK's emissions targets."

The United Kingdom should obviously make its own decisions about meeting its own considerations. However, there are precedents in other European countries concerning the effects of carbon tax from which we may learn some lessons.

A carbon tax was introduced in Sweden in 1991, and the most recent evaluation found that it had delivered a 9 per cent. cut in CO_2 emissions in three years. On the one hand, district heating—which pays the full rate of tax—showed a dramatic switch from fossil fuels to biomass, and fossil fuel use shifted significantly from coal to gas. On the other hand, when the tax rate for industry was reduced in 1993 to 25 per cent. of the full rate, fossil fuel consumption rose, with a corresponding rise in CO_2 emissions by 21 per cent. in one Swedish district between 1992 and 1994.

Sir Colin Marshall recommended that a clear signal be given as to the long-term direction of policy in order to help businesses plan for future investment and maximise the environmental impact of a tax. He also said that any measures should be subject to detailed consultation. I am particularly happy to endorse that proposal, especially as the economic and social costs of some proposed taxes may be too high. Other measures, such as voluntary self-regulation, which are often based on enlightened self-interest may work much better—and, indeed, may already be in place. The agricultural interests in my constituency would certainly support that view.

Other proposals might appear to be environmentally friendly in a narrow context—for example, some recycling initiatives—but they involve extra environmental costs, such as transportation, when considered more widely. Consultation is not only desirable but absolutely necessary, often on a case-by-case basis, in order to weigh the advantages and disadvantages and the different interests involved. I know that that is happening now in some cases. However, consultation should not be a recipe for unnecessary delay.

The first report of the Environmental Audit Committee—I am pleased to see members of that Committee from both sides of the House present in the Chamber today—made a recommendation concerning the potential of the tax system to deliver environmental objectives and make economic development more sustainable. It called on the Government to establish an advisory body on environmental taxation—the Committee has certainly been a terrier, if not a rottweiler—preferably in the form of a green tax commission. I take this opportunity to reiterate that recommendation.

Such a commission, by whatever name, would bring together the different interests involved in a more transparent and neutral forum—the Government are committed to openness—leaving the final decisions to Government. It would invite interested bodies to submit evidence on proposed environmental taxes, and examine the potential pitfalls and trade-offs that might arise from particular decisions.

For example, it would have to establish whether a proposed measure would have an adverse impact on competition, and decide whether that was outweighed by any other advantages that would result. Such bodies need not be yet another layer of bureaucracy. Importantly, the existence of a green tax commission would make it much easier to take an overall strategic view of environmental tax making. I hope that we will not go down the route of a fragmented, "here today, gone tomorrow", piecemeal approach.

The Marshall report concluded that revenues should be recycled in full to business

"with at least some of them channelled into schemes aimed directly at promoting energy efficiency . . . low carbon technologies and/or energy audits/advice for SMEs."

I particularly welcome the latter, as a pioneering audit of city-wide energy, conducted by the Environment City Trust with support from our largest local employer, Perkins Engines, was launched recently in my constituency. I am pleased to report that that launch took place in the presence of the new Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale). Marshall's last recommendation was:

"the design of any tax should ensure that Combined Heat and Power (CHP) is not disadvantaged. It should also aim, where possible, to increase incentives for the take-up of renewable sources of energy."

That is good, but perhaps too cautious. I hope that that will not be the last word on the subject. I regard Marshall as a beginning and not an end in itself.

A major finding of the Peterborough energy audit was that nearly half the city's share of the Kyoto target—which, I am told, is 220,000 tonnes of CO_2—could be met by small CHP schemes in business and industry. That sector accounts for about two thirds of CO_2 emissions and two thirds of energy spending in the city. We are still awaiting the Department of Trade and Industry's review of renewables—the Environmental Audit Committee is certainly awaiting it with bated breath.

The United Kingdom has a target to produce 10 per cent. of electricity from renewable sources by 2010. At present, we have the lowest rate in Europe at around 1 per cent. Studies show that both wind and wave power could meet the United Kingdom's electricity needs three times over and that solar power could provide two thirds of our needs. However, all those forms of power generation require Government support whether by way of interdepartmental co-operation—as occurred between the DTI and the Ministry of Agriculture in the development of energy crops—research and development or changes to the structure and functioning of the electricity market.

The non-fossil fuel obligation, which obliges power companies to buy from more expensive renewable sources, has helped to get the renewables industry going and, in some cases, has driven the price down. However, progress has been intermittent, with modest targets. Recent research shows that the extension of NFFO alone will not allow Government targets to be met. Government investment in renewables has been insignificant compared with the billions of pounds in subsidies granted to the nuclear and fossil fuel industries.

European industry leads the world in wind and solar power, and the United Kingdom is a leader in combined heat and power. There are major United Kingdom export opportunities at present, and some of the large oil companies—such as BP and Shell, to name but two—are beginning to invest heavily in renewables. The Government should do all in their power to encourage the development of renewables for the benefit of the country as a whole and to help avoid catastrophic climate change.

Attending the launch of the energy audit in my constituency—I was particularly pleased to be there—were many of those engaged commercially and otherwise in the promotion of renewables and CHP. I was extremely impressed by the extent and quality of the involvement. Business certainly understands the potential opportunities for creating wealth and employment in this field. A key manufacturer in my constituency, Peter Brotherhood, has just obtained a multi-million-pound contract for supplying wind turbines for a renewable energy scheme in the Fens. That scheme will obviously create jobs both in Peterborough and where the turbines are installed.

I have come to realise that another advantage of renewable energy is that it is localised rather than centralised, and therefore can act to regenerate local communities by creating employment, with a knock-on benefit for the local and regional economies. However, many of those present at the launch made it clear that they need some help—and they need it now. They need a kick start to enable them to obtain a viable toehold in the market, from which to develop, before others gain the crucial lead that in business often means that the weakest and those left behind are driven to the wall.

The current situation has been described by my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry as "win, win, win". By that, he meant that the encouragement of renewable energy means that the United Kingdom can simultaneously meet its emission targets, boost industry—which is what the Government are pledged to do—and create jobs. In the summer, my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury told the all-party environment group that the general approach of the Treasury to environmental taxation might be described as "prudent enthusiasm". "Prudent" is a favourite word in Treasury-speak.

I hope that the debate will highlight the degree of enthusiasm in the House—and, indeed, the country—for environmental taxation, and signal that the need for it is rather more urgent than people appear to believe at present.

9.50 am

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): I am grateful to have caught your eye, Madam Speaker. I congratulate the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Brinton) on securing this important debate. As a fellow member of the Environmental Audit Committee, I agree with her that the Committee has turned into a rottweiler, and has rottweilered many Ministers in its 12-month span. Environmental taxation is especially important to that Committee; indeed, it is important to us all—it is the coming issue with which the House will be involved.

The hon. Member for Peterborough referred to the Labour party's repeated commitments on the environment, and mentioned the manifesto commitment to "put the environment at the heart of policy making".

When the Financial Secretary appeared before our Committee, she reiterated that she wanted to "ensure that the environment is placed at the centre of our objectives for the tax system".

One would hope that the Government considered the issue to have equal importance, but, alas, the warm words are not being matched by action.

As one who has been a member of the Finance Bill Standing Committee for the past two years, I know at first hand how difficult it is to put amendments relating to the environment—which, in most cases, are tabled by Opposition Members—on to the agenda. During the Committee's consideration of this year's Budget, only one amendment on the environment tabled by an Opposition Member—and precious little from Labour Members—was accepted. It dealt with a tiny technical issue which I happened to raise, in respect of the taxation treatment of company cars that had been converted to road fuel gases.

In the whole of the 1998 Budget, there was no mention of preferential treatment of taxation for road fuel gases; no mention of incentives to promote oxidation catalysts; no mention of incentives to promote use of brown-field sites in preference to ripping up the green belt, and the discrepancy between value added tax on renovation and new-build remains; and no mention of corporate incentives to promote the preferential tax treatment of company public transport season tickets. There was nothing to tackle the distortions on company car mileage rates—we still encourage the absurdity of an incentive for people to drive more miles; nothing to deter water pollution through pesticides; and nothing to encourage the more environmentally sustainable use of rural land.

That bears out the fears of the Environmental Audit Committee, whose pre-Budget report said:

"It is difficult to reconcile the status of environmentally sustainable growth as a 'core feature' of the Government's economic policy."

Indeed, on environmental matters the previous Budget amounted to an action-free zone. Friends of the Earth called it "green as smog". More politely, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds said:

"So far, the Treasury has made little substantive progress in using the tax system to protect the environment."

More recently, the green Budget failed to tackle the issue, with the exception of the bludgeon measure of the energy tax and a consultation paper on vehicle excise duty. The comprehensive spending review made virtually no mention of environmental considerations, but there was a lot about spending more money on the back of dodgy growth estimates, with no link to their environmental impact.

The job of the Environmental Audit Committee has been the auditing of the environmental impacts of Government policy. In the Chancellor's speech to the Confederation of British Industry conference on 2 November, there were plenty of old chestnuts about global turmoil, being prudent and cautious, productivity top-up, Europe, prudence and investment—that old one again—and mature patriotism. Despite the fact that the energy tax announced a few weeks ago will have the biggest impact on business, there was not a single word about the environment or the use of environmental taxes on business.

[Mr. Tim Loughton]

Even the Prime Minister's Mansion House speech a few days ago to the heart of the business and investment community—which these days might be expected to act as an antidote to the Chancellor's own thoughts—contained not a word about the relationship between business and the environment and green taxes. What Conservative Members fear most is that the broad-brush use of tax in the name of environmental improvement is a surrogate measure to fill the coffers of the Treasury.

The insensitive use of tax alone can be counter-productive. There has been no more stark example of that than the state of the British road haulage industry, where the combination of the increased 6 per cent. fuel escalator and the ending of the European cabotage regulations on 1 July has meant a flood of French and Belgian lorries on United Kingdom roads which pay no tax and import diesel from France and Belgium. Diesel is taxed at 24.5p per litre in France and at 19.1p per litre in Belgium. In the United Kingdom, it is taxed at a whopping 43.7p per litre. That is hardly a level playing field.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell): As the Government have been in office for only a year or so, most of that difference came about through the imposition of the fuel price escalator by the previous Conservative Government, who raised £25 billion in extra taxation. Does the hon. Gentleman now think that that was wrong or right?

Mr. Loughton: Not at all; the hon. Gentleman misses my point. I said that a combination of the increased escalator and the ending of cabotage rules on 1 July has been a dangerous combination and has had an immediate effect on the British freight haulage industry. If the hon. Gentleman had remained a member of the Environmental Audit Committee for more than 10 days, he might have been aware of those facts. As a result, British lorry firms are seriously considering moving to the continent to avoid the extra taxes—taxes which, by the end of 2002, are likely to be costing the freight haulage industry an extra £5 billion a year.

Who wins in all this? Not the environment, because we are simply exchanging British fumes from British lorries on British roads for Belgian fumes from Belgian lorries on British roads. Who wins? Not the British freight business, because about 26,000 jobs are at stake. It is not enough, as the Minister may say, that the allowance of £500 against vehicle excise duty for particular traps being fitted will compensate, when it costs £3,500 to fit those systems. Who wins? Not the Government, as business moves to the continent and pays taxes to other European Governments.

The aggregates tax is another example; a broad-brush approach to taxing quarrying will not result in reduced quarrying of material, unless we shut down the schools, hospitals and road-building programmes.

I shall deal briefly with the energy tax and Lord Marshall's report, which the hon. Member for Peterborough mentioned. The report turned out to be a downstream tax levied on business consumers. It is not a carbon tax, because a genuine carbon tax would be levied upstream: coal-fired power stations would pay most; gas-fired power stations would pay less; and nuclear power stations would pay nothing.

The Government have prejudged the issue by blocking the expansion of gas-fired power stations for political reasons, but the switch to gas has had the biggest effect on reducing CO_2 emissions. Indeed, it has been calculated that

"burning 25 million tonnes of coal, rather than getting the same power from gas, produces in extra pollution an extra 28.7 million tonnes of CO_2, 425,000 tonnes of SO_2, 14,000 tonnes of particulates and 6,000 tonnes of black smoke. Sticking with coal cuts gross domestic product by 0.15 percentage points for each of the next five years, according to the Treasury's own model."

Manufacturing industry could be damaged most, when it is suffering from the high levels of the pound and the shrinking economy. Costs will be passed on, which will be inflationary, and we need to know from the report which sectors of business will pay most.

What about high energy users such as the chemical industry, which is already suffering extensive international competition? What about the biggest area of energy waste by business—shops that blow hot air on to the high street and offices, where energy demand has increased by 140 per cent. in the past 12 years as a result of air conditioning?

The report is full of contradictions, with the Government already having tried to rig the market in favour of environmentally unfriendly coal. As the Chancellor will have found when he delivered his speech earlier this month, the CBI is firmly against it. The additional costs of £2 billion a year will be a big tax on industry, at a time when it can least afford to pay it. Even if the recommendations are introduced in a tax-neutral way, they will encourage a further switch away from manufacturing to services.

The one redeeming feature of the Marshall report is the reference to tradeable emissions permits. I hope that the Government will today give a commitment that they will introduce those well before the 2008 date that was suggested by the Kyoto protocol.

We have much to learn from the United States, where emissions trading is well advanced as a market mechanism that promotes cost-effective reductions by allowing countries or companies to trade emissions allowances. Every emitter must have an allowance for each tonne of sulphur dioxide that it emits. So far, acid rain-causing emissions are being cut ahead of schedule, at 50 per cent. of the expected cost. Trading gets incentives right by encouraging cuts where they can be achieved at the lowest cost.

The United States is already working with several developed and developing countries to help to strengthen their capacity to measure emissions and to participate in an emissions-trading system with high standards. In Australia, just the other day, the Sydney futures exchange announced plans to launch a market in permits to emit greenhouse tax. The exchange will operate spot, forward and futures markets in the permits, to be issued under legislation to meet the Kyoto targets. The exchange could become a hub for greenhouse-gas trading in the whole Pacific region. In this country, British Petroleum has established, off its own bat, a pilot scheme for trading carbon emissions among its subsidiary companies.

Those are all market structures with incentives to promote environmental good practice and to reduce costs. The Government need to get on with a similar system in this country, but we need much more imaginative thinking on linking environment and taxes. On road fuel gases, we need to follow the example of cutting taxes drastically on lead-free petrol that was set by the previous Government. Liquid petroleum gas, which is more environmentally friendly, costs 318.2 ecu for every 1,000 litres in the United Kingdom. The next nearest costs only 201.9 ecu. In France, the cost is 63 ecu. In Sweden and Belgium there is no tax on LPG.

We need a bold move such as that, where taxation as one tool can be effective. We need the rent-a-room scheme, for example—another innovation that was set up by the last Conservative Government. We need to encourage more diverse use of homes on brown-field land before ripping up green-field sites.

On taxation on company cars, we need incentives to encourage more car sharing among people going to work, preferential taxation for company season tickets for public transport travel, disincentives to do more mileage, and proper incentives to convert to LPG—well above and beyond the tinkering in the Budget. There should not be just a blunt increase in fuel, which we know prejudices most the rural driver who has little choice.

There has been another innovative idea in my constituency. Northbrook college has just bought at its own expense and on its own initiative 50 bicycles through a deal with a local bicycle seller. It has made them available free of charge to its students on a year-by-year basis to encourage more cycling to college rather than car use. If the Government were to kick-start such schemes throughout the country, the attractions to colleges, businesses and industries alike would be immense, but they need some kick-starting by the Government.

I agree with the hon. Member for Peterborough. One of the recommendations of the Select Committee on Environmental Audit was to set up a green-tax commission. The Government have gone the route of a Monetary Policy Committee and independence, in certain terms, for the Bank of England. Surely a green-tax commission that is independent of political interference could bring some benefits.

Remember that environmental taxes can mean lower taxes for good practice, not inevitably higher ones to clobber everyone indiscriminately. Decisions on environmental taxes must be made on a case-by-case basis, with due regard to the most effective mix of tax, regulation, voluntary agreements and other instruments.

A few weeks ago, the New Statesman, not a Conservative-minded magazine, said:

> "It is hard to detect any sign of commitment by this government to an energy policy that will shift our entire system on to a sustainable footing in the longer term. It has quite a lot to do with a complete lack of enthusiasm for the environment on the part of No. 10."

By contrast, the previous Secretary of State for the Environment, my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), enjoyed a reputation as the most influential Secretary of State for the Environment ever, according to Friends of the Earth. He was responsible for setting up the Environment Agency, for implementing a comprehensive biodiversity plan and for introducing ambitious recycling targets, among many other measures. That followed the "green-blue", effective and practical approach to environmental good practice that was started by Baroness Thatcher.

Conservative Members believe in sensible environmental taxation, but only as part of a range of measures, including the use of sensible regulation that harnesses the power of the market, the promotion of property rights, the creation of a low-tax regime, the favouring of voluntary action and local impact, the trusting of technology, insisting on sound science and working at an international level.

It was Conservative Ministers who set the pace on environmental good practice over many years. I look forward to Labour Ministers starting to show signs of wanting to catch us up soon.

10.5 am

Mr. Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford): I join in the congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Brinton) on securing this important debate. It is a particular pleasure to join her in an Adjournment debate, as I am also a member of the Select Committee on Environmental Audit, and we campaigned for many years together in Kent before her migration to Peterborough. She was a feisty campaigner, and I know that she continues to represent her constituents with the steel with which she approached campaigning in Kent.

I wish to focus on one green taxation issue which has been referred to briefly by my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough and by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton)—taxation on the renovation of empty properties. It is essential that we harmonise value added tax at 5 per cent. for the renovation of long-standing empty properties. It is currently applied at the full rate of 17.5 per cent., yet, for newly built homes on green-field sites, it is applied at a zero rate.

My contribution follows the excellent report on housing by the Select Committee on Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs. It marked a vital contribution to the White Paper "Planning for the Communities of the Future." In its recommendations, it concurred with the earlier recommendation of Environmental Audit Committee calling for VAT on conversions and renovations to be reduced to as low a level as possible.

The Government's response was positive. They agreed that the current situation was an anomaly. Indeed, since the response, my hon. Friend the Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning has said that the way in which we apply VAT on old properties and not on new ones is a massive anomaly.

In the response, the Government said:

> "Unifying VAT rates would help to provide a more level playing field for conversions and thus be more consistent with our objectives for accommodating household growth."

However, the report went on to say:

> "There are other economic and technical issues to be considered, such as the impact on House prices and tax administration and the legality under European Law."

I have spoken on the issue in an Adjournment debate and during a 10-minute rule Bill debate. I have tabled an early-day motion, which was signed by nearly

[Mr. Jonathan Shaw]

100 Members from both sides of the House. This morning, I want to deal with some of the economic and technical issues that were mentioned in the Government's response to the report of the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee.

The environment faces considerable pressure if we are to provide all the homes that we need. Therefore, it is essential that we have a tax framework that encourages us to make more use of what we already have. Unlocking the empty homes is just one way in which to do that, but, to begin with, we need to be clear about how many properties we are talking about.

There are some 800,000 empty homes in England and Wales, a wasted resource. If we put them all together, we would have the sixth largest urban conurbation in the country next to Tyneside; that gives the scale.

In a written answer in June, my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury said that the cost of reducing VAT for the refurbishment of all those properties to 5 per cent. would be £1.1 billion. In a further reply, my hon. Friend said that the income generated by the introduction of 5 per cent. VAT on all new-build homes would be about £550 million. There is a huge gap.

We need to be clear about the numbers involved, and about what we are defining. In February this year, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions published its annual housing investment programme returns from local authorities, which showed that there were 230,000 long-standing empty homes in the private sector—that is, homes that had been empty for a year or more. It is on that figure that the argument for harmonisation of VAT should focus.

Members of Parliament see such homes in their constituencies year in, year out. They are the homes that blight our inner cities, and they could be put to better use. We could provide decent dwellings for families, protecting the countryside and regenerating our inner cities, and also meet the housing needs of the future. The present VAT arrangements only provide disincentives to builders, as the Government's response recognises.

I am not sure whether the Department is aware of the figures. When, in July, I asked what was the total number of long-standing empty properties, the Department said that it was not available—that it could only provide the number of homes that had been empty for six months, which was 400,000. When I asked the Treasury what would be the cost of reducing VAT on that number to 5 per cent., I was told that it would be £300 million. Eventually, then, we can arrive at an approximate figure of £160 million in loss of revenue for the Treasury if VAT was reduced to 5 per cent. on the 230,000 long-standing empty homes in England. If the introduction of 5 per cent. VAT on new build would generate £550 million, the Treasury would actually be better off.

What about administration? I understand the concern about fraud, but systems are already in place. As I have said, local authorities have information on empty properties, which they are required to provide as part of their council tax returns. They could provide exemption certificates for the properties identified.

European law is clearly a difficult hurdle, but I am confident. The Treasury team won the argument on the reduction of VAT on fuel, to which we were committed, and I think that they could win this argument too. Given the way in which VAT exemptions are currently being applied to new build, it is difficult to argue that they are consistent with the criteria. Article 17 of the sixth directive allows VAT exemptions provided that they are maintained for "clearly definable social reasons and for the benefit of the final consumer".

It follows that the current VAT arrangements allow a millionaire's new home to be built on a green-field site for "social reasons". It is certainly of "benefit", but it is not for social reasons in housing terms.

The conversion of a barn is zero-rated. How many families in housing need were rehoused in such conversions in 1994, the year in which that exemption was introduced? Just one.

In Medway, our empty homes strategy enabled us to bring 100 homes back into use, working in partnership with housing associations. Social landlords are not exempt from VAT, but, with harmonisation, we could have provided 15 more homes for families on low incomes. There are some 3,000 empty homes in my borough, which could make a significant contribution to the requirement in the local plan for Medway to provide 13,000 homes.

We should also consider the matter of house prices. The average value of arable land is £3,000 per acre, which can increase to £400,000 per acre when planning permission is given. There is plenty of room for a modest 5 per cent. increase.

I believe that harmonising VAT on long-standing empty properties would provide the building industry with the necessary incentives, protecting our countryside and regenerating our inner cities. I am confident that the Treasury team will examine the possibilities closely, working in conjunction with the DETR, so that we can improve the environment and provide a sustainable taxation base for housing.

10.14 am

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell): I congratulate the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Brinton) on securing this welcome debate. I believe that environmental taxation could underpin a huge reform of our tax system, but such a reform will require imagination and courage.

In February, the Treasury promised such a new approach to environmental taxes. It echoed that promise in a recent pre-Budget report, saying that the Government were in their sustainable development strategy. A welcome process of consultation has been embarked on, not least through the Marshall report, but so far little action has been taken, and no timetable has been drawn up.

"committed to exploring the scope for using taxes"

What concerns me most is the lack of vision in regard to the place of environmental taxation in the overall tax system, and how it should be introduced. So far, we have seen no more than a continuation of the Conservative Government's record. Ad hoc increases in what are described as environmental taxes have been seen as tax-raising rather than as tax-changing—in my view, the latter is the fundamental principle of environmental taxation. There has been an increase in the fuel tax escalator, but no commensurate cut in other taxes. There has been an increase in the landfill tax, but, unlike the original introduction of the tax, that increase involves no hypothecated cut in another tax. Previously, employers' national insurance was cut, and that was seen as a benefit of the introduction of that "green" tax. If the process continues, we risk destroying any public support for, or belief in, environmental taxation.

Mr. Loughton: How does what the hon. Gentleman has said tally with the last Government's 25 per cent. cut in duty on LPG, and the fact that the landfill tax was introduced with a compensatory allowance for a reduction in employers' national insurance contributions? Those were not overall tax-raising measures.

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman cannot have been listening to what I said about the landfill tax. I said exactly that. As for his first point, the last Government raised £25 billion in increased fuel duties; nothing like that was spent on the small cuts in duty on LPG and unleaded fuel. I welcome those cuts, but there was no deal. The last Government raised an extra £25 billion net through increases in fuel taxation. That is why I believe that we should return to first principles.

Environmental taxation provides incentives for the continuous improvement of environmental performance. It thus introduces a market-led mechanism to find cost-effective ways of securing change. That is one clear benefit, but taxation is not an alternative to regulation. Regulation lays the base: it underpins the level of what can be allowed. Taxation must come on top of that. It can raise revenue to pay for improvements, and I welcome the Government's saying that they may introduce road pricing to finance better local transport. When charges are introduced to provide a clear benefit, it is appropriate to use the revenue for such investment.

As for the wider issue of general environmental taxation, I believe that, to win support, it requires a larger vision. Income, jobs and added value are all heavily taxed, although we want higher incomes, more jobs and more added value. Instead, we should be taxing pollution and the excessive use of resources. We all talk about that—the hon. Member for Peterborough rightly did so herself—but we need to strike a genuine bargain with the public. We need to make it clear that, when we talk of environmental taxation, we are talking not of a general process of tax increases dressed up in a green gown, but of radical reform of the tax system.

I can give two examples that demonstrate the importance of such reform. The first is the petrol price escalator, on which, as I have said, the last Government raised £25 billion, and on which the new Government plan to raise some £9 billion. However, neither the previous nor the current Government expressed a clear commitment to a substantive shift in taxation alongside those escalators. So far, Governments have been protected from real public anger about the escalators because raw material prices have been falling, so that there has been little real-terms impact at the pump. As raw material prices have been falling, the escalators have had nothing like the impact implied by their size. However, the situation may change if oil price increases reach the pump.

Given the massive scale of revenues, there is a real opportunity to do something that will not only help to maintain public supp for the process and match the rhetoric of taxing bads rather than goods, but emphasise the principle that the problem with car ownership is excessive use—specifically excessive use of fuel—and not vehicle ownership itself. For most people—certainly in rural constituencies such as my own—vehicle ownership is a necessary part of daily life. However, very often, people can use more fuel-efficient vehicles and think again about making the very large proportion of very short journeys—which is where the fuel escalator comes in.

If the issue is vehicle use and not vehicle ownership, we should stop taxing ownership as such. I therefore believe that a part of the income that we are raising by such means should be used to abolish vehicle excise duty for all but the most gas-guzzling vehicles. Although there is a principle that we may want to provide a direct disincentive against choosing ownership of the most gas-guzzling vehicles, the issue for the great majority of people is use and not ownership. Abolition of vehicle excise duty would be a strong signal to that effect.

The Government are consulting on vehicle excise duty changes, but we have to face the fact that the difference between £150 a year and £100 a year—as the Chancellor suggested last year—is unlikely to change people's habits when deciding which vehicle to buy. In the context of car ownership, that sum—although it will undoubtedly be pocketed with cheer—is too small.

Abolishing vehicle excise duty could make a real difference in people's decisions on which vehicles to buy. Most significantly, abolition could make a difference in which vehicles fleet buyers decide to buy. We know that most larger-engine vehicles were purchased originally by the company car market and sold subsequently into the second-hand market. Those vehicles' lack of fuel economy is discounted by the low prices that they achieve on the secondhand market. Buyers of the cars therefore compensate themselves in advance. Vehicle excise duty would be a direct way of dealing with that situation. If we do not do something about such situations, we shall lose basic public support for the principle of environmental taxation.

The second issue that I should like to deal with is the carbon tax and energy taxation. The Marshall report was very good news on the issue. Given Lord Marshall's background as an extremely experienced business man in an industry in which fuel costs comprise a significant part of overall costs—I do not think that anyone had thought of him as a great environmentalist before he was appointed to his new role—it was extremely significant that his report argued for energy taxation.

One conclusion of the Marshall report was:

"there probably is a role for a tax if businesses of all sizes and from all sectors are to contribute to improved energy efficiency".

Although that sentence sounds rather full of caveats, the report goes much further, arguing comprehensively for the introduction of energy taxation. The point—it is often lost—that is being made in that quotation is that Marshall does not believe that a trading system, which is the explored alternative, would be an effective mechanism to embrace all business. He believes that such a system could apply to the largest businesses—although it would be complex and difficult to introduce—but could not be introduced for all business. He therefore favours taxation over the alternatives that have been examined, and that is an important part of his conclusions.

[Mr. Taylor]

I have a couple of important reservations about the matter. The first is that Lord Marshall suggests that such taxation should cover all energy and not only carbon energies. Taxation would therefore apply as much to energy from renewable sources as it does to energy from the most polluting sources. He said that he had reached the conclusion that it would not be possible to differentiate between the types of energy, because there would not be such taxation of domestic fuel.

Liberal Democrats have argued that such taxation should be applied across the board precisely for those reasons, and could be introduced now, at a time of falling energy prices—so that energy prices are at least kept roughly at current levels and are not expected to fall, thereby reducing incentives to invest in future energy savings. That would be one solution to the dilemma.

The Government will have to find a way in which they can target carbon fuels without imposing a general energy tax. If they cannot, the tax would fall at the first—environmental—hurdle of justification. That is precisely where VAT on fuel came a cropper for the previous Government. Not only was that tax self-evidently targeted at the non-polluting fuels: it was a financial tax-grab rather than part of a tax change. There was no big tax cut to go with it.

Lord Marshall made my next point, which is that revenues raised from an energy tax must be recycled into other tax cuts. I believe that such a proposal is likely to receive as much support from the business sector as it is from ordinary people. At the general election, Liberal Democrats fought on a policy of cutting VAT and employer's national insurance, to boost jobs and to help those who pay extra energy bills by cutting their other bills.

We now suggest being more direct and using the revenue gradually to raise income tax thresholds so that £10,000 is tax-free for every individual. That would be a very direct incentive for jobs, income, earning and hard work. It would also be direct compensation for any extra costs that people may pay, more than outweighing any increase in domestic fuel costs—which are nevertheless falling.

Those examples show clearly not only the role that environmental taxation can play but the pitfalls surrounding such taxation. The biggest single message must be one of vision, by placing the role of environmental taxation clearly in the context of reform of the wider tax system. Such taxation will not have public support if it is seen as a back door way of raising taxes—which the Chancellor can claim are good ones, whereas everyone realises that they are simply paying more. Such taxation has to be part of a process of tax reform. If the Government do that, they will make it possible to have a truly reforming series of Budgets in this Parliament.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): I add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Brinton) on securing this important debate. I congratulate also my hon. Friend the Member for Chatham and Aylesford (Mr. Shaw) specifically on his campaign to highlight the differences between VAT treatment of empty and new-build properties.

The Government, and particularly my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, have been enormously courageous in asking Lord Marshall to draw up a report on the business use of energy and possible tax measures to reduce business energy use. Like other hon. Members, I look forward to hearing the comments of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary on the Treasury's thinking on the Marshall report. As I, too, am a member of the Environmental Audit Committee, I should like to take this opportunity to welcome him to one of our meetings, so that he can tell us in detail how the Government will make progress on the energy tax agenda.

I shall concentrate this speech on measures that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury might take to encourage the renewable energy sector. The Government have already taken some important initiatives in supporting renewables. The Government's reversal of the previous Administration's cuts in renewables research and development spending—which they had planned to eliminate entirely by 2005—is very welcome. Investment in renewable technologies is essential for lowering their cost, and for ensuring that Britain will be in a position to reap the benefits of the global expansion in renewables, not only creating employment in the United Kingdom but realising the huge benefits of preventing climate change.

Other fiscal measures and tax incentives to stimulate the levering of private finance into the renewables industry could be usefully considered by the Treasury in helping us to meet our targets. The non-fossil fuel obligation has been successful in reducing costs of renewables, but many non-governmental organisations and the International Energy Agency have recommended that other measures to develop the green electricity market—both to complement the NFFO and to encourage the commercial take-up of energy generated by renewable sources—should be taken.

Some electricity companies offer a green tariff for those willing to pay extra for renewable energy. That may attract some subscribers, but I fear that they will be in a minority. It will be a significant time before sufficient funds are generated for substantial investment in renewables.

Countries such as the Netherlands have successfully levered private finance into renewable energy through simple tax incentives. Since the introduction of a green tax break in 1995, almost £200 million of private finance has been invested in funds established by Dutch banks for environmental projects. The majority of investment has been in renewables, although there have also been small investments in organic farming, eco-offices and the development of natural habitats and country estates. Similar tax breaks have been advocated by the New Economics Foundation and others to stimulate investment in initiatives, including environmental initiatives, to tackle social and financial exclusion. Other Treasury Ministers are considering such proposals.

The interest or dividends on the green funds are exempt from income tax, allowing the bank to pass on favourable terms to the investor and the project being financed. The initiative has been greeted with considerable enthusiasm by the Dutch public and financial institutions. The certificates of the first green interest fund issued by Rabo-Robeco bank to the value of £150 million were sold out in nine days. The ABN-AMRO fund for a £25 million wind farm was similarly popular.

The green funds have succeeded by harnessing the public's desire to invest their savings in an environmentally sound and ethical way while still receiving an acceptable return. They have also provided much-needed capital for renewable energy projects, which could not have been secured through public expenditure or other means. The green funds are carefully regulated through the Dutch central bank. Proposals by project developers are assessed by the Ministry of Housing and Environment. The initiative has already resulted in 25 new energy projects, mostly on wind energy.

There is a fund for investing in wind power in Britain, established by the Triodos bank, but it is on a small scale compared with the Netherlands and does not have the advantages of the Netherlands tax system. My hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry has welcomed the fund as an example of extending community involvement in the planning and ownership of green energy schemes.

We must carry the public with us if we are to achieve our renewables target. The Dutch system has so far favoured large-scale projects, but attention must be given to promoting renewable energy at community level. Tax incentives for communities that want to invest in renewable technology should be actively promoted. It has been demonstrated in other countries that, where communities have a stake in renewable facilities—such as through a co-operatively owned structure—and can see the financial benefits, they are more positive about the development of renewables. Tax incentives for community-based renewable projects would help to stimulate interest in, and take-up of, renewable energy, particularly if any surplus electricity could be taken by the grid at a reasonable price.

A tax incentive scheme could be a useful complementary measure to the NFFO. It would help us to meet our renewables and carbon dioxide targets and ensure that Britain was at the forefront of the development of the renewables sector. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will give careful consideration to such a scheme.

Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): I congratulate the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Brinton) on securing the debate. I should like to concentrate on why it is so important.

I recently became a trustee of an international body that is concerned with the crisis in the world's fisheries. The UN Food and Agriculture Organisation estimates that 60 per cent. of the world's fisheries require urgent management, and that 30 to 40 per cent. of them are about to be exhausted. It is essential that Governments take a lead and mean what they say. This should not be an issue of party politics. The previous Government passed on a good record on the environment to the new Government. However, more needs to be done. The link between the environment and taxation is crucial. I agree with the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Mr. Taylor) that a serious tax reform must consider the role of the environment.

The Deputy Prime Minister recently returned from the conference on climate change in Buenos Aires. He went out with a great deal to say and high hopes, but most of us know that he returned with very little agreed. One of the major agreements was that 146 unresolved items would be deferred to a future climate change meeting.

The world must face up to the crisis. Countries such as the United Kingdom must take a lead and the Government must take action. The Government have shown a spirit of wanting to get on with addressing the problems of the environment. There has been a great deal of consultation. Indeed, as Charles Secrett of Friends of the Earth recently said, the Government's motto is fast becoming "Carry on Consulting". Lord Marshall's recent report on business energy use and the proposal for an energy tax is a start, but, for all the criticisms that might be levelled against the report, the Chancellor's response was that we must have more consultation.

Some of the problems require not just consultation, but action. The Marine Stewardship Council came into play because Unilever and the World Wide Fund for Nature put up about £1 million for urgent research on the state of the world's fisheries. That was not done with whole-hearted benevolence, but there was philanthropy involved. Unilever owns Bird's Eye. It realised that, in 10 years, there will be no more cod for its fish fingers. It is a long time since an 18th-century cabin boy could report that he was unable to get the boat out from the shore into the Baltic sea for three days because of the shoals of fish. Today, he would be lucky to find a fish in the Baltic.

The MSC wants to launch two major projects: one on the state of Alaska salmon and the second on South African hake. Those fisheries will soon be exhausted, but it is difficult for such bodies to find the funding that they need. There are suggestions of hypothecated taxation or the creation of an independent resource such as an environmental investment bank from which bodies such as the MSC or the Forest Stewardship Council could draw. Action is essential.

The Government's pre-Budget report has been criticised by many green bodies, including Friends of the Earth, because it fails to make core links between the environment and taxation. One of the projects mentioned in the pre-Budget report involves changes to vehicle excise duty. We have heard that there is to be a cut of £50 for cars with low emissions—a total incentive from the Treasury of £1.7 billion or £1.8 billion. However, we can guess that the Government will increase vehicle excise duty on other cars, which will net the Exchequer the same amount of money.

What will happen to that money? Will it be specifically linked to innovation in new technologies to protect the environment? Will it be made available to bodies such as the Marine Stewardship Council, which could use it to get on with the crucial work of certification, which has been agreed around the world? It has a set of principles that the whole world will sign up to, including the industries and the retailers involved.

The problem is that we cannot get the money to progress to the next stage. This is an opportunity for the Government. The environment needs to be at the heart of the economy, because we are talking about a common inheritance, as John Stuart Mill recognised. It should be at the heart of a civilised society to recognise its duty to husband the environment.

If the Government and the Chancellor are serious about the environment, they should use the change in vehicle excise duty as a way of helping the environment rather than a way of raising taxes. I am glad to see the Chief Secretary to the Treasury in his place, because his presence is a recognition of the importance of the debate. Will he consider ensuring that the money is not used simply as a way of raising taxes for general revenue purposes, but will be hypothecated in some form, and find its way into environmental concerns, to help bodies such as the Marine Stewardship Council and the Forestry Stewardship Council?

The tax changes should not simply penalise people who drive cars, they should change behaviour. That is at the heart of the issue. The problem is that changes to vehicle excise duty will probably hit people in rural communities hard, while people in urban communities go on driving their cars, and congestion, emissions and pollution continue. The crucial challenge on the environment and taxation is to find a meaningful way in which to encourage people, industry and businesses to change their behaviour. That is at the heart of the debate, and a civilised society must think about it.

Sustainable development is not a slogan, but a crucial task for the Government to take on. I urge the Chief Secretary to tell the House that sustainable development is not mere rhetoric but will be translated into policy, and that the Treasury will firmly underline that fact.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Brinton) has chosen well in selecting this important subject for debate, but she has also chosen a minefield for the Government. Several of the mines have already been trodden on by Labour Members, so we look forward to the response to the debate by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury.

I support my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Woodward) in saying that sustainable development should be a core aim in any civilised society. The Conservatives have always believed that tax measures have an important part to play in delivering environmental aims. For instance, we used tax measures to achieve the successful switch from leaded to unleaded petrol.

Another example that has already been mentioned is the landfill tax, which we introduced, and which was designed to deter and tax the dumping of waste in landfill sites. Crucially, we used the revenue—nearly half a billion pounds a year—to cut employers' national insurance contributions by an equivalent annual sum. By taxing pollution, we cut the taxes on employment.

We can contrast that with what the present Chancellor of the Exchequer has done. He has announced a 43 per cent. increase in the standard rate of landfill tax, but the money will not be recycled into industry or used to reduce the costs of employment. Instead, it will simply be bagged by the Treasury for general expenditure. Taxation comes first, and the environment a poor second. It is therefore not surprising that, in March, the director of Friends of the Earth, Mr. Secrett, said:

"Last week's Budget was unforgivable. At a stroke, Gordon Brown broke the Government's manifesto promise to put 'the environment at the heart of policymaking'."

We shall undoubtedly hear several ideas from the Government about aggregate taxation, taxing water pollution and so on—but those ideas were first announced in July 1997. Since then, they have put up taxes 17 times and revolutionised the British constitution, but they still have not introduced any of those environmental ideas.

Rather than trying to gaze into a crystal ball, we are now entitled to examine the Government's record, and we see that little has been done for the environment, while great damage has been done to industry and commerce. My hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) made a good point about fuel taxation. The Library has calculated that the additional fuel escalator and future tax increases in future Budgets will add £9 billion to the costs of transport and motoring during this Parliament. That will not do anything for the environment; it will simply raise revenue.

The Government have a problem with carbon dioxide reduction, because they are stopping the development of any more gas-burning power stations, and nuclear power will start to be phased out soon, as the older Magnox reactors are decommissioned. However, imposing a burden on the motorist as a substitute will not do the trick. Indeed, the Budget documents make it clear that, by 2010, reductions due to the fuel duty increases will amount to only 1.7 million tonnes of carbon a year, compared with an annual emission of 206 million tonnes. After 12 years of fuel tax increases, the benefit will be an 0.8 per cent. reduction in carbon emissions at best. That is a ludicrously expensive way of achieving not very much. A fraction of that money used in other ways to reduce carbon emissions or to control pollution would bring a far greater return.

The Government are not only hitting the motorist, in rural areas and elsewhere, but damaging the haulage industry—a subject on which the House had a good debate last week. The whole of manufacturing industry is being hit, and productivity undermined, by huge and continuing cost increases. The Government lecture manufacturing industry about productivity. That is their new excuse for economic problems—lazy workers not doing enough at plant level. Yet, at the same time, they are imposing wave upon wave of extra regulations and tax increases on the firms in which people work.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not. I have only a few minutes and I must complete the points that I want to make, most of which are in response to what has been said in the debate.

Despite their declared belief in tax harmonisation in Europe, the Government have made diesel fuel the most expensive in Europe—if that is untrue, I hope that the Minister will correct me now. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury sits on a committee dealing with unfair tax competition in the European Union, which means increasing United Kingdom taxation where it is below continental levels. Yet, although the Government have unquestioned discretion on fuel taxation, successive Budgets have widened the gap between our fuel taxes and those on the continent.

That is not harmonisation but the economics of the madhouse. The Government are making a bad situation worse. French lorry drivers come over here with full tanks to take freight round the United Kingdom, while British lorries fill up on the continent. We are exporting not only jobs but revenue.

Smuggling in Northern Ireland leads to a loss of about £100 million in revenue every year, because of the tax differentials across the border. When I asked the Treasury about that, the answer was that it had made no estimate. The Government think that they can estimate carbon reductions in 2010, but they have no idea how much revenue is lost today. Those are the finances of the madhouse.

Instead of making things better, the Government have announced that things will get worse, because they have signalled that successive Budgets will continue to increase fuel taxes year on year. The damaging differential between our fuel tax rates and those on the continent will widen.

There is another threat, which is mentioned in Lord Marshall's report on a possible energy tax. I am not impressed by the report, which has a curious omission. A Government document on climate change says that air transport is the fastest growing source of carbon dioxide emissions. However, aviation fuel is not taxed at all. The document by Lord Marshall is silent on that sector. I find that surprising, because Lord Marshall is, of course, the chairman of British Airways and has a great deal of knowledge and expertise in that sector. He might have been expected to tell us what should be done to bring those emissions under control, instead of dishing it out to the poor old haulage industry. The report is partial and incomplete, and it will, if we are not careful, impose huge additional costs, making British industry less competitive and driving investment away.

What we see is not the use of taxation to deliver environmental goals—that, perhaps, we could support—but the use of the environment to justify huge tax increases. The Chief Secretary to the Treasury is about to reply, and I welcome that. He is still relatively new to his job. Let him use his influence to reverse this high-tax strategy, which has failed. It is doing very little for the environment, it is undermining businesses and it is costing jobs.

In this area at least, can the Government make a start on bringing their rhetoric into line with their performance—or, perhaps, more accurately, start to bring what they do in practice into line with their pre-election rhetoric?

10.50 am

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Byers): The Government welcome today's debate on the environmental effects of taxation. I add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Brinton) on securing this debate. I was interested to hear about the Peterborough energy audit and the valuable role played by Perkins Engines in that initiative. My hon. Friend has been a doughty campaigner in Peterborough and elsewhere on environmental matters.

I also welcome the several members of the Environmental Audit Committee who are in the Chamber. I received a kind invitation from my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) to attend one of the Committee's meetings in the near future, and I am due to do so in December. I look forward to that with some trepidation, given the quality of speeches in today's debate.

As we face the century ahead, we need a focused programme of environmental modernisation—a programme that is not simply about environmental protection, but one that can achieve objectives that are central to the Government's policies. Those policies are clearly set out in the Government's approach to sustainable development, and are based on four broad objectives: first, the maintenance of high and stable levels of growth and employment; secondly, the effective protection of the environment; thirdly, prudent use of natural resources; fourthly, social progress which recognises the needs of everyone.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): In the context of the Government's commitment to sustainable development, will my right hon. Friend agree to look again at the code for fiscal stability? Is he aware that, in the recent version of the code which came out with the pre-Budget report, there is a single reference to the word "environment"—and that is the economic environment? Does he agree that it is worth looking at the five criteria used in the code and perhaps including a sixth—sustainability? Would that not be a way of effectively locking in fiscal policy with the Government's commitment to putting the environment at the heart of government?

Mr. Byers: There are a number of ways in which we can address those environmental concerns. My hon. Friend will be pleased to hear that, early next year, the Government will publish our strategy on sustainable development. That will outline our aims, as well as measures already in place, and will highlight what further action might be undertaken to achieve our objectives. Those objectives will make it clear that we believe that economic development must take place in a sustainable way to ensure a better quality of life for everyone, both now and for future generations.

We recognise that what matters is not just the quality but the level of growth. The debate has shown that the tax system clearly has an important role in underpinning sustainable development. Our strategic approach was outlined in our statement of intent on environmental taxation, published at the time of the Budget in July 1997. How and what the Government tax sends clear signals about which economic activities we believe should be encouraged or discouraged. Just as work should be encouraged through the tax system, environmental pollution should be discouraged.

I listened with interest to several hon. Members—including my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough and the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton)—who mentioned the need to establish a green tax commission, something that was proposed by the Environmental Audit Committee in its response to the pre-Budget report. A number of European countries have such a commission, but the experience is variable—it works well in some countries, and not so well in others. We are keeping under review the possibility of establishing such a commission. We do not want duplication. There are many organisations doing valuable work in this area, and we shall need to look carefully to see whether a green tax commission can play a valuable role.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chatham and Aylesford (Mr. Shaw) referred to the harmonisation of VAT on the renovation of empty properties. We keep all tax matters under review—that is the nature of any Government. It will be for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to decide whether any changes will be made in that direction. I am sure that my right hon. Friend will look with interest at my hon. Friend's comments.

The hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Woodward) raised the two main issues, in my view. First, he referred to the difficulty caused by the Government consulting so much. We make no apologies for that. This is one of the areas where we need to take people with us and to explain the direction in which we wish to go. By doing that, we can command broad and popular support for our proposals. Secondly, the hon. Gentleman referred to hypothecation. We judge each case on its merits, and we will look carefully at each proposal. Once again, we have noted with interest the hon. Gentleman's specific proposals this morning.

It would be a mistake to believe that taxation is the only way in which we can address environmental issues. Clearly, a key part can be played by taxes, but they are not always the solution to every environmental problem. Environmental taxation must meet the general test of good taxation. It must be well designed to meet its objectives without undesirable side effects. It must keep deadweight compliance and administrative costs to a minimum, and care must be taken with regard to implications for the competitive position of UK companies in international markets.

The hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham was critical of the Government's spending commitments, which he felt did not address sufficiently environmental concerns. I wish to give the House an example of how the spending—£40 billion for schools and hospitals over the next three years, with which the Conservative party disagrees—can be used to address environmental concerns.

The House will know that the Government have started a large-scale programme of capital investment in our schools and £30 million has been allocated for improvements in energy management, including the replacement of heating systems. Decisions have just been taken to allocate to some 891 schools some of the money. It is estimated that they will achieve average savings on fuel costs of 20 per cent., with further savings on maintenance costs. This should, in total, amount to more than £2 million in savings a year which can be ploughed back into the individual schools. It is not merely pupils who will benefit. There will be a reduction of 44,000 tonnes in the level of carbon dioxide emissions due to the programme, which is the equivalent of 23 million average car journeys, or a reduction of 24,700 in the number of cars—a real contribution that can be made.

The Government will consider the issues in the round. We will study taxation and other measures that can be taken to improve our environment. We intend to do that with people—to consult and move forward on an ambitious agenda that will be based, not on dogma but on putting the national interest first. On the basis of those principles, I commend our approach to the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. We now move on to the debate on the pig and livestock industry.

Pig and Livestock Industry

10.59 am

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak on this subject, and I am sure that hon. Members will forgive me if I start with livestock before moving to the pig sector. I am also grateful for the support that I have received from a number of my colleagues, including some who are unable to be here but who have contacted me on the subject.

The debate is timely, coming only two days after the announcement by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food of an aid package. Farming is in crisis, and it is the worst depression in the industry since the 1930s. Some farmers are leaving the industry because they cannot see any light at the end of the tunnel, and some are leaving because they have no choice as they are going bankrupt. The majority of farmers are staying in the industry, but getting poorer. Any savings that they have been able to build up through a number of years of hard and long toil have been eaten away and, for some, overdrafts are increasing daily to dangerous levels.

Put simply, the prices paid for animals have decreased dramatically in the past two years. In some cases, farmers are paid less for their animals now than they were 20 years ago. I do not know whether any other industry is facing similar difficulties. Part of the problem is that consumers do not appreciate the fact that that is happening. One farmer told me that 18 months ago he was paid between £1.10 and £1.20 a kilo for his cattle, but now it is between 75p and 80p. For lamb, the price used to be £1.10 to £1.30 and now it is 65p a kilo.

However, consumers visiting the larger supermarkets do not appreciate the fact that such dramatic falls have taken place. Farmers are being bled dry and consumers are being ripped off. Current supermarket prices are a conspiracy to clobber the producer and cheat the shopper. It is about time a new deal was struck for British farmers and consumers, and if our supermarkets are not going to do that job, who will? Lower prices in the shops would at least encourage increased consumption by more people. That is not the answer to all the industry's problems, but one can imagine the anger and frustration of farmers whose incomes have declined dramatically in the past two years when they see others maintaining or even increasing their margins.

The National Farmers Union has predicted that incomes will fall by a further 67 per cent. this year. Clearly, the situation is not tenable. For farmers to be told that aid will help them in the short term is no comfort when the crisis is long term—it has been going on for two years for many farmers. Obviously, banks have become concerned and relationships between farmers and bankers are strained. The banks will not carrying on lending when they see no prospect of a return.

I understand that the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will be meeting bankers to discuss the farming crisis, for which I am grateful. Perhaps the Minister can tell us today what his right hon. Friend will say to the bankers when they meet. What fresh hope of an improvement in the plight of farmers can be given to bankers to help them sustain farmers through this crisis?

The majority of my contribution will concentrate on pig farming, but I wanted to put that part of the sector into the context of an industry that is reeling. The £120 million of aid announced on Monday is better than nothing, but that is as much as I can say about it. Will the Minister ensure that that money gets through to farmers as quickly as possible, because those with overdrafts see their bank managers weekly and will need to put it in the bank as soon as possible?

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most noticeable features absent from the announcement on Monday was that, whereas £48.3 million is being made available for the beef industry, not one penny is to go to the pig and poultry industries? Does he not think that that is a disgrace?

Mr. Evans: The pig industry has a distinct problem, but the crisis is hitting all sectors of farming. While the Government are targeting certain areas, the pig and poultry industries, which are also reeling from the same sort of problems as the rest of the industry, are getting no support. My hon. Friend is right about that, and I will be interested to hear what the Minister has to say about the rest of the sector in his reply.

Ben Gill of the NFU stated that the £120 million will "act as a short-term safety net for some farmers teetering on the brink of financial collapse."

Also, interest rates have increased and the extra costs that farmers have incurred as a result more than swallow up the aid package announced on Monday. Frankly, for many farmers the aid package is not only too little but too late. We need a new approach to the industry—one that will give it greater security for the future—and a new attitude on the part of the Government.

The common agricultural policy is a disastrous method of taking money off the taxpayer in large amounts and ensuring that, in some cases, farmers have to live on less than the proposed minimum wage, which is not sustainable. We know that there are inefficiencies within the European Union. Only yesterday, we heard that there have been about £3 billion-worth of inefficiencies/fraud and that the gravy train is speeding out of control. Something needs to be done to deal with the problem, and capital is needed urgently, in particular because the EU is to increase in size and some of the countries that are about to join are enormous producers of agricultural products, which will impact on United Kingdom farming.

Farmers are reeling from lower prices, but they are also swamped by paperwork. There are new rules and regulations and new welfare standards to obey. Costs are being heaped upon them, with Meat Hygiene Service charges the final insult for many. One farmer told me yesterday that he knows of an abattoir owner who has nine employees at the abattoir, plus seven people from the MHS and two vets to inspect what is going on. Clearly that is not sustainable either. All those costs are passed on. When will those escalating costs to farmers and the industry be controlled?

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk): Some Norfolk farmers told me last week that a number of inspectors are recruited from eastern Europe and some do not speak English properly. One inspector is from Hungary. This is not an insult to them as people, but obviously the communications problems need to be solved.

Mr. Evans: There is certainly a communications problem, but it may not be between the Hungarian inspector and the people with whom he works. The communications breakdown is between the farmers and those working in the industry and the Government. We need some control of costs so that farmers and people in the industry have some security for the future. For instance, will the Minister tell me whether our continental neighbours face similar costs to those heaped on our industry by the Meat Hygiene Service? Do they have the same sort of hygiene service and similar numbers of inspectors and vets in their abattoirs as in the UK? If not, why not?

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Elliot Morley): The veterinary inspection procedures derive from a European Union directive and are exactly the same in other member states. Eastern European and other EU vets are working in our abattoirs because of recruitment problems in the United Kingdom, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that all of them speak English.

Mr. Evans: That is reassuring. As the Minister knows, all EU directives are enforced in this country—everything that we sign up to, we obey—but there is widespread scepticism in the industry about whether other EU countries would know an EU directive if they fell over one. The Minister, with his colleagues, must ensure that no competitive advantage is given to our EU neighbours.

Mr. Gray: My hon. Friend is more than generous in giving way twice. Is he aware that the standards of inspection in many European countries are much lower? In France, for example, only a vet is required to attend, whereas in this country a vet and a meat processor are needed. Moreover, in many European countries, inspection is paid for by the Government, whereas in this country the industry pays 100 per cent. of the costs. That is straightforward evidence from the Meat and Livestock Commission of the difference between European countries and the UK.

Mr. Evans: I am grateful for that contribution, which demonstrates the disparity between Britain and Europe. If British farmers and the British industry have to meet all the costs when farmers in other European countries do not, our neighbours will have a competitive advantage in the export market, and British farmers will suffer. That must be sorted out as quickly as possible.

The pig industry has been largely ignored in the current crisis. I saw a photograph of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in his wellies on a farm in Devon—he was surrounded by pigs. That was a great photo opportunity for him, and no doubt the pig farmers there bent his ear about the problems that the industry faces.

I pay tribute to Greg Smith and Philip Edge, two pig farmers in my constituency, whom I consulted in preparing for this debate. Their plight is typical. We must remember that the crisis is affecting small family businesses—individuals whose families have, in some cases, worked for generations in the industry. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) said, of the £120 million that was announced on Monday, the pig industry will receive nothing.

Mr. Morley: It did not ask for anything.

Mr. Evans: The Minister says that it did not ask for anything, but it is asking for help. Only a few weeks ago,

[Mr. Evans]

I attended the Meat Livestock Commission breakfast at which he said: "Of course we know that the pig industry is in deep crisis, but how marvellous it is that it does not get any support." That is like watching a ship going down, not sending any support vessels to help it and, when the ship disappears, saying: "How marvellous. It did not ask for any support." The problem is that it did not receive any support.

Mr. Morley: There are no EU mechanisms on subsidies—as the hon. Gentleman said, the pig industry has never received subsidies. I emphasise that, although the pig industry has asked for a range of measures, which I shall outline, it has never requested direct subsidies.

Mr. Evans: That may be so, but we must recognise that the industry is reeling from the same pressures as the rest of agriculture. It is pointless saying that the sector has not asked for any subsidies; it is asking for help and a range of measures irrespective of subsidies. Farmers in neighbouring countries do not have to face the costs that are being heaped on the British industry.

Pig farmers are deeply concerned about the price that they are receiving for their products. The other day, Farmers' Weekly said:

"Despite Brussels' recent decision to raise export subsidies, UK prices have continued to slip and are now less than half the cost of production. The number of casualties is mounting, most notably this week with the bankruptcy of Scotland's biggest pig farmer, Arthur Simmers. But the pain is not being shared equally and supermarkets continue to profit from the crisis. Since the market peaked in June last year, producer prices have slumped by a massive 55 per cent. Retail values over the same period, however, have dropped by just 13 per cent."

Mr. Keith Simpson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way again. He is no doubt aware that Norfolk produces more than one tenth of all this country's pigs; it is estimated by local experts that the county has lost £58 million in the past 11 months because of the crisis in the industry. A farmer told me last week that his family business had lost £7,500. We do not want the Minister to give descriptions of the problems; we want answers to the specific questions that I know my hon. Friend will raise.

Mr. Evans: Norfolk is an important area for pig production, but the whole of the United Kingdom is affected. I have received a letter from the Ulster Farmers Union, whose members are also reeling from the crisis. All sectors of agriculture and all parts of the United Kingdom are affected.

The strong pound has had an impact on exports. Because of the difficulties in Asia and Russia, two markets that the EU has traditionally supplied, there have been many lost contracts, which has led to an over-supply. Moreover, many farmers in the UK and elsewhere have been increasing production to try to make up for the lost money, but that depresses prices even further.

Another problem is the welfare rules. We support the ending of stalls and tethers, but we must recognise that that has led to further costs for the industry. One of my farmers told me that he had had to spend £35,000 on new production methods for his pigs, but that sum is probably at the lower end of the range—some farmers will have had to spend much more than that. Animal welfare policies are being implemented in the United Kingdom well before they are in the rest of the European Union, with which we have to compete.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): The capital investment that my hon. Friend mentions may, on paper, become an asset, but it is hard to do anything with it, as it is not transferable or flexible. It is often said that farmers have a lot of land and capital, but that capital is not very useful in a time of crisis.

Mr. Evans: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The capital investment is not an asset when the pig farmer has had to borrow the money and now has to pay it back, with interest charges, as prices for his product fall. The welfare standards are tremendous, but I wish that they were met elsewhere, so that farmers in other European Union countries did not have a competitive advantage. What message on welfare standards will the Minister give to pig farmers? Will he ensure that pigmeat coming into this country meets the same standards as pigmeat that is produced here?

Mr. Morley indicated assent.

Mr. Evans: I see the Minister nodding. We are giving our European Union neighbours, such as Holland, Denmark and France, a competitive advantage. It may be four or five years before some of those countries abandon stalls and tethers, in which time they will be able to kick British pigmeat out of the market and dominate it themselves. In that time, our farmers will go out of business, and it is very difficult for those starting up to make any impact.

Let us not give our neighbours a competitive advantage. We must fight for welfare standards throughout the whole of the European Union. If we are too far ahead of the game, we will do the British industry no service.

Mr. Morley: I well understand the hon. Gentleman's serious point about welfare standards, but I do not agree that our competitors who do not have the same standards as ours have a marketing advantage. The British Retail Consortium's recent announcements about the sourcing of fresh pigmeat and bacon, and about extending the schemes to other processed products, show that our quality assurance schemes and buying practices give our producers a welfare and a marketing advantage over our competitors, as demonstrated by the fact that some of our continental competitors are voluntarily applying the same standards.

Mr. Evans: It remains to be seen what competitive advantage British pig farmers will gain, as 30 per cent. of all bacon goes to catering concerns, which will continue to go on price: if it is cheaper, they will buy bacon from Denmark, where there are stalls and tethers. A lot of bacon goes under brand names, in any case. The Danish pig industry has done a tremendous marketing job for many years. In my local supermarket last week I could not buy any bacon other than Danish, and I am in a rural area. If the supermarkets have shown the way, I do not put much faith in the support that we will get in the future.

I believe that the Minister is considering banning certain antibiotics, including growth enhancers. If that is done simultaneously throughout the European Union, there will be no competitive advantage to other countries, but if we do it even before the science says that growth enhancers are wrong, we will heap more costs on British pig farmers. I understand that, for every £1 that will no longer be spent on antibiotics, £6 will have to be spent on feeding the animals. How does the Minister intend to ensure that any ban is science-based and applied equally throughout the European Union?

Pig feed made from meat and bone meal is banned here, but not in the rest of the European Union. What hope can the Minister give the British pig farmers for progress on that?

Consumers should be given as much information as possible. They do not know that farmers are getting less for their product, because prices in the shops are virtually the same as they were two years ago. How can we ensure that consumers have the information to make intelligent decisions about what they buy?

Pig farmers used to get something for the waste from the pig, but now they get nothing: in fact, they have to pay to get all the waste destroyed.

My greatest fear is that, with all the extra costs and higher standards, British pigmeat will be more expensive and supermarkets will simply go for what is cheaper. Housewives will certainly go for the cheaper option, because many of them are on fixed incomes and cannot afford to make ethical or moral choices. What consultations is the Minister holding on support for the British pig industry?

I read in The Daily Telegraph this morning that 1.3 million extra eggs are being sold every day because Delia Smith demonstrated some recipes using eggs. Do British pig farmers have to rely on Delia Smith to concoct a wonderful recipe including British pigmeat to give the industry a boost, or can they rely on the Minister for some support?

We are looking for a level playing field, even though I hate that phrase. We are in a competitive, cut-throat world, and we are heaping extra costs on British pig farmers, giving the rest of Europe a competitive advantage. The industry will be listening when the Minister replies.

Mr. Alan Hurst (Braintree): There is all-party support for the British pig industry, and I was a little saddened that the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) sought party advantage in what is obviously a dire crisis for the whole of agriculture, and especially the pig industry. The idea of intervention, at which he was hinting, is not historically justified. According to my researches, pig farming has not historically received state support, and I do not believe that pig farmers want subsidy, although I understand that they face particular problems.

Veterinary inspection is required not only for pigs: I recently visited a turkey farm—run by a family firm since the 1920s—where people made the same points to me as the pig farmers made to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley. They are most anxious that the charges for continuous veterinary inspection should be on a headage or a weight basis, because the small operator is bound to suffer if there is a time-cost charge. In this time of agricultural crisis, I see some merit in the Government's at least considering some assistance with the cost of veterinary inspection for those involved in animal husbandry.

Mr. Hayes: One understands that universal subsidies cannot be applied across the board, especially in the arable, pigmeat and poultry sectors, but specific, targeted and focused help for exactly the sort of producers that the hon. Gentleman highlighted—in Essex and Lincolnshire—might have been expected from the statement earlier this week. I hope that the Minister will bring a more helpful proposal to the House.

Mr. Hurst: My judgment was that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food was warmly received and that it was generally accepted that he had consulted widely and listened, and had taken almost all the financial steps that the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) had urged him to take about two weeks earlier.

Mixed farms used to be much more common than they are today and, perhaps not in Norfolk but in many other areas, people used to move into and out of pig farming according to the state of the market, but that is no longer possible, because pig production has become much more capital-intensive. As far as I can gather, all farmers welcome the improvement in welfare standards, but that has added to capital costs, so people can no longer do pigs one year and chickens the next.

I am a little anxious if the only solution to the pig farming problem is thought to be discussions with our European neighbours about bringing all welfare standards up to the same level, because, if we wait for those negotiations to reach a proper conclusion, there will be few pig farmers left in this country to produce a product that has been so successfully improved over recent years.

Encouraging figures were given in a recent Adjournment debate, showing the progress that the pig farming industry had made over the past few years. A much leaner product has been produced to satisfy popular consumption demand. Until recently, the figures showed that the amount of pigmeat exported from this country had almost doubled.

However, what the industry cannot do—we probably cannot do it either, and it has been skirted around this morning as if it does not matter—is to solve the financial crisis in Russia and the far eastern economies. It is not just our pigmeat producers who cannot export to those countries; our European competitors face the same problem. In a declining world market, everybody will jostle and tussle, almost like pigs in a pen, for what is left in the market. I am not surprised that the Danish and Dutch producers are seeking to enter our markets, just as we would seek to enter theirs.

At present, our people are disadvantaged because of the strength of the pound. I appreciate that there is no easy answer to that. In all my reading of the proceedings in this Chamber going back over many decades, I have not yet found any Government saying that it is their policy to weaken the currency. That is not the answer. We have to accept that there is a problem because our competitors' products are cheaper than ours and because they have not advanced as far as we have in welfare considerations. Many of our producers have implemented those welfare considerations voluntarily.

[Mr. Hurst]

We need to be a little careful about horror stories about the wickedness of our competitors. We were warned about that during the beef crisis, when German producers sought to do that about our beef. In fact, they frightened their own consumers so much that they ate less beef of any kind, from whatever country.

It is right to aim some criticism at the supermarket monopolies. They have enormous power in the agricultural community. It is right that my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food have entered into discussions with the supermarket chains, or the organisation that represents them, to secure certain assurances for pigmeat producers in particular and for the producers of more general meat products.

The assurance which already exists is that the product will be labelled according to the country of rearing and birth rather than the country of packaging. It has always seemed absurd to state where something is packaged. There is no earthly point in my being told that Somerset cider is bottled in London. I want to know that it comes from Somerset. The same would apply to any other regional product. I want to know that I am buying British bacon if that is what I choose. I believe that my right hon. and hon. Friends have made considerable advances, bearing in mind the power of the supermarket chains in retail sales.

I believe that things have gone further. As was announced earlier this week by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, supermarket chains are saying that, from 1 January, they will offer for sale only pork or bacon products which are produced to the same level of welfare standards as ours. I have a degree of faith in British consumers and I believe that, once that proposition becomes more widely known, they will seek to purchase our products rather than those which are deemed to have been produced in a less humane manner.

I accept the point made by the hon. Member for Ribble Valley—that, while the supermarket chains are in their benevolent phase, one may be able to make a judgment about what type of bacon or pork to buy, but it is different when one dines in a restaurant. I suppose one could ask whether the bacon on the plate is British. I am sure that the waiter would say, "Certainly sir, of course it is British. We serve nothing else." Of course the restaurant is unlikely to expect anyone to be particularly seeking Dutch or some other sort of bacon. There is a problem, and there is no instant solution.

I am encouraged by the representations that my right hon. and hon. Friends have made to Government Departments to encourage them to consider the purchase of British meat products. Opposition Members sometimes seem to slide back in time and act like socialists of the old school when they ask why it is not possible to demand that the armed forces serve only British bacon. They seem to have forgotten that we now operate in a world of competitive tendering and best value, and that people have no choice but to go for the cheapest as long as it is of equal standard.

We would say that that can be overcome by the proposition that our meat products are of a superior standard and that, even if they are fractionally more expensive, one can still make a choice according to best value. It is not a question of ministerial edict. We cannot say, "You must buy British products." We would have the whole system of European law come down upon us if we sought to restrict our Government Departments to using only our products.

I am encouraged by the steps that the Government have taken so far in the areas where they have the power so to do. I hope that they will consider providing, perhaps at some public expense, the ability to store pigmeat products so as to take them out of the market. I hope that they will also consider some assistance with veterinary charges.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): I speak as a Member of Parliament in the county of Suffolk. That county relies to some extent on the pig industry for agricultural production.

The crisis in the livestock industry is manifest. The depression facing my county is the worst it has seen since the 1930s. There has been a great deal of constructive dialogue with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and I pay particular tribute to those bodies that have advised me and other local Members of Parliament—the National Farmers Union branches in Bury St. Edmunds, Stowmarket, Eye and Stanton, and the British pig industry support group, eastern region, which has been trying to find a way to influence the Government and to brief hon. Members in an effective way.

The small amount of progress that has been made on behalf of the pig industry has, to a large extent, been the result of initiatives taken by bodies outside Government. Although the Ministry has been making warm noises and saying that it wants to listen and consult, in reality the little progress that has been achieved has been the result of direct action by Members of Parliament who have been lobbying the supermarket chains on behalf of the National Farmers Union and other industry groups to try to get some practical measures under way.

One example of those practical measures is the "buy British" campaign. Many hon. Members, including myself, have written to all the supermarkets in their constituencies. I have written to the chairmen and chief executives of all the supermarket chains in my constituency asking them to go out of their way to publicise the benefits of British pigmeat and to organise the labelling on their own-brand products to identify pigmeat as being British reared and produced, not just British packaged.

In a debate in the House in July, initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), there was a suggestion that Ministers should do what they could to ensure that, as far as possible, the source of pigmeat used by local authorities for school meals and by the armed forces should be the United Kingdom. I take the point made by the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) that we cannot have a socialist-style diktat to ensure that local authorities and the armed forces' procurers demand British pigmeat. That cannot be achieved overnight.

Nevertheless, under the terms of best value, Ministers should be able, on welfare grounds alone, to flag up the fact that we produce the highest standard of pigmeat. On quality, we are better than foreign pigmeat producers, and price does not come into it. I hope that the Minister will be able to give a detailed explanation of how local education authorities and the armed forces are trying to use British-produced pigmeat.

The aid package announced by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food did not do anything for the pig industry, and my local NFU representatives will be intrigued to hear claims that there has been no demand for state help or some public spending assistance for the pig industry. However, I wish to discuss not what the Government have not done, but what they can do in the future and I have two specific issues to raise.

My first concern is the level at which supermarkets set retail prices for pigmeat. My hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) produced figures that I believe understate the fall in United Kingdom producer prices in the pig industry. He mentioned 55 per cent., and that figure was true in August this year. The Library advises me that 55 per cent. may be the fall in producer prices, but the average fall in retail prices over the same time is 13 per cent. That differential is troubling to pig producers in my county. It is bad enough that producer prices have fallen through the floor, but it is even more galling to discover that the supermarkets' policy is not encouraging British consumers to buy British-produced pigmeat.

What can the Government do about that problem? They may say, "We do not live in a socialist dictatorship: it is a matter for the private sector to determine retail price levels." That is largely true, but Ministers could hold serious discussions with the Office of Fair Trading to investigate the policy under which the price of pigmeat seems to be stuck at a high level when producer prices are so much lower. The British consumer is suffering and so is the British pig producer. My constituents and those who write to me regularly on the subject want to know what Ministers have said to the OFT, and what steps they are taking within the regulatory regime to ensure that falls in producer prices are sensibly passed on to the British consumer.

My second question needs a direct response from the Minister. Our regime for pig welfare is, without doubt, the best in Europe, and probably the best in the world. It was initiated by the previous Government and has been—in my view, sensibly—continued by the Ministry. However, producers in the pig industry are disturbed when they face a regime that prosecutes them for using meat and bonemeal in their pig units or for using sow stalls and tethering, but supermarkets can import pigmeat reared and produced using those production techniques.

If it is illegal for British meat produced in such a manner to be placed on supermarket counters, how can it be legal, just, right and fair for those same supermarkets to sell imported meat produced by the very techniques that are banned in this country? What legal advice has the Ministry received on that point? British pig producers do not have a level playing field, but worse still, potentially dangerous meat products are allowed on our shelves. If meat and bonemeal cause problems when fed to pigs in this country, they must also cause problems in imports from Holland and elsewhere on the continent. I hope that the Minister will answer that question in legal terms, and tell us what advice he has received.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley raised a question about the official veterinary inspection service. The number of hours that are imposed on small producers and the cost per hour are increasing. I am indebted to a long briefing by Mr. Arthur Diaper, who is a poultry producer in Horley in my constituency. He gives a toe-curling analysis of the additional costs that he, as a small family business man, faces from the increased inspection charges. He makes a point about inspection levels on the continent, to which I would like a response from the Minister.

The Minister of State wrote to me and said that, if the rules were not observed in, for example, Greece, the Commission could take infraction proceedings. That is the legal position, but, to give confidence to poultry producers such as Mr. Diaper, will the Minister confirm that he will ask the Commission to give examples of infraction proceedings that it has brought against producers outside the United Kingdom, but within the European Union, for breaches of inspection rules and regulations relating to the official veterinary service?

We are told that the issue is a matter for the Commission, but the Minister needs to give confidence to producers in this country that they operate under the same rules and regulations as other parts of the European Union. Nothing less than an assurance that the Minister will talk to the Commission will do for producers in my constituency.

The Minister does his best to be an amiable and genial defender of Government policy, and he and his colleagues do their best to listen. They are good at warm words and the soft, fluffy-edged skills that are so characteristic of the new Labour party. There is nothing intrinsically wrong with that. It makes for good soundbites, and it looks good.

The Minister has been good enough to notify me that he will address a meeting in Bury St. Edmunds next week. That will be the first sighting in my constituency of any shadow Minister or Minister of any description from the Labour party during the three years in which I have been there. It is such a first that we all wonder why he is turning up. If he wants to listen to us, that is fine, but the people who attend the meeting will not want to hear just warm words. They want to know what practical and effective steps the Government will take to help farming in general and livestock in particular.

I should like specific answers to the three specific points that I have raised today, and my constituents would like those answers, too. If the Minister does not reply today, he will certainly be asked for answers when he visits my constituency.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I welcome the opportunity to discuss farming, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) on gaining a debate on both the pig industry and the wider livestock situation. We went along the same path some weeks ago when the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) raised a related issue.

I want to respond to several of the points made by the hon. Member for Ribble Valley, and to make some general points of my own. While he and I can agree that there is a crisis, the House has heard some rewriting of the history of how we got into it, and of how the Government are trying to deal with it. I did not hear the letters BSE emanate from the hon. Gentleman's mouth, but we cannot forget that many of the problems facing British agriculture stem from that crisis. I was intrigued to hear the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) say how unfair was the ban on feeding meat and bonemeal to pigs. I challenge them to say whether they suggest that we should end that ban.

Mr. Ruffley: Our speeches made it clear that we welcomed the ban because it contributes to our high welfare standards. The question is whether the same high standards are being observed on the continent, and the answer is that they are not.

Mr. Drew: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that. I share his wish that the same standards should apply. There is clearly a need to pressure retailers, caterers and meat processors, who have not been mentioned so far, into adhering to the same standards.

We have heard a lot about welfare standards. Like other hon. Members, I have spoken to the Meat and Livestock Commission and it would seem, from the commission's consumer profiling, that welfare standards are not foremost in consumption decisions made by individual customers. Interestingly, however, when irradiated food was offered to customers, almost all of them chose not to buy it, despite the inducement of lower prices. There is a job to be done in ensuring that consumers understand the need for higher welfare standards, as well as higher quality and environmental standards. The House, and the trade itself, must ensure that we get that message across to the consumer.

My main point is that we must understand that the pig industry operates in a dysfunctional market. When it comes to the over-supply of pigmeat, one problem not raised so far is that the market is not only open—that has been said—but cyclical, a fact that raises its own difficulties. Many farmers chose to begin production of pigmeat at the very time when excess supply problems were likely, and that has made those problems worse. As my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) has made clear, the loss of markets because of both declining demand and excess supply, particularly in Russia and south-east Asia, makes it little wonder that we have reached the nadir—at least, I hope we have—of prices and over-supply.

A more difficult tie-in is the fact that some market segments within agriculture are controlled, and others are not. People can see that their livelihoods may be affected by those controls, and that is particularly so for the beef and lamb sectors. There is a temptation to move to the freer market areas, and that has happened to a limited extent in my constituency. My farmers are principally dairy farmers, but there is some beef and sheep production. Some farmers decided 18 months or so ago to move into pigmeat production, and they have caught a cold. They have suffered a difficult decline because agriculture is not—to use a favourite phrase—a level playing field. The field is not even level within agriculture itself, and we cannot underestimate the damage that results from that.

No one doubts that we are discussing changes to our whole production process. Even the laggards in the rest of the European Union, let alone those in the rest of the world, understand that we are moving away from supply constraints towards lower prices with direct support. That support may come through mechanisms for environmental support, or it may be direct economic support. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced a package of support earlier this week, and some of us welcomed it greatly. We shall soon see its overall impact on agriculture.

In the meantime, however, we must manage the crisis that none of us would deny. We must realise that difficult decisions are needed if we are to move to freer markets in the medium term, and if we are to recognise more global markets in the long term. As I learn more about farming, I am interested to find that some pig producers in the south-west are already global operators. I have met people who are already farming in Brazil and in eastern Europe. That is not uncommon. To suggest that the problems are purely domestic is to underestimate greatly the significant changes that have happened. That does not detract from the fact that there is an excess of supply, and that that is driving down prices.

Ben Gill, president of the National Farmers Union, has produced an interesting document for the European Policy Forum. It includes a graph showing that the retail price index for all items has risen since 1987 from a base of 100 to 160. The RPI for food only has risen from 100 to about 138, but farmgate prices have dropped off dramatically since about 1996. The graph ends with 1997, and I cannot pretend that the situation has not got a lot worse since then. It is clear, however, that farmgate prices, which had previously risen far less steeply than had the comparable sectors, have declined dramatically since early 1996.

There are serious problems, and we must deal with them. I agree with the solutions suggested by the NFU, and by Ben Gill in particular. We must seek value added at the root of the food chain, rather than having supermarkets deciding their margins, then passing them down the food chain as reverse benefits. That simply is not acceptable. At the same time, we need to recognise that farmers can collaborate more, which may allow them at least to hold down the increases in costs, if not to seek a reduction in costs through economies of scale.

I return to the point that we are moving towards more globally driven markets in all agricultural products, but we must provide opportunities for people to produce on a localised level and seek niche markets.

The pig and livestock sector will recover. It must proceed along a rocky path at the moment, but I have every faith that farmers will find a way to rebuild the sector and ensure a much healthier future.

12 noon

Mr. Martin Bell (Tatton): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) for initiating this important debate. We shall listen to the Minister with great interest.

We are talking not about a complaint, but about a crisis across all agricultural sectors, which is felt nowhere more acutely than in pig farming. Farmers in my constituency are being driven to ruin. I fear that they will be driven to worse than ruin. There was recently a tragic case of a farmer's suicide in the neighbouring constituency of Macclesfield. We have to turn the situation around.

I shall read briefly from a letter that a pig farmer in my constituency wrote to me. He said:

"There are no words to describe the financial plight of the pig industry at the moment. It really is criminal what the supermarkets are doing and the government are not doing. The supermarkets are claiming all the rewards from the general public through the drastic price increases they add onto the farmers prices. I am at this time getting half my break even price for my pigs, that is about £30.00 a pig loss and I sell 110 pigs a week."

That man has spent £50,000 updating his facilities. He has no way of getting a return on that investment. He is facing ruin, and he sees no future for himself or other pig farmers in the constituency.

I wonder what we can do to help. Of course, we look to the Government for action to alleviate the crisis, but we can use the bully pulpits of our speeches, our meetings with constituents and the little articles that we write in our local weekly papers and urge people to buy British. They are patriotic, and they know that we produce the best.

The same applies to our poultry industry, which in my constituency is suffering greatly and is about to suffer even more acutely from the demand that there be full-time vets on site. Family businesses cannot survive in that way.

My father was a farmer and a country writer of some distinction. He farmed through the recession in the early 1930s. In the second world war, he wrote urging soldiers to go back, when the war was over, to life on the farm and agriculture, because then it offered the prospect of a decent living. Now it does not, and I suspect that, if he were alive today, under no circumstances would he make such a recommendation. There is not a living to be made.

The Government must turn the situation around, and I am sure that we, as Members of Parliament, can help. It is the responsibility of us all to make sure that the pig industry survives and that our farms are not a wasteland.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), who, with typical charm and acumen, obtained this debate and started it so well. It is a great pleasure to speak in a debate to which the hon. Members for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) have contributed. They always make thoughtful speeches in our deliberations on agriculture, as do my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) and the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Bell).

I want to make several points and a plea. First, the greater specialisation that is the consequence of an appropriate drive for quality and the greater focus and expertise that will be produced will make the livestock industry more vulnerable. The hon. Member for Braintree said that, in days of old, people would go into and out of sectors: for example, they would go into pigs or out of poultry. That was also the case in the arable sector. It is becoming less and less true. That specialisation will create an inevitable inflexibility when a particular sector is hard hit, and it must be taken into account in any future regime that we establish.

Secondly, there is an interdependence born of fellowship in agriculture, but there is also a more commercial interdependence. The price of and demand for grain is critical to the livestock producer and the effect on morale of a blow to one part of the industry is felt widely. There is far greater interdependence than is recognised and acknowledged.

Thirdly, demands for quality will also result in a need for greater capital investment. That was mentioned earlier in relation to pigs, but, not wishing to tether us to pigs, I am trying to speak a little more widely. That capital investment will mean that farmers find that they cannot move in and out of products and will exacerbate the trend that I mentioned in my first point. Farmers will also have to borrow more to invest. It is often said that farmers have had good times and now they have bad times, and that they should have spread their money across the years. We all know that life does not work like that, but the claim is particularly untrue in farming, where good years tend to produce the greatest capital investment and lean years mean that farmers depend on that investment to get them through. Greater capital investment is now necessary, and will certainly be significant in the future.

My fourth point is about the extension of Community regulations on co-operatives. We need more co-operation in the industry, particularly on sharing best practice and on more appropriate and more skilled joint marketing. I wonder if it would be possible to extend the Community regulations and directives on co-operatives to private amalgamations and collaborative organisations. A number of those already exist in the arable sector, as the Minister will know, and in the livestock sector. That is a growing trend.

Mr. Drew indicated assent.

Mr. Hayes: I see the hon. Gentleman nodding. He also mentioned that point. We need to consider how we can most effectively support that trend.

My fifth point is to nail the point about the market. I am a business man and I made my money in business, but we must recognise, as The Times said earlier this week:

> "Market collapse, followed by an exodus of farmers, could threaten the land's husbandry. The Government and public must acknowledge that preventing this costs money."

The plant of a farmer—the buildings and the land—is our vista, our horizon and our rural idyll. I know that critics will say that that is a suburban misinterpretation of the rural world, but there is little apart from farming that one can do with land. It is not flexible like commercial property, such as offices and factories. Reskilling and the re-use of plant and investment is much harder in agriculture, and we must acknowledge that the Government will always have to intervene to pay, incentivise and reward farmers for that role in land husbandry. Their countryside is our countryside, and we should not be ashamed to say so.

My plea is for the Government to take a strategic view, and to develop a vision for agriculture. What we had earlier this week—it was presented as nothing else—was an emergency aid package. It was accident and emergency treatment, not preventive medicine. It did not reflect a bigger picture or a long-term goal or vision. If we are to talk about restructuring the industry, we must know into what we are restructuring it.

When the Select Committee on Agriculture considered the beef industry, one of our greatest complaints was that there seemed to be an absence of long-term vision. How big will the industry be? How many producers will there be? What will the level of production be? We need to make those judgments now if we are to work to a meaningful and realistic agenda and give farmers the faith that we have a clear sense of direction that can be coherently and consistently communicated to them. At the moment, everything appears to be reactive. I do not say that particularly of this Government—it is not a party political criticism.

We have tended to react, rather than to plan strategically. That is my plea: let us have a strategic division. Let us not be buoyed by events. Let not Europe dictate the terms. This is a matter of national interest. I shall not repeat all the valid points that have been made about supermarkets, although I could wax lyrical on that topic all day—not that you would let me, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

There is a need for a clearly defined, long-term plan that will be supported by all parties and the industry, and which will revitalise agriculture and give it a place in the next millennium.

12.9 pm

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Because of the short time available to me, I cannot deal in detail with the contributions that we heard from my hon. Friends the Members for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans)—who introduced the debate and spoke with great passion and concern as he outlined the problems—for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) and for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes). We also heard contributions that we on these Benches have learnt to enjoy from the hon. Members for Braintree (Mr. Hurst), for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and for Tatton (Mr. Bell). It is notable that the only contribution from the Liberals is the fact that one of their spokesmen has just walked into the Chamber.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) rose—

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to walk into the Chamber at the last moment and take up the time of those who have been present throughout the debate. [Interruption.] I shall not give way. The hon. Gentleman should sit down and listen.

The debate takes place against the background of steps that the Government have taken, which I value. In large measure—I do not say this in a partisan sense—those are points that we put to the Government, as did farmers. I welcome the action that has been taken in respect of agrimonetary compensation, HLCA payments and the calf processing scheme. All that is right and proper, and I commend the Government for it.

There has been comment this morning about the amount of money in the Government's package. I do not dismiss £120 million as a derisory sum; it is not. However, the crisis involves far more than money. That contribution represents less than 5 per cent. of the decline in farm incomes over the past three years. If it were simply a matter of money, the position would be entirely different. As we have said repeatedly, what we need from the Government is not so much an effort of money as an effort of will. They must recognise that there is a problem of unprecedented proportions, and be prepared not only to take fiscal measures, but to listen to what people want and to act on it.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food made much play in his recent statement about the arrangement that he had reached with the British Retail Consortium. That has been mentioned in the debate by other hon. Members, and I make no apology for returning to it. Although I particularly enjoy the contributions of the hon. Member for Braintree, he is simply wrong when he sums up the deal—if it amounts to that—that has been reached as ensuring that supermarkets will not sell products that have not been produced to the same standards as ours.

It is instructive to study the short and unhappy genealogy of the deal. In the House on 4 November, the Minister pulled a rabbit out of a hat, if I may mix metaphors. Referring to the British Retail Consortium and major retailers, he said:

"They have assured me also that, from 1 January 1999, all pigmeat sold in their outlets will be from animals raised to high welfare standards, with no stalls and tethers and no meat and bonemeal feedstuffs."—[Official Report, 4 November 1998; Vol. 318, c. 952.]

The British Retail Consortium promptly decided to reinterpret what it had agreed with the right hon. Gentleman. On 12 November he was forced to say:

"The British Retail Consortium assures me that its agreement regarding pigmeat sold in its outlets—being stall and tether-free and meat and bonemeal-free—applies to not only fresh pork but processed products, such as bacon, and is being extended to cover ham, sausages and even pork pies."—[Official Report, 12 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 466.]

Great joy and felicitation and the issuing of much bunting, perhaps, but still the British Retail Consortium was concerned about that gloss being put on its deliberations.

On 16 November, the Minister stated:

"The industry's intention was that that covers not only fresh meats but processed meats, including bacon and products such as pork pies. Supermarkets were willing to take responsibility only for those processed products over which they had direct control—in other words, their own brands.—[Official Report, 16 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 632.]

In that form, the assurance is not worth the paper that it is written on. With their buying power, supermarkets can decide what they will and will not put on their shelves. They have the combined might to tell suppliers that they do not want products that do not meet the standards that apply in this country. The existing assurance is worse than meaningless, although I accept that at the time the right hon. Gentleman must have thought it was an assurance worth having. I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary will tell us what steps the Government intend to take to make sure that it amounts to something.

Steps can be taken now. They require an effort of will from the Minister and his colleagues to stand up for this country's interests in Europe. It has been suggested to me by the National Farmers Union, to which I am grateful for these points, that various steps could be taken with regard to the pig industry. The NFU tells me that it has given the Government evidence that state aid is being given by other countries in the EU, specifically France, to help their domestic pig industry.

We know what will happen. The matter will be investigated, and, in due course, the farmers will be told to give the money back. That is how it is done over there, but it is not sufficient. Farmers are entitled to ask the Government to find out what is going on in the EU and to put their foot down. That requires an effort of will.

Fiscal measures could be taken in the Budget, but I do not have time to go into detail. In Europe, the Government should fight to ensure that export credit guarantees are given so that we can compete on equal terms with the United States. We need an early food package for Russia, coupled with a higher rate of EU export refunds for such commercial transactions as can take place.

It is clear that, at present, there is a surplus in Europe. The Government should vigorously initiate discussions with our EU partners about the steps that will be taken to remove the surplus.

With reference to livestock, we have heard what could be done through meat inspection charges in the industry. Time does not permit me to elaborate. We know what could be done to meet the cost of enforcing specified risk material. We know what could be done in terms of the date-based export scheme. Other measures are needed to promote flexibility and an early retirement scheme for farmers.

It is not good enough to claim that nothing more can be done. I have great regard for the Parliamentary Secretary, but it is not good enough for him to bleat, as he did in an intervention, "There is not much that we can do—it is all down to Europe." It is not.

Mr. Morley: I did not say that.

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Gentleman will want to check Hansard. I made a careful note of what he said. This is not the first time that we have heard the Government say, "We would like to help, but we cannot help because of Europe." We want a commitment from our Government to stand up and fight for this country's interests in Europe. It is no good the Government saying that they represent a bridge into Europe, if their idea of a bridge is simply to lie down so that other people can walk over them.

I want a commitment from the Government to get the right deal for British farmers in Europe, in the same way as the Spaniards seek the best deal in the interests of their fishermen.

I recognise that the Government are taking measures, and that part of the problem is the cyclical nature of the farming industry—there are good years and bad years. However, one overriding issue distinguishes this crisis in agriculture from any other: the Government's mismanagement of the economy. The pig, livestock and poultry sectors are all feeling the effects of a pound that is so strong not as a result of deliberate Government action, but as a result of deliberate Government mismanagement of the economy.

That is why the Government are ultimately responsible for the depth of the crisis. That is why it is fair for the farming industry and Conservative Members to point out that the unique strength of this crisis is the fault of those who inhabit Downing street. I would like to think that, as a result of this debate, the Minister might comprehend the scale of the problem and what Government economic mismanagement is doing to our agriculture. However, I suspect that, instead of comprehension and empathy, there will be a yawning void.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Elliot Morley): I regret that the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) has tried to make a partisan point in what has been a good debate about the real crisis facing agriculture. He suggested that that crisis is a result of the Government's economic mismanagement, when we know very well that much of the pressure on agriculture is due to the collapse of traditional markets, the strength of our currency—although that has devalued by 10 per cent. in recent months—and to a significant increase in production in certain agricultural sectors. There has been a 16 per cent. increase in pig sector production over the past two years. Those factors, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out correctly and fairly in his opening remarks, have contributed to the current problems.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) on a very good and knowledgeable speech, which outlined the pressures that his farming constituents—particularly those in the pig industry—face. I shall try to answer the various points raised in the debate in the limited time available.

Several hon. Members mentioned the supermarkets. They will know that the Office of Fair Trading is investigating the supermarkets and examining such things as the disparity between the prices of goods on the shelves and the prices paid to producers. That report will be published next year.

The Minister and I have met the banks—I understand that there will be further meetings—to discuss the current farming situation and emphasise the need for support. In my discussions—I did not meet all the banks, but certainly some of the major agricultural lending institutions—it was made clear that the banking sector has confidence in agriculture and will support farmers, their customers, during this difficult time.

The banks also made several predictions that have so far proved to be quite accurate. At a meeting earlier this year, the banks predicted that the pound would fall in the fourth quarter of this year and that interest rates would peak and decline, and that has occurred. The hon. Member for Teignbridge claimed that interest rates had risen, but they have fallen recently, and the long-term borrowing rate is currently at a 30-year low. The banks also predicted that farm incomes would fall last year and this year, but they are predicting an upturn in 1999. Several factors bear out that prediction.

Mr. Evans: The long-term borrowing rate is mentioned time and time again. Will the Minister concede that farmers borrow not on the long-term rates but on the commercial rates that are available today and those that have been available for the past two years? That is the problem.

Mr. Morley: I think that some farmers do borrow on long-term rates: it depends on their commercial judgment and the size and nature of their operations. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman can rule that out.

Several hon. Members mentioned European Union directives. I emphasise that we comply with those directives in this country, and it is not fair to say that other countries do not do likewise. We have repeatedly told several industry sectors that, if they are aware of disparities within the EU, we will not hesitate to investigate them, raise them with the Commission—the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) made that point—and press for immediate action in cases where other member states are not implementing regulations in the same way as we are. I give the House that absolute guarantee.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): Some pig producers have claimed that France, in particular, is subsidising its domestic industry. Will the Minister challenge that practice in the Council of Ministers?

Mr. Morley: I was about to come to that. We have already challenged it, together with other member states, and France is not paying anything towards its pig industry at present as a consequence. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we will remain vigilant on that point.

I touched upon the issue of competitive advantage earlier by way of intervention. The House may not be aware that United Kingdom exports of pigmeat to Europe this year increased by 17 per cent. on last year, which was a record year. Some 236,000 tonnes of pigmeat was exported from the United Kingdom to the EU. We have some marketing advantages that we can exploit—indeed, we exported pigmeat to Denmark, which is quite an achievement.

Offal control imposes extra costs, and I would not want to pretend otherwise. However, we all know that that is a result of bovine spongiform encephalopathy—the worst crisis to hit agriculture in the history of this country. We are determined to eradicate BSE from the United Kingdom and deal with those problems. Unfortunately, that means that we must have offal control.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) rose—

Mr. Morley: I hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman will forgive me, but I want to try to answer the points that have been raised in the five minutes remaining.

The review of antibiotics is an EU issue, and it is being approached in that context. Any change in antibiotics will take the form of an EU, and not a unilateral, measure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) adopted a very reasonable approach based on significant knowledge of the industry. I welcome his support, and I shall reassure him about storage aids in a moment. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds referred to labelling, supply and flagging up standards in the industry. We certainly intend to address those issues.

Any imports into this country must comply with the law, but we can set higher standards if we choose to do so. We have done that in relation to welfare standards in the pig industry, and I emphasise that that has marketing advantages in terms of meat and bonemeal.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) emphasised the importance of consumer choice and marketing. I agree with him absolutely. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Bell) made a powerful case on behalf of his constituents. I assure him that the Government fully recognise the impact of the present difficulties on the agriculture industry. That is why we introduced the recent package, which is in addition to the package introduced last year and the regular subsidies that I will mention in a moment. The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) made several sensible points, particularly regarding marketing and co-operation. The Government will consider how to take those matters forward in the near future.

We have announced a package of £120 million for the livestock industry. The sum is additional to the overall subsidy for the agricultural sector, which is the equivalent of £50 for every man, woman and child in this country. That is a significant amount. I emphasise that the pig industry—on which this debate has focused—is unsubsidised and is a very light EU regime. We have held talks with the United Kingdom pig industry and, although it has certainly requested a package of support measures and equal treatment and raised several points that were mentioned in the debate, it has not asked for any subsidy. The industry asked the Government to take action against French and German state aid to their domestic industries. We have acted on both counts, and neither Germany nor France is supplying state aid to its pig industry. We are trying to ensure that all member states abide by the rules.

Time is limited in terms of compiling a package of measures for the pig industry, but a further increase of 30 per cent. in the rate of export refunds on fresh and frozen carcase meat was agreed on 15 October. At yesterday's meeting of the pig management committee in Brussels, the decision was taken to increase the level of export refunds from 40 to 70 ecu per 100 kg for fresh and frozen cuts and carcases that are exported to Russia. That is a generous increase that reflects both the economic problems in Russia and the position of the EU pig market. In respect of the EU pig industry, the total package of storage aids, which apply in our country, is the equivalent of more than £100 million. That is going towards helping the pig industry now.

I make it clear that considerable financial support is being given to the pig industry, and in practical terms we have raised continuously that industry's high standards. The British Retail Consortium statement was welcome; the major supermarkets have made it clear that they will be sourcing only fresh pigmeat and bacon, and sourcing their own-process brands—including sausages, pies and so on—from systems that produce stall-free, meat and bonemeal-free pigmeat; and we will be meeting the branded manufacturers to find out whether we can extend that to a wider range of products to assist the pig industry.

The Government will not hesitate to give the pig industry, the livestock industry and agriculture in general what support they can. We have shown that, both financially and through our commitment to give those industries the backing that they deserve.

Floods (South Wales)

12.30 pm

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth): Wales has a reputation for rain, but the rain that fell between 21 and 23 October and during the following week was exceptional. Compared to the horrific and unimaginable effects of Hurricane Mitch in central America, our experience was relatively mild, but what happened may be related to the increasing incidence of severe weather, which is attributed to the climatic change caused by global warming.

The aim of the debate is to reflect the concerns of people who were directly affected in those floods, to consider the role of the public services, and to call on the Welsh Office to review the readiness and capacity to respond to incidents of serious flooding in the context of global climatic change.

On the morning of 23 October, I saw in my constituency the effects of the worst floods that south Wales has experienced since 1979, when 7,500 properties were affected. Some would say that the floods were the worst since 1945. The Environment Agency interim report on the October floods states that 500 homes in Wales were flooded; rainfall generally exceeded 150 mm, or 6 in; and in certain locations, such as Treherbert in the Rhondda valley, up to 9 in of rainfall was recorded.

The worst-affected areas have been Merthyr Vale and Aberfan, where residents reported a "surge of clean water" from the Afon Taff, which flooded 160 properties in a few minutes; Pontypridd was flooded by the Taff and Rhondda rivers; Porth, New Tredegar and Ystrad Mynach were affected; in Llandovery, the Afon Bran flooded 155 properties; in Pencoed, near Bridgend, 61 properties were affected; in Aberdulais, 17 properties were flooded; and in the Vale of Glamorgan, about 30 properties were flooded as a result of the level of the River Thaw, and there was widespread disruption to traffic.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): The extent of the damage due to flooding in Vale of Glamorgan as portrayed in the Environment Agency's interim report greatly understates the damage that was caused. It is a miracle that no one was killed in my constituency. One old-age pensioner—Mrs. Jennings of Ham Manor Park—waded almost neck deep in flood water, late on the Saturday night. There was total confusion about who my constituents could turn to, and who is responsible in such situations. Should my hon. Friend call for an inquiry, I would support him.

Mr. Edwards: My hon. Friend makes a valid point on behalf of his constituents. What he says adds force to the argument that there should be an independent inquiry into these floods.

I visited homes that were flooded near Abergavenny.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): I would echo the call for an inquiry, because not only south Wales was affected by the floods. Herefordshire and the borders were severely affected; indeed, in Herefordshire, one person died in the flooding. Hon. Members will want to commemorate that, and send their condolences to that farmer's family.

May I ask the hon. Gentleman two questions? He mentioned environmental changes. Two physical changes have been cited—certainly in Herefordshire—in respect of the problems of the recent flooding. One is that Welsh Water allegedly opened the sluice gates from reservoirs to release pressure, which caused a surge. That allegation has been denied by Welsh Water, but it has been constantly repeated, and he will have heard it.

The second change to be cited is that, because of the problems associated with agriculture, there have been changes in farming practice, most notably stopping cattle grazing near river edges, which has led to the planting of potatoes. That has caused an increase in topsoil going into rivers, which is silting them up. Will the hon. Gentleman comment on that?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. I remind all hon. Members that this a brief debate. Time is precious.

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point on behalf of his constituents. The whole House will express its condolences to the family of his constituent who lost his life during the floods. I understand that the issue relating to sluice gates may be mentioned by the Minister in his response.

In respect of the homes that I visited near Abergavenny, there was dispute about whether red warnings were issued in time. I met residents in Usk whose homes had been flooded in Llanbadoc. The homes that I visited had been flooded as a result of the failure of the drainage system to cope with the flooding, not because of the River Usk bursting its banks. Despite warnings that there would be a major incident in Usk, that was prevented as a result of the investment in flood defences introduced since 1979.

At a farm near Glangwryne near my constituency, I saw dozens of sheep that had been drowned. Near Usk, more than 40 cattle were reported to have been swept into a flooded river, but, miraculously, all survived. Farmers have experienced a depressing time in recent years, but these incidents have tested to the limit their commitment to farming. As the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) said, at least one farmer lost his life trying to save livestock.

Following the floods, roads were damaged and rendered impassable; drains were blocked, which caused further flooding; wide areas of farmland and open space were transformed into lakes; on the A4042 at Llanellen, near Abergavenny, the River Usk broke its banks with such rapidity that vehicles were stranded, and some drivers and passengers in lorries and cars were rescued in the dead of night.

I have no doubt that, without the efficient and heroic actions of the police and fire services, there could have been serious tragedies. I pay tribute to the retained fire service crew at Abergavenny fire station, which answered numerous calls for assistance during the night. Many of those retained fire officers would have already done a day's work in their normal place of occupation, and may have had to go to work afterwards as well.

South Wales fire services responded to 320 calls about flooding in Gwent alone, and Gwent police placed considerable resources into a gold command at police headquarters in Cwmbran. I also commend the work of Monmouthshire county council and the Environment Agency in my area, and the many individuals who gave their time to assist their neighbours. In Usk, the town council reported problems in the provision of sandbags, and properties prone to flooding were not protected. Concern has also been expressed about the provision of water pumps and dehumidifier equipment, and about whose responsibility it is to provide such equipment.

The following weekend, some properties were flooded in Monmouth town as a result of the dangerous rise in the level of the River Wye, but more widespread flooding was prevented by the flood prevention measures to which I have referred. As the Environment Agency has stated, a key outcome of success is the absence of a flooding incident. Such outcomes are, by definition, unmeasurable.

In recent weeks, we have seen the horrifying effects of the hurricane and the flooding in central America. The apparent worsening of weather conditions has raised many questions about the impact of climate change caused by global warming. The latest findings from the United Kingdom Hadley centre on the changing face of the United Kingdom's weather do not bring good news.

Temperatures are rising. The average global temperature in 1998 is likely to exceed that of 1997, which is the hottest on record. Rainfall will increase during the winter and autumn across the United Kingdom, especially in the north-west and Wales. Consequently, it is predicted that we will experience an increase in climatic extremes such as greater risk of flooding. Although the Government are taking a leading role in the world in addressing the threat of climate change, this evidence shows that the events in south Wales are likely to recur.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I am not certain whether the Territorial Army was involved in dealing with the floods in Monmouth and the rest of south Wales, but would not the hon. Gentleman concede that, in general, the armed services, including the TA, become involved when such emergencies happen, and that that is one reason why we should be cautious about reductions in the TA, such as that announced yesterday by the Secretary of State for Defence?

Mr. Edwards: I assure the hon. Gentleman that I will discuss the Army and the TA later in my speech.

Following the Easter floods, which affected mainly Northamptonshire, but also Skenfrith in Monmouthshire, the Government established an independent inquiry. I have written to the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones), to ask for an independent inquiry into the recent floods, and I am disappointed that, in his parliamentary answer, he has rejected my request.

I ask him to reconsider, and to conduct a general review into flooding in Wales. The review could assess the preparation for climatic changes that seem to affect our country and other nations more frequently; whether our public services are equipped and prepared for civil emergencies such as major flooding, as occurred in south Wales recently and in Towyn in north Wales a few years ago; progress in establishing automatic warning systems; whether the powers of local authorities with respect to flooding should be reviewed and whether local authorities are adequately resourced to deal with flood emergencies; and what role the regular Army or Territorial Army can play in civil emergencies such as flooding.

I acknowledge what the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) says, but it is important to remember that the aim of yesterday's announcement on the Territorial Army was to ensure that the TA can be modernised to respond more effectively to emergencies in this country and abroad when necessary. However, there appears to be a grey area as to when and under what circumstances the Army and the TA in my area are brought in to respond to a civil emergency. I am concerned that the TA tells me that, under a provision of the previous Government, local authorities are billed for the response of the TA, which often makes them reluctant to call it out.

There is also a need to review planning guidelines on development on flood plains, following the recommendations of the Bye report into the Easter floods. One of the lessons of the October floods must be that planning guidelines need to be revised and consistent between Government Departments and the Environment Agency.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): On that point, does the hon. Gentleman agree that prevention will be far cheaper than the cost of clear-up afterwards?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. Surely the thrust of this debate is that prevention is better than cure.

The flooding of any person's home must be one of the most traumatic personal experiences. Some people have experienced flooding on more than one occasion. Many people live with the constant threat of flooding. For every one of those 500 or 600 families that were affected in October, it was a tragic event. They will naturally ask questions about the circumstances in which their properties were flooded and about the response of the public services.

The aim of the debate has been to raise the concerns of those who have been affected by the floods, to ask for a review into the response of the public services, and to ask the Government to consider whether we are capable of responding effectively to major incidents such as flooding that is caused by global warming.

At the Buenos Aires conference, the Deputy Prime Minister said:

"The cost of climate change could be dwarfed by the cost of ignoring"

it. That applies in Wales as it does everywhere else.

12.42 pm

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards) for allowing me to participate in the debate. I shall confine my remarks to the local situation. As he pointed out, nearly 200 households in my constituency were seriously affected; they were in Merthyr Vale, Aberfan, Abercanaid, Quaker's Yard, New Tredegar and Tirphil. All suffered the heart-breaking consequences of flooding. I agree with my hon. Friend: there is nothing more heart-breaking than walking into a flooded home. Many people are proud of their homes. To see them covered in sludge and mud is terrible.

The heart-breaking consequences of flooding were brought home to us that weekend—more so in our case, because some of the same streets and communities were hit 20 years ago. Because we had believed that, in many cases, we had put up sufficient defences against a repetition of those heart-breaking events of Boxing night and afterwards 20 years ago, it was all the more heart-breaking to see the same streets and communities affected—not all; some streets were not affected this time, but, in many cases, the same households were hit 20 years ago.

Therefore, rightly and understandably, there is a justifiable demand for answers about why the flooding happened. In the case of my constituency, there are three or four major questions. First, with all the elaborate processes that were supposed to be in place, why was there no flood warning alert until extremely late in the day—impossibly late to take any meaningful action in Merthyr Vale and Aberfan?

Secondly, many residents in my community testified to surges of clean water coming down the valley. The allegation has been made that, somehow, the water was released from reservoirs at the top. I know that it has been denied, but it has not been explained—another reason why we need an inquiry and the sort of assurances that an inquiry would bring.

Thirdly, the culverts just could not take it. We understand that the weather was exceptional, but I have heard residents say that some culverts and drains had not been maintained properly, supervised or regularly checked, despite repeated requests by local people, so there is the whole issue of maintenance of water systems.

Finally, there is river management: maintaining river banks, cleanliness and the safety of river flows. That was a factor in Tirphil and New Tredegar, where concerns had already been expressed to the Environment Agency some time ago.

All that points to a series of unanswered questions by all those in the communities most affected, and demands for action. In that case, I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth is right. Besides the great climatic issues that he has properly raised—he has put flooding into the broader context—there is a need for answers to questions.

The Under-Secretary of State for Wales, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones), has the power to appoint an inspector, so that evidence can be brought openly and fairly by residents and witnesses to the events to an independent inspector. The Environment Agency, Welsh Water and local authorities can then come to that inspector, explain and, I hope, discover openly and publicly the reasons for those events, and the action that can be taken to prevent them from happening again. Therefore, I hope that my hon. Friend does not slam the door on an inquiry, which is necessary to remove the understandable anger and scepticism that exists as a result of communities and households being flooded so tragically for the second time in 20 years.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Jon Owen Jones): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards) on raising this important issue, my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) on supporting him, and the many hon. Friends who are also on the Benches to support my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth and to represent constituents who have suffered grievously in the floods.

Twenty years ago, on 27 December, while in Aberdare, I was one of those unfortunate residents who was flooded in that severe flood. As I lived in a bungalow at the time, it was particularly problematic, so I genuinely recognise the difficulties facing many of the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth.

Unfortunately, floods are a fact of life, and some flooding is inescapable. Nevertheless, although we cannot prevent flooding, we can take action to reduce the risks. When flooding does occur, we must ensure that we do all we can to issue appropriate warnings and to mitigate its effects.

I pay tribute to the strenuous efforts of all those involved in alleviating the effects of the recent flooding in Wales, particularly the staff of the Environment Agency, who worked very long hours to provide round-the-clock forecasting and warning. I was able to see them in action on the Saturday that much of the flooding occurred, and was impressed by the way in which they were handling matters.

The Environment Agency work force, from both Wales and England, who came to provide relief, were extremely busy checking the security of the agency's defences, reinforcing them as necessary, and otherwise assisting whenever they could. Likewise, staff from many local authorities were keeping their defences in order, clearing debris from culverts, and sandbagging, saving many properties from the effects of flooding. Unfortunately, despite their best efforts, some areas were flooded. Our sincere thanks must go yet again to the police, fire service, local authorities and voluntary organisations that were involved in evacuation, providing temporary accommodation and assisting with clean-up operations.

I am sure that the whole House will wish to join me in sending our sympathy to all the people whose homes and businesses were damaged and whose lives were affected by the event, and, in particular, to those who suffered bereavement. I offer my sincere condolences to their families and friends.

I am aware that, for various reasons, some people were not insured. Help may be available to flood victims in receipt of income support or income-based jobseeker's allowance from the social fund by way of community-care grants or interest-free budgeting loans. People who are not receiving income support may be eligible for a crisis loan. Guidance has recently been issued to all social fund staff on the payment of grants to victims of disasters such as fire floods; that does not, of course, change the policy of successive Governments that, in the case of individuals and most organisations, responsibility for their property is a matter for them.

The rainfall that lead to the flooding was severe. Up to 9 in was recorded between 20 and 25 October, when the flooding was worst in the south Wales valleys. There was further heavy rain on 27 and 31 October, which caused flooding in mid-Wales and the Vale of Glamorgan respectively. The ground was already saturated, and the rainfall simply ran off the hillsides towards the rivers, with little being absorbed.

That rainfall led to large increases in the flow of water in many rivers. Reservoirs overflowed—as they are designed to in such events, for safety reasons. Some, including hon. Members today, have asked whether the flows downstream were increased by discretionary releases that exacerbated flooding, but I am assured that they were not. The hydrological data requested by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey) will soon make its way to him.

I have overall responsibility for flood defence in Wales, and administer grant aid for capital schemes, but the planning, design, construction, maintenance and operation of defence measures on main rivers is the responsibility of the Environment Agency. In the case of ordinary watercourses, responsibility rests with local authorities and internal drainage boards. The Environment Agency, however, is also required to exercise general supervision of all matters relating to flood defence, and I have therefore asked the agency for a full report on the floods.

In an interim report to me, the agency has said that the impact on some rivers in south Wales was on a par with that of 1979. On that occasion, flooding of towns and villages was widespread: more than 7,500 properties were flooded, including several hundred in Monmouth. I understand that, on this occasion, only about 700 properties were flooded throughout Wales. That reflects well on investment in flood defences on rivers in south Wales over the past few decades.

Mr. Keetch: I am sorry to press the Minister, but the flooding of the River Wye in Herefordshire, which subsequently affected Monmouth, was considerably worse than the flooding in 1979: indeed, local experts have described it as the worst since 1960. Will the Environment Agency's interim report, and the full report, cover the English borders?

Mr. Jones: My responsibilities cover the borders within Wales. I am not sure of the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question, but I will write to him as soon as I have discovered it.

I must give credit to the work of the regional flood defence committee for Wales, and to the relevant local flood defence committees. With the support of the Environment Agency and its predecessors, they have guided and overseen the investment. Much of the money for the work has been provided by local authorities through levies, and I acknowledge the part that those authorities have played in the improvement of defence to protect their towns and villages. That is, of course, in addition to local authorities' own expenditure on flood alleviation in the smaller watercourses and local drainage.

As a result of that expenditure, no properties were flooded on this occasion in Monmouth, where enhanced protection has been provided. It is simply not physically or economically possible to protect everyone, which is why the Government have given flood warning the highest priority.

Mr. Edwards: My hon. Friend says that there was no flooding in Monmouth. According to the Environment Agency, four properties were flooded, but they were outside the defended area.

Mr. Jones: I apologise. I was not informed that properties in Monmouth were flooded.

Flood warning is one of the functions of the Environment Agency. Just two years ago, it was asked to take over the dissemination of such warnings from the police, and to expand the service over a period of five years. For that purpose, new technology has been introduced in the form of automatic voice messaging, so that anyone whose property is at risk of flooding can be dialled and given warning. More general warnings are given to local authorities, emergency services and other organisations, including the media.

General warnings of serious flooding to properties were given on 19 rivers simultaneously at the height of the event. Although not all whom the agency wishes to be on the system in the long term are connected yet, it used the system to issue 16,500 individual flood warnings between 20 and 25 October.

The areas worst affected by flooding from rivers were Aberfan, Llandovery, Pencoed and Aberdulais. At Pontardawe in the Swansea valley, serious flooding was caused by a breach in the bank of the Swansea canal. There were also instances, too numerous to mention, of flooding from blockage of culverts, and from surface water drains that were unable to cope with the deluge.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): May I briefly make a point that no one has made so far? One of the most alarming and depressing features of flooding, especially in urban areas, is the contamination of flood water by sewage. Will my hon. Friend be touching on that? One of the fears that people experience when they are cleaning up and deciding whether to throw carpets away is that fear of sewage contamination.

Mr. Jones: I know that it is a big problem, but I do not know at this stage whether it can be avoided, either practically or financially.

I look forward to the Environment Agency's more comprehensive report on the flooding. Work is being commissioned separately from independent consultants on the situation at Aberfan, and their findings will be made available. The British Waterways Board has commissioned an independent report on the flooding at Pontardawe. We shall look closely at those reports, for there are always lessons to be learnt. I expect central Government, flood defence committees, the Environment Agency and local authorities to learn from the experience, so that we may do better in the future. We cannot stop rain or flooding, but, when cost-effective action can reduce the risks, we must ensure that it is taken.

I have been asked today for a separate independent inquiry into the flooding. I have considered the matter carefully, but, in the light of the work that is to be undertaken, I do not believe that such an inquiry is needed on this occasion. The Environment Agency commissioned an independent review of the flooding at Easter from Mr. Peter Bye. The need for an independent review arose on that occasion because of a widespread concern about the failure to issue warnings, and other significant operational issues.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food made a statement on the Bye report to the House on 20 October. As he said then, the Government and the Environment Agency take the report very seriously, and are moving swiftly to deal with the vital issues that were identified in it.

Mr. Rowlands: My hon. Friend said that the inquiry was held because of flood warning problems. Flood warning is one of the big issues affecting Aberfan and Merthyr Vale. Does not the fact that warnings were not given there strengthen our case for the appointment of an inspector?

Mr. Jones: At the time of the Easter floods, there was widespread concern about the failure to give warnings, but that was not the case in Wales. The report arising from the English floods, however, has identified numerous issues, and an action plan will be announced before the end of the month. A comprehensive series of measures will be taken, all of which will affect the way in which we deal with floods in Wales in the future. It is not felt at this stage that an additional independent inquiry is necessary in Wales.

Naturally, the conclusions and recommendations of the Bye report will be foremost in minds when considering what lessons might be drawn from the recent flooding. I note that, during the debate on the Bye report, my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth queried whether Welsh Office planning guidelines needed to be revised so that there is a presumption against new housing development on flood plains. Responsibility for preparing development plans and determining planning applications rests with local planning authorities.

Current planning guidance that local planning authorities should take into account in carrying out those duties is stated in the document "Planning Guidance (Wales): Planning Policy". The guidance advises authorities to ensure that development plan policies and planning decisions take account—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must now turn to the next debate.

Lockerbie

1 pm

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): I am very glad to have this opportunity, in a very brief Adjournment debate, to raise the issue of trial at the Hague. I know that my interest in the subject is shared very much by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), who has fought so hard over the years to get the truth told about Lockerbie. I certainly hope that it will be possible for him to speak in the debate.

One point that we have to bear in mind straight away is that, without this half-hour debate, there would be absolutely no opportunity to debate a rather dramatic, significant and expensive initiative by the Government before 21 December 1998, which is the date on which the United States has been quoted publicly, perhaps incorrectly, as saying that the plug will be pulled on the proposals and that an endeavour will be made to impose more comprehensive sanctions. The House is therefore entitled to ask a few questions about the proposals.

The first and most obvious question is whether there is any time limit on the proposed agreement. The resolution was proposed in the United Nations and the agreement on the trial made between the United Kingdom and the Netherlands. However, as the United States seems to have taken on the role of emperor of the world, in a position superior to that of such rather pedestrian institutions as the United Nations, it would be helpful if the Government would say whether there is a relevant time limit.

Secondly, is it the case, as reported in the press, that the premises of the proposed Scottish court will be located on a former United States airbase? As is well known, that suggestion has caused great suspicion in Libya. It would be helpful if the Government would say whether a decision has been made on the location and whether there might be some merit in locating the court in an existing building. The third and most obvious question that the House should ask is, what is the estimated cost of the trial and who will pay for it?

I want to make it abundantly clear that I have absolutely no doubts about the integrity of the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd), whose attendance I appreciate. I appreciate also the attendance of the Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution, Scottish Office, who is very busy indeed, but has a great interest in the problem.

It is very important that the Government should be aware of the real suspicions of the Libyans, who, in the normal course of events, have a very good bargain in sending over two of their citizens for trial in exchange for an end to sanctions and all that goes with them. Ministers should be aware that some in Libya have a suspicion that the whole business is a plot by the US, which put the matter before the UN simply because it thought that it would not be able to renew sanctions.

Some specific issues arise from the proposals. The first is the agreement between Britain and the Netherlands. Can that be changed without the agreement of the Libyan authorities? That is a very important point. As the trial procedure appears to have been set out entirely on the basis of an agreement between Britain and the Netherlands, there seems to be absolutely no reason why the two countries cannot propose changes. Is that the case?

[Sir Teddy Taylor]

Secondly, what is the reason for a provision in the agreement for a possible transfer of the trial to Scotland if the two suspects agree to it? It seems difficult to understand why the provision was included, and I should like to know why it was. Thirdly, will sanctions be suspended and not terminated? That matter, too, causes suspicion and is something on which the Minister should comment.

There are wider issues that I hope the Government will consider. First, there has been massive press coverage and television programmes in Libya—I have seen them myself—about the alleged plot to assassinate Colonel Gadaffi, which was revealed by Mr. David Shaylor, a former MI5 official. The Foreign Office has said that the report is without foundation, that it did not approve it, and that the whole thing is a figment of someone's imagination. However, the assassination attempt was real and several people were killed. It is all recorded on film.

Secondly, Mr. Shaylor, who we understand was the head of the Libyan desk in MI5, not only stated that MI6 had initiated the plot, but gave full details about an amount of money, alleged to be £100,000, and to whom it was paid—a Mr. Tonworth, who was an intermediary for a fundamentalist group. Thirdly, it was stated that documents about the assassination attempt were circulating freely within Government offices. Fourthly, it has come to my notice that about a quarter of the material that was to be used in the "Panorama" programme was removed on Government instructions. Substantial and significant injunctions on publication of the details have been imposed on newspapers and television programmes.

As the Minister is well aware, it is alleged that the whole business was thought up not by the current Government, but by the previous Government. However, it would be very helpful in trying to resolve the dispute with Libya if the Government said that there would be a proper inquiry. It would be helpful to know if there was no such sum, if the man who allegedly received the money does not exist, and if the organisation in London which seemed to start the business does not exist. If there were such an assassination attempt, I can think of nothing wrong in telling the truth. I have often taken the view that truth is the secret weapon in politics. Indeed, I think that many of our problems in international relations would be resolved and removed if the truth was told.

I should make it abundantly clear that that particular assassination attempt has been shown widely on television in Libya. There have been full details of all that went before it; details of people allegedly giving information about it; and details of its background. We have not seen many of those details in the United Kingdom, undoubtedly because of the injunction. However, some comment should be made on the matter.

It would be helpful if the Government would state—as I am sure the Minister could for himself—that they had no part in the mass of damaging and wholly untrue stories printed about Libya. I could mention many such stories, but will concentrate specifically on one that was published very recently. The Sunday Telegraph—a respectable newspaper that I always buy and enjoy reading—published one of the many stories circulating. It was headed "New Clue Points to WPC's Killer".

As we well know, there has recently been a great deal of evidence on television programmes and in the press that the killer of WPC Fletcher was not someone from the Libyan embassy, and that the bullet came from another building. I do not know the truth, but the story has stirred up some sentiment on the matter.

The dramatic story in The Sunday Telegraph stated that Scotland Yard had launched a fresh investigation into the murder of WPC Fletcher after receiving new evidence about the identity of her killer. It seems that that new evidence pointed to a Libyan, because the story went on to say that, because of "dramatic new information", there would soon be an attempt to extradite the guilty party from Libya. The newspaper, to strengthen the story, added a long comment from the Home Secretary, who said that there would shortly be a conclusion of the review.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Ever since I visited Assistant Commissioner David Venness in Scotland Yard, I have believed that Scotland Yard is doing its utmost to resolve the problem of what it called "one of its own". It is a matter not only of a television programme but of the evidence, on camera, of George Styles, one of the British Army's senior ballistics officers; of Hugh Thomas, consultant surgeon at the Royal Victoria hospital, Belfast; and of Bernard Knight, the Home Office pathologist—who was considered responsible enough to be put in charge of Cromwell street and much else. It is a formidable case.

Sir Teddy Taylor: As usual, the hon. Gentleman knows all about the situation. A report into the problem has been initiated, and we shall be interested to see it when it eventually emerges. I phoned the assistant commissioner whom the hon. Gentleman named. He kindly put me on to the inspector in charge of the inquiry, who courteously explained that, as I had suspected, the story in The Sunday Telegraph was, in his words, "a load of codswallop". There had been no new evidence. The Metropolitan police had not been consulted about the story. There was no new inquiry. I asked him if I could quote our conversation in this debate, and he gladly agreed.

The inspector further explained that the original inquiry, which had been proceeding for a long time, was nearing completion. However, the damage done by the story is pretty obvious. It is a shame that it appeared in a paper that I have always respected. The quotation in the story from the Home Secretary came from a written answer some time ago in response to a question about the inquiry.

There have been many other such stories. There was one about a secret chemical arms factory in a mountain, which I know contained nothing but a pipe taking water to Tripoli. It was important to Libya. We asked for an independent investigation, and the facts were confirmed. Another rather strange story was published after the terrible recent events in Northern Ireland, suggesting that the new IRA had connections with Libya. Again, every inquiry that I made showed the story to be nonsense. Such stories are printed all the time and cause concern in Libya. I am sure that the Government will confirm that the story that I have referred to is untrue and that there was no question of the Government being involved in circulating such stories.

Are the Government aware of the impact on British trade and industry of the negative opinions resulting from such activities as we have witnessed over the alleged assassination? When I visited Libya for a couple of days recently, I was very worried by a widely circulated document entitled "Embargo on Goods of US and UK Origin". It tells a supplier:

"As for your argument regarding the easy nature of the procedures applied in dealing with UK companies, this is not a sufficient reason for you to disregard the instructions issued in connection with this matter. You are to note that GMRA's approval of some equipment from the UK was an exception intended to assist the company in specific circumstances and should not be used as a rule for what comes later."

That worried me a great deal, because, although I have no interest in firms dealing with Libya, I know that Britain had a good trade relationship with Libya. There is a good sentiment towards the United Kingdom in Libya, particularly because of the events of the second world war. My fear is that, as has happened in other places, Britain is being outsmarted. I am sure that the Minister is well aware that it is difficult to move in Tripoli for Frenchmen these days.

The Minister should be aware that, although the sanctions have been imposed by many countries, the resentment felt in Libya is towards Britain and the United States. My fear is that the Government's well-intended initiative will collapse because they are not prepared to go the extra mile to resolve the situation. The Government have gone to extraordinary lengths to try to bring about a settlement in Northern Ireland, where the problems are frightening. We all hope that they succeed.

The issues that need to resolved could be sorted out in private, meaningful, detailed discussions. Such discussions took place some years ago on Libya's previous links with the IRA. I understand that full information was given on the basis of private discussions in which respect was shown. If the Government initiated such private discussions between officials and the Libyan authorities, nothing would be lost and a great deal could be gained. There would be a better chance of success, an opportunity to remove fears and proof of good will. If things went wrong, at least the Government's case would be strengthened by having gone all the way and tried all they could to resolve the situation.

As the Minister is aware, I received a letter from the Libyan Foreign Minister saying that Libya agreed to the trial if certain assurances were given. The letter ended:

"Libya has emerged from a horrendous endeavour to destroy it with greater strength and unity. We will be glad to co-operate with any honest endeavours to resolve the dispute, but will insist that our nation and people be treated with the dignity and fairness which this victory makes appropriate."

I have no doubt that, on the basis of his previous experience in the House and his work in the Foreign Office, the Minister intends to try to resolve the issue. However, I fear, particularly for the sake of the relatives of those who lost their lives at Lockerbie, that things will go wrong because of a lack of understanding, a lack of commitment and, perhaps, a lack of awareness of what is involved in the various discussions. We have a duty to those who lost their lives to ensure that the truth is told. I welcome what has been proposed, but I hope that the Government realise that to make it happen there could be a case for endeavouring further to resolve the fears and suspicions of Libya. The Government may regard those fears and suspicions as unjustified, but they certainly exist.

I wish the Government every success in what they are doing. They should be driven by the feelings of those who lost relatives in the dreadful bombing at Lockerbie. They want the truth to be told. That can happen only if there is a proper trial. To achieve a trial, the Government must show the necessary good will. I hope that they will, and that progress will be made.

1.15 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I wish that the Crown Office and the Foreign Office would start to talk directly to the Libyans.

1.16 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tony Lloyd): As the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) has said, the Government have already taken part in a dramatic and significant initiative on the issues surrounding Lockerbie. That initiative was driven by the same sentiments that the hon. Gentleman expressed at the end of his speech. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and my noble Friend the Lord Advocate were exercised by the position of the families, as was I. At that time the families had been looking for truth and justice for nearly nine years and had found little of either—only frustration.

When we came to power, we looked to see what we could do to break the impasse. We were also conscious of the words of friends of Britain, such as President Mandela, who asked whether it was possible to begin to look at ways of moving the situation forward. We considered carefully how that could be done, consistent with certain principles, which had to include the need for real justice to be seen to be done, the need to maintain the integrity of the Scottish judicial system and the need to ensure that no one could regard it as a search for a political compromise, because our prime concern was to ensure that what was offered served the interests of the families.

We took that important initiative in good faith in a public domain. We look for that good faith to be returned. Enabling the Scottish justice system to operate effectively in the Netherlands was not an easy undertaking. The legal and administrative issues were many and complex. We are deeply grateful to the Government of the Netherlands for all the work that they have done to make the trial possible. Our painstakingly worked-out proposal of 24 August was unanimously endorsed by the United Nations Security Council in resolution 1192 on 27 August. It is fair, comprehensive and workable.

Our objective is what it has always been: a free and fair trial—nothing more, nothing less. In discussing the elements of the initiative with the Governments of the United States and of the Netherlands, we were acutely aware of the need to ensure that the proposal was fair not only to the prosecution but to the defence. It would not be right, nor would it serve any of our interests, to engage in a flawed process. The demands of justice require a fair trial.

We have made it clear that the terms of the initiative are not negotiable. That is right and proper, and I repeat that it is now supported by the Security Council resolution. However, we have been willing to provide comprehensive clarification where requested by Libya, and it may be helpful if I explain what some of those clarifications have been. It is right that we should be ready to explain why we are satisfied that the proposal provides for a fair trial.

The answers that we have provided show that there is no hidden agenda, that the trial will be of the two accused alone, that any witnesses who may travel from Libya will have safe passage and immunity from arrest for any offence committed before arrival in the Netherlands, and that sanctions will be suspended when the two accused arrive in the Netherlands for trial. We want Libya to understand that we are acting in good faith.

In response to his question, I can tell the hon. Gentleman that we have provided that clarification through the good offices of Kofi Annan as United Nations Secretary-General. That was foreseen in the Security Council resolution. It is important because it provides transparency and an additional assurance to the Libyans that we mean what we say. What we say is there for all to see.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Why are sanctions being suspended rather than terminated?

Mr. Lloyd: If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I will address several of the issues that he has raised, but first I shall run through the main points about the process in which we are engaging.

We want a transparent process. It is helpful if the process is dealt with through the Secretary-General, because that makes it clear that Lockerbie is not simply a bilateral British-Libyan operation, or even an issue between the United States and Libya, but is now of international interest. The will of the international community, unanimously expressed through the Security Council, is that Libya should accept the terms of the Security Council resolutions.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that we should enter into discreet negotiations with Libya. However, the families of those who died on Pan Am flight 103 demand to know the truth. Secret bilateral deals would not help them, and are not necessary. The channel of communication through the Secretary-General has worked well in providing Libya with the information sought, and we have answered fully every question put to us.

The hon. Gentleman asked me several questions, and I shall try to answer them. There is no formal time limit on the process, but he will realise that that does not mean that we can wait around indefinitely for a response. The offer was made in good faith, and good faith on the other side demands some reciprocity, which we have yet to see.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the location of the trial. It is true that the place is a former air base that was used by, among others, the United States. That does not happen now and has not happened for some time. There are no United States troops there now, and the area is sovereign Dutch territory again. Even the Libyans do not now see its former role as a major obstacle.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the costs of the trial. Various estimates can be made, but it is a measure of the spirit in which the Lord Advocate and the Foreign Secretary entered into the process that cost was not an issue. Justice is the issue. Yes, the suggested trial will be significantly more expensive than a trial in Scotland, but because we are determined to seek proper justice, costs are not a determining factor. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will welcome that assurance.

I was also asked whether the agreement with the Dutch could be rewritten or unwritten. That agreement is underwritten by an Order in Council, and as it is of the nature of a treaty, it is not amendable. None the less, it is inconceivable that a process that has been transparent could be altered without the alteration being equally transparent. I hope that, even if the hon. Gentleman is cynical about what the British Government might do, he would accept that the Dutch Government come here with clean and honest hands. There would be no reason why they should want to amend a treaty for nefarious purposes at a later stage.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the suspension of sanctions. The Security Council resolution is specific on that point, and says that, when the two accused are delivered to The Hague for trial, sanctions will be suspended. I assume that the hon. Gentleman fears that sanctions will somehow be reimposed later, but it would be incredible if we tried to get away with that in the court of world opinion.

I can reassure the hon. Gentleman further. Even if that were the hidden agenda of the British Government, once sanctions had been suspended, a decision by the Security Council would be required to alter the sanctions regime from suspension. Neither the British nor the Americans could do that; it would require action by the whole Security Council. That is a protection for the Libyans.

The hon. Gentleman also asked me about the allegations by Mr. Shayler. It is far from unknown for those who seek to make money out of their former careers to go way beyond the bounds of fact and enter a world of romance, and the Foreign Secretary has made it clear that there is no truth in the allegations. I stand by that statement, and I can tell the hon. Gentleman openly that neither under previous Governments nor under the present Government has there been any shred of evidence to support Mr. Shayler's allegations.

I shall almost repeat what my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has already told the House about the case of WPC Fletcher, when I say that it is under active investigation by the Metropolitan police, who will report to the Home Secretary when their findings are complete. There is no connection between the Lockerbie situation, involving the trial and the sanctions, and the case of WPC Fletcher. It is important that the House and the world know that.

We want the WPC Fletcher case to be resolved. We still believe that the action was committed by the Libyan authorities, and it would be helpful if the Libyans conceded that point and accepted liability for compensation. That would be a positive step forward in building good faith.

We have already provided clarification, and I have, I hope, provided some more today. In principle, clarification about the trial process has been provided through the offices of the United Nations Secretary-General. We have not taken those steps lightly, and they are not merely a gesture. We are serious; we want a trial before a Scottish court sitting in the Netherlands, so that this distressing issue can be brought to an end.

We have done, and are still doing, everything possible to ensure that outcome. We introduced the necessary changes to Scots law by Order in Council on 16 September, and the Foreign Secretary has told the House that an agreement between the United Kingdom and the Netherlands was signed on 18 September. We want to make progress, and we are confident that in proposing to agree with the Government of the Netherlands on an early date for the agreement to enter into force, we are acting with the will of the House. Work is under way to prepare the trial site. All we need now is a positive response from the Libyans.

I want to reiterate that sanctions are not designed to punish the Libyan people. It is neither our wish nor our intention to keep Libya under UN sanctions indefinitely for some undefined political purpose. The UN sanctions have a legitimate purpose—they are designed and mandated by the UN Security Council to press Libya to fulfil its obligations under UN resolutions. When Libya conforms to the resolutions, sanctions can be brought to an end.

I hope that the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East takes my words to heart. We will support the suspension of sanctions in accordance with UN Security Council resolution 1192 when the accused arrive in the Netherlands for trial. Given the purpose of sanctions and the way in which we propose to make progress, it would be wrong and illogical—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. It is time for the next debate.

West Hertfordshire Health Authority

1.30 pm

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead): Very often, an Adjournment debate can be a lonely business, with sometimes just oneself and somebody else on the Front Bench. However, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I thank you for allowing me to come here accompanied by a box which contains the signatures of some 35,610 objectors to various plans made by West Hertfordshire health authority. I understand that another 36,000 people from Watford are similarly inclined to object to the use made by the authority of the private finance initiative.

In asking for a debate on this matter, I was not trying to be a fundamentalist about the use of the PFI. In my constituency, I have been desperate to try to get a new initiative for a matter on which the public authorities seem to have become locked into inaction. In particular, I am trying to get a road from St. Albans road in Hemel Hempstead—a dual carriageway—into the wonderful new £5 million accident and emergency unit at Hemel Hempstead hospital. I hope to get that road, and I will be happy to trade with anyone in the private sector who wishes to provide the necessary expertise, energy and financial input.

Sometimes, the PFI might allow one to get something done which previously was not being done. However, looking at the Government's strategy for health, I am forced to suggest to the Minister of State, Department of Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) that perhaps there is a conflict between the untrammelled operation of the PFI and the Government's strategy for improving health care. After all, the Government want to invest in a better NHS. Indeed, they have made £21 billion available for that investment over the next three years.

We all want that investment to be used for the kind of capital investment that would achieve substantial revenue savings. For instance, a hospital that is poorly insulated is often in that condition because of desperate neglect over many years. If the insulation is improved in a poorly insulated hospital with a high energy bill, revenue savings will be made. In the case of the general hospital in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Ms Ward), such neglect has resulted in a backlog of repairs of some £7 million. That ought to be rectified by a Government who are committed to investing in the NHS. If the insulation is improved in a poorly insulated hospital with a high energy bill, revenue savings will be made.

Revenue savings can also be made by appropriate investment in information technology. Revenue savings can be made—this is a case close to my heart—by trying to improve nurses' accommodation, so that they are attracted to living near a town centre hospital, such as Hemel Hempstead or Watford, where medical staff have the amenities of a town centre, and of affordable housing. Where such investment in accommodation has been made, the health trust will not have to pay ludicrous amounts to get or to manage temporary or agency staff.

Revenue savings can lead to real improvements in health, and I commend the Government's strategy for investment. Capital investment initiatives can lead to a virtuous circle, in which hospitals and trusts begin to think of real improvements in the quality of care they give their patients. In Hertfordshire, there is the possibility of a link with the newly emerging health faculty at the university of Hertfordshire, which could lead to the county becoming an attractive place for practitioners and nurses to work. I shall be having lunch with the current vice-chancellor of the university after this debate to discuss that very matter.

I understand the strategy adopted by the Government, but the strategy adopted by West Hertfordshire health authority seems to be about as far removed from the Government's as it is possible to imagine. To start with, the authority wants to attack the five hospitals that are built, operating and functioning. These include hospitals in Hemel Hempstead and Watford—I am sorry that the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) is not here to defend Mount Vernon hospital—which have produced more than 70,000 people who support their retention. The people of west Hertfordshire are worried by the prospect that the wonderful deposit of NHS resources, built up since the start of the NHS in 1948, might be frittered away on the PFI-inspired philosophy of the health authority.

The PFI is inappropriate for our current circumstances. A House of Commons research paper on the matter states that the need for the private finance initiative was initially put in place so that up-front capital funding for new developments was replaced with a long-term revenue commitment by the public sector. It said that no longer would the NHS own an asset—it would lease it. Assets that were publicly held would be lost.

That is not the situation in which we find ourselves. The Government want to make capital investment and to save on revenue—yet the PFI points the other way.

Despite the language of the West Hertfordshire health authority—which talks about a "new super-hospital"—the proposal represents a substantial cut in the facilities available to the people of west Hertfordshire. According to the authority's figures, there will be a cut from 1,170 acute places to between 695 and 730. This cut is portrayed in the authority's documents as if it were somehow a benefit. If that is a benefit, I would rather do without it.

There is also the problem that the process has cost a huge amount of public money in consultation.

Ms Claire Ward (Watford): Is my hon. Friend aware that the health authority has conducted consultation, and that the response that it has received from the public—80,000 signatures collected by a pressure group—local Members of Parliament and the local authorities has shown that there is objection to the proposal and to the favoured option of the building of a new hospital?

Mr. McWalter: That is true, and the public's understanding of such matters often transcends that of hon. Members in this Chamber.

In the consultative process, it is unclear what the terms of reference of any PFI contract are to be. I do not know this to be the case, but what I call a "BOOT" system may be in operation—that is, build, own, operate and transfer. In such a case, at the end of the contract the assets are held by the private consortium. In west Hertfordshire, acute facilities at four hospitals could be downgraded and any number of them could close down, with the remaining community hospital at Harpenden closing as well. In west Hertfordshire, the operators of the NHS system have carte blanche, under their current plans, to do what they like with current assets.

Ms Ward: Does my hon. Friend agree that the objection of local people to the West Hertfordshire health authority is not necessarily an objection in principle to the PFI, but to the proposals that the authority has put forward? It has not made a case for its option, either financially or strategically.

Mr. McWalter: That is a good point, but the trouble with the PFI is that, when the previous Administration introduced it, it was a recipe for inactivity and for saving public money. This Government have made large amounts of money available for investment, and what worries many of us is that that investment could destroy public assets. In west Hertfordshire, we have the example of an asset that is held by the public—five hospitals. In 30 years' time, we could end up publicly not owning one brick or a trowel full of mortar.

Another important aspect is that the revenue projections of the process are extremely unclear. In a representation to the Treasury Select Committee two years ago, Christopher Bland, head of the private finance panel said that when he asked such questions as, "What are the revenue implications of the PFI contracts signed for, say, 2005?" Lo and behold, the answers were not forthcoming. We are in strong danger not only of losing public assets, but of buying an expensive pig in a poke.

Mr. Richard Page (South-West Hertfordshire): I agree that the revenue projections are exceedingly shaky and that they have to be fleshed out in greater detail, but is not the basic reason why the process is taking place—unless the Minister is going to give us some good news at the Dispatch Box right now—that the Government will not give the money to maintain the status quo?

Mr. McWalter: The hon. Gentleman fails to recognise that the status quo is deeply unsatisfactory because the Conservative Government introduced an odious system called capital charges, which required all health operators to study their asset base and to make substantial payments—on average 9 per cent. of their income. West Hertfordshire health authority would not be in deficit if it were not for the capital charges—

Mr. Page: I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the way in which capital charges are operated. If they were removed, we would have no problems in west Hertfordshire and could continue with the status quo.

Mr. McWalter: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's support for what appear to me to be policies designed to ensure that public assets remain in the public sector, rather than the policies of the previous Government, who did their level best to ensure that a haemorrhaging of public assets into the private sector.

Apart from threatening the very fabric of the NHS in west Hertfordshire, the overall impact of the plans, assuming that we do not have the BOOT system and the asset is not transferred but is kept within the public sector through some devious route—possibly a joint venture in which each party gets 50 per cent., for example—would be that the asset base on which the health authority has to pay capital charges would be greater than it is now, according to all the figures that I have seen. Therefore, the authority's deficit would be even larger. Therefore, implicit in its plans must be a substantial reduction in the asset base, which means that an awful lot of hospital closures that have not been accounted for must be in the pipeline.

I suggest to my hon. Friend the Minister that a conflict exists between retaining the PFI as, potentially, a force for squeezing out public sector holdings and assets, and retaining it for its potential to be used in new and improved schemes. It is a major mistake to retain a PFI that is designed to erode, compromise or put into joint venture holdings capital assets that are publicly owned.

Those matters are all relatively new, and many of us have been awaiting the comprehensive spending review to find out precisely what sort of shape we may be able to put the NHS in over the next few years. I have already said that I strongly welcome what the Government are doing in that regard, but there is a head-on conflict between substantial capital investment and continuing to keep the PFI, which could result in the haemorrhaging of the very resources that one wants to put at the disposal of the health service. We want a system of public investment and expenditure that is not designed to erode the very basis of health provision.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): The reservations that my hon. Friend has expressed about private finance developments in Hertfordshire are shared by people in Birmingham, who are worried about private finance initiatives there. Resources are being diverted from care into paying for the raising of capital by private sector companies, which is more expensive than it would be in the public sector.

Mr. McWalter: My hon. Friend has a good point, and I hope that it will be considered. The present 20-year interest rate for public finance is 4.77 per cent., whereas the cheapest possible rate for private finance is more than 6 per cent. We are already faced with a spread or differential that makes it extremely difficult to manage the interest payments that will be required through such initiatives. That in itself represents a haemorrhaging of resources. I look forward to the Minister telling me that PFIs that have the capacity to undermine public assets and provision will not be welcome in his Department.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Alan Milburn): I am happy to have the opportunity to respond to the debate launched by my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) and congratulate him on securing the time for it. The issue is of considerable concern to his constituents and, indeed, to some hon. Friends and other hon. Members in the Chamber.

I can assure my hon. Friend that the Government share his aim to provide a high-quality national health service for the people of this country, wherever they live. The national health service was founded on the principle that the very best health care should be available to everyone—a principle that the previous Government did their best to erode and which this Government are determined to restore.

We are doing that by modernising the national health service, by making its services faster and more convenient for patients, by tackling variations in quality, by improving standards and by developing integrated services around the needs of individual patients and across the traditional care boundaries. Above all, we are doing it by transforming the NHS from a sickness service into a service that works in partnership with others to reduce the appalling health inequalities that are a scar on our nation.

The Government's modernisation programme is extremely ambitious—it will take time and a great deal of money. From next April, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead rightly said, a record £21 billion of extra investments will start to come on line to help to modernise the NHS. All parts of the country will benefit.

The comments of the hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Page) could not have been wider of the mark. The Government have made available extra investment over and above that planned by the Conservative Government. In the past 18 months, we have provided West Hertfordshire health authority with an extra £15.4 million. Moreover, we recently announced next year's allocations, which include a further £19 million for West Hertfordshire—a cash increase of 6.38 per cent., which I hope will be warmly welcomed by hon. Members on both sides of the House. That money is necessary to modernise and sustain services.

The money is also necessary to sort out the mess that the Government inherited. When we came to office, 72 of 100 health authorities, including West Hertfordshire, were in deficit. Across the country, we reduced the total deficits in health authorities from £238 million to less than £20 million at the end of 1997–98. In West Hertfordshire, the deficit has been reduced from £4 million to less than £2 million.

The Government are delivering on their promise not only to save the NHS but to modernise it as well. I remind my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead that we were also elected on a manifesto promise to sort out the problems that have plagued the private finance initiative so that it could work for the benefit of the health service. We have delivered on that promise, too.

We inherited a PFI process under which no new hospitals had been built. A lot of money—£30 million, I think—had been spent on management consultant and legal fees, but no bricks had been laid and no bulldozers had been moved. Today, because of our actions, work has started on the construction of eight hospitals under PFI. Since we came to office, we have been able to announce the biggest new hospital building programme in the history of the NHS—31 new hospitals worth almost £2.4 billion, 25 of which will be built through PFI, with a total value of almost £2.2 billion.

We will give the go-ahead to PFI proposals only after it has been shown that they are affordable and offer taxpayers better value for money than a publicly funded alternative. Unlike the previous Government, we will not allow any clinical services to be included in a PFI deal. We are also making the whole PFI process more open, and we have considered how better to protect the interests of staff who are included in PFI deals.

I know that there are concerns, both in the House and beyond, about PFI in the NHS, but public-private partnerships are here to stay. As my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Ms Ward) said, patients are not worried about whether hospitals are built through cash from the PFI or through cash from the Exchequer; their concern is, rightly, that new hospitals should be built.

The situation in west Hertfordshire is complex. The proposal to build a brand new hospital in the health authority's area has been submitted, with nine others, to the capital prioritisation advisory group. I established CPAG to advise me on which major hospital developments were most needed in the NHS—under our arrangements, NHS needs, not the whims of the private sector, but to decide where new hospitals will be built. I will shortly be considering CPAG's advice on the proposals in west Hertfordshire, but I will not give the go ahead to any new hospital unless it is part and parcel of a proper local plan for delivering and sustaining high-quality local health services.

Ms Ward: Will my hon. Friend assure me that he will not allow the proposals to be acted on until the health authority has answered the genuine points that have been raised by members of the public and the local authority and until it has investigated every other option, which it has so far failed to do?

Mr. Milburn: I shall speak about that in a moment. In the consultation process—in west Hertfordshire or anywhere else—I expect those who play a decision-making role in the NHS to listen seriously to what concerned patients, organisations and communities say. Inevitably, difficult decisions have to be taken, but I expect to see evidence that local concerns have been analysed extremely carefully.

Any proposal for local hospital developments must be part and parcel of a properly worked through local health plan to deliver quality and sustainable services. There have been far too many cases of ad hoc hospital developments, which have proved to be unsustainable precisely because they were not considered as part of the local configuration of services.

There is no final agreed plan for the make-up of local hospital or broader health services in west Hertfordshire. The health authority has consulted widely on its radical proposals for changes to hospital services. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead is aware, the health authority agreed at its public meeting on 30 October to take a staged approach in changing local health services. That was in response to the strength of local feeling and to the need to provide further information on the authority's proposals. Indeed, he and my hon. Friend the Member for Watford have reflected those concerns today.

As I understand the position, the South-West Hertfordshire community health council will formally object to the proposals, so the matter will be referred to Ministers. I am sure that my hon. Friends will understand that my position as a Minister prevents me from commenting on the proposals at the moment. If the local community health council formally objects to the proposals that the health authority adopts after the consultation period, the matter will be referred to me for a decision.

I assure my hon. Friends that the Department of Health is fully committed to the provision of high-quality, up-to-date treatment in a modern and responsive health service. If the matter is referred, Ministers will uphold the health authority's decision only if we are satisfied that adequate alternative services are available. I have heard what my hon. Friends have said and I assure them that their points will be borne fully in mind when we consider the matter. I also give the specific assurance that I will not approve any proposal through the CPAG process for a new hospital until Ministers have considered the make up of health services in the area.

I have listened carefully to what my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead and others have said. I know that their concerns are shared by many people in the community. Difficult decisions have to be taken, not least because of the financial problems that the previous Government left in the health service.

My hon. Friend also knows that the NHS in west Hertfordshire and elsewhere cannot stand still. Progress in medical technology and in doctors' training and the alterations in our population and in public expectations are all driving change. No change is not an option for the NHS. Our job is to ensure that change delivers improvements in the care and treatment of patients. I assure him that any proposals for change in west Hertfordshire that the Government consider will be judged against that criterion.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Sitting suspended, pursuant to Standing Order No. 10 (Wednesday sittings), till half-past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

CABINET OFFICE

The Minister was asked—

Public Services (New Technology)

1. Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South): What plans he has to extend the use of new technologies by public services to improve their performance and allow greater access by the public. [58911]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Mr. Peter Kilfoyle): I am pleased to announce that a contract has been signed with Cable and Wireless for delivering the xGSI, an extension to the Government secure intranet allowing for more highly classified networks to connect to it. The xGSI is a major breakthrough in improving the efficiency and effectiveness of how Departments and agencies can work together. From now on, it will be increasingly possible for the Government to conduct business over the Government secure intranet in more secure and cost-effective ways that will open up the possibility for greater electronic access to Government by both the public and the business community.

Mr. Chapman: I thank my hon. Friend, who is no doubt aware that the use of information technology in the public sector is a vast and still largely untapped means for the ordinary person to communicate with the Government and the public sector in general. Will he assure me that all possible steps will be taken to ensure that the ever-evolving technology is kept pace with and that the private sector—and not only Cable and Wireless—is appropriately engaged?

Mr. Kilfoyle: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. Indeed, I introduced the Computer Industry Consultative Committee at a conference at the Queen Elizabeth II conference centre on 2 November, to maintain the dialogue between the industry and ourselves. Through the central information technology unit and the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency, both of which operate within the Cabinet Office, we are in day-to-day contact with new developments in the industry.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): When this sexy network is completed, will the wires lead into the present office of the Minister for the Cabinet Office, or into a new office of considerable dimensions and cost? Perhaps the Minister could share that information with us.

Mr. Kilfoyle: The right hon. Gentleman is more than a little out of date, as a question was answered on that very subject yesterday—Official Report, column 452. He demeans the serious question of how the Government communicate among themselves and with others. We seriously intend to take all measures necessary to ensure that we can do so effectively. I am sure that he is aware that the proposal to consolidate from seven buildings into one in Admiralty buildings preceded the advent of the Labour Government. The difference between us and the previous Government is that we are actually doing something about it.

Constitutional Reform

2. Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase): If he will make a statement on the responsibilities of the Cabinet Office in respect of the Government's policies for constitutional reform. [58912]

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Dr. Jack Cunningham): The Cabinet Office is responsible for ensuring the effective co-ordination and implementation of the Government's wide-ranging programme of constitutional reform. The Cabinet Office also has policy responsibility for advising Ministers on implementing the Government's proposals for reform of the House of Lords.

Dr. Wright: I am grateful for that answer. The Government are to be congratulated on their bold and ambitious programme of constitutional reform, soon happily to include the House of Lords, but is there not a difficulty, in that we have a big programme—11 Bills this year—but responsibility for it is spread among no fewer than eight Departments? Is it not time to make the Cabinet Office the Department of the constitution, driving the programme forward and making my right hon. Friend even more powerful than he is already?

Dr. Cunningham: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind remarks about the Government's fundamentally important constitutional reform programme, most of which, as he rightly said, has been delivered. The question whether to make the Cabinet Office and my role more powerful is not one on which I wish to comment, except to say that I believe we already have sufficient power and responsibility in the Cabinet Office to co-ordinate a process that, of necessity—given devolution to Scotland and Wales and changes to the European Parliament—involves a significant number of Departments of State.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Can the Minister confirm that the Bill to introduce a fairer system of voting for elections to the European Parliament is an integral and essential part of the Government's constitutional reform programme? Can he comment on the fact that the unelected seem to be prepared, at a late stage and after having taken no interest in the Bill during its Committee stage, to wreck the will of the elected?

Dr. Cunningham: Yes, I can confirm both those points. It is the Government's intention to press ahead with our legislation in this area. As the hon. Gentleman said, it was clear that only a majority of hereditary peers prevented the will of the elected Chamber from prevailing in this matter. If Opposition Members want to assert the authority of the hereditary peerage over elected Members of the House of Commons, that is a battle that the Government are only too willing to fight.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): The remit of the Cabinet Joint Consultative Committee, on which Liberal Democrat Members sit, is to be expanded to encompass welfare reform, Europe, health and education. Liberal Democrat Members are to receive classified documents that are not available to all Government Members. Do Liberal Democrats have to sign the Official Secrets Act? What penalty will apply if any of the Liberal Democrats leak that confidential information?

Dr. Cunningham: Perhaps I can reassure my hon. Friend, in that what he said is not altogether accurate. There are simply to be discussions between the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and myself about the success of the co-operation between the Liberal Democrats and the Government in driving forward the shared constitutional agenda, to reflect on how the Joint Consultative Committee has operated in the past and to see whether it is possible to widen and/or deepen the process. Those decisions have not yet been taken. We have simply started the process, and one meeting has taken place.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): In view of the right hon. Gentleman's overall responsibility for House of Lords reform—he has just told us about that—will he give an assurance to the House that every stage of any Bill on that subject will be taken on the Floor of the House?

Dr. Cunningham: As I have said, the Cabinet Office has policy responsibility for advising Ministers on taking forward the matter. I did not claim to have overall responsibility for the subject. As the hon. Gentleman well knows, the issue raised in his question is not a matter for me.

Ministerial Replies

3. Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire): If he will make a statement on progress in improving the timeliness and quality of ministerial replies from all Government departments to requests from hon. Members. [58913]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Mr. Peter Kilfoyle): The Cabinet Office issued guidance last month to all Departments reminding them of the correct procedures to be followed when handling correspondence from hon. Members. Copies of the guidance have been placed in the Libraries of the House. The guidance emphasises the importance of setting robust and challenging targets for replying to letters from hon. Members and reminds Departments of the need to ensure that all replies are of a consistently high standard.

Mr. Pickthall: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that a great deal still needs to be done? For example, only this Monday, I received a reply to a letter I sent to a Department on 20 March this year. As we inflict league tables on schools, would my hon. Friend consider league tables for Departments? Perhaps there could be performance-related pay, the idea of an advanced skills civil servant and, possibly, "headlamp" training for Ministers.

Mr. Kilfoyle: I agree that the treatment that my hon. Friend received is not up to expectations, but I hope that it was the exception, not the rule. We are mindful of the need to improve target times for the turnround of correspondence. If we were to introduce performance-related pay and league tables for the House and apply them to the performance of the Opposition, they would end up paying money into the Exchequer and would face another relegation.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Does the Minister accept that many of my Buckingham constituents, whose courtesy is unsurpassed anywhere in the United Kingdom, are justifiably irritated when they have regularly to wait a minimum of two months—sometimes much longer—before they receive ministerial replies? Further to the Minister's reply to the hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall), does he agree that a reply, if it has taken at least two months to provide, should always be accompanied by an apology to the constituent from the Minister involved for its tardiness?

Mr. Kilfoyle: The guidance sets out clearly the responsibilities of Departments and Ministers. The guidance for the treatment of correspondence from members of the public is different from that for correspondence from hon. Members. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman understands that correspondence from hon. Members is often more substantive and it takes longer for Departments to reply, but that is no excuse for not making a speedy response.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Let me press the Minister on his point about a speedy response. In response to a request dealing with central standards and decisions in the House, a card was received stating that the matter had been passed to the Northern Ireland Office. Surely such a request should be answered by a Minister in the Department to which it was addressed, not passed all around the world to the Northern Ireland Office and back again.

Mr. Kilfoyle: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it makes sense that correspondents should have one initial point of contact for any request, and an explanation of the reasons behind it. The guidance makes clear the good practice that should be followed, but doing so is the responsibility of the Department concerned.

Drugs Misuse

4. Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): If he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's priorities for reducing drugs misuse in 1998 and 1999. [58914]

6. Mr. Hugh Bayley (City of York): If he will make a statement about the Government's policies to curb the use of illicit drugs. [58918]

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Dr. Jack Cunningham): The Government's anti-drugs strategy, "Tackling Drugs to Build a Better Britain", published in April this year, established a framework for action over the next 10 years. On 1 September, I announced £217 million of additional funding over the next three years for anti-drugs activities, in line with the strategy. Our long-term targets are to reduce drug misuse by young people, to reduce drug-related crime, to increase participation in drug treatment and to reduce the availability of drugs. Specific short and medium-term targets will be in place by March 1999. Locally, drug action teams are now drawing up action plans for 1999–2000.

Mr. Hughes: I welcome those four targets. Will the Minister dwell on the last of them and ensure that his discussions are widened to bring in the Department of Health, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department for Education and Employment so that we have a culture that reduces the use of illegal drugs and the unnecessary use of all drugs, especially tobacco and alcohol?

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's support for what we are trying to achieve in our new strategy, but my responsibilities focus on illegal use of drugs. I would not for one moment deny the importance of the other issues that the hon. Gentleman raised, but they are not principally matters for me or for the Committee of Ministers, which I chair and which is doing just what he suggests in co-ordinating activity and action across Departments.

Mr. Bayley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it should be head teachers who decide whether to exclude a pupil if that pupil is found in possession of drugs? Does he agree that the decision should reflect the individual circumstances of the case?

Dr. Cunningham: Yes, I agree. My hon. Friend simply reflects accurately what was said yesterday by my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): In his role of co-ordinating policy across Government, will the Minister ensure that the clear, unequivocal message against the use of illegal drugs is consistent? Perhaps he might have a word with the Prime Minister to ensure that his right hon. Friend does not in future invite to Downing street personalities such as those from the pop music world who are known to take drugs and who set such a poor example to the young who idolise them.

Dr. Cunningham: I begin by congratulating the right hon. Lady—

Mrs. Winterton: Hon. Lady.

Dr. Cunningham: I beg her pardon.

Mrs. Winterton: Only a matter of time.

Dr. Cunningham: It is, indeed, only a matter of time. I congratulate the hon. Lady on her new position on the Front Bench, and I thank her for her co-operation in taking a non-partisan approach to these issues. I hope that the shadow Secretary of State for Education and Employment will also revert to taking that non-partisan approach on the illegal use of drugs. We are concerned with the impact of drugs on children and young people, and that simply is not a party political issue.

I am very pleased to be able to say that the Prime Minister's guest lists for 10 Downing street are not a matter for me and fall within none of my responsibilities.

Mrs. Irene Adams (Paisley, North): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his efforts to reduce use of illegal drugs. Will he join me in congratulating the groups which have come together over the past three years in Paisley, North to fight the menace of drugs, and which, by doing so, have reduced violent crime by 36 per cent. over that period? Does my right hon. Friend agree that only when every section of the community comes together can that kind of progress be made?

Dr. Cunningham: Yes, I agree. We are willing and determined to work with local drugs action teams and other organisations, and I pay tribute to them. I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend for the courageous stance that she has consistently taken in her constituency and in wider Scottish debates.

Civil Service (Independence)

5. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): What new measures he plans to take to ensure the independence of the Civil Service. [58916]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Mr. Peter Kilfoyle): The role of the civil service, as summarised in the "Civil Service Code", is to assist the duly constituted Government of the day with integrity, honesty, impartiality and objectivity. We intend to bring forward legislation to give statutory force to the code as and when a suitable opportunity occurs. The "Ministerial Code" requires Ministers to uphold the political impartiality of the civil service.

Mr. Swayne: Does the Minister believe that the taxpayer is getting value for money for Alastair Campbell at £90,000 a year for a job which the Prime Minister describes as one of attacking the Opposition, and which the press are increasingly discovering to be one of concealing information, or providing misleading information?

Mr. Kilfoyle: It is arrant nonsense to talk about the Government concealing information, certainly about the role of the chief press spokesman for the Prime Minister and those in similar posts. We have set out clearly and publicly to place presentation at the heart of Government. We have made it clear, and we make no apology for saying, that we shall drive our agenda forward from the centre in a way that will not compromise the political impartiality of civil servants. That is the role of special advisers.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Is my hon. Friend aware that, after 18 years in which it was said that the only question asked of any civil servant was, "Is he one of us?", Labour Members not only expect the Government to maintain the independence of the civil service but strongly believe that that is the only way in which the interests of the public will be preserved?

Mr. Kilfoyle: I could not but agree with my hon. Friend. The use of special advisers in certain matters means that we avoid the dangers, which many people would allege that the previous Government strayed into, of politically compromising regular civil servants. We have no intention of doing that.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): Was not my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West

(Mr. Swayne) right to focus on the independence of the civil service and to draw attention to the injury done to that tradition of impartial civil servants by the Government doubling the number of special advisers and giving them pay increases way above the average of those given to other civil servants? If one sets that centralising tendency against all the others displayed by the Government, are we not right to conclude that the country needs not more central enforcement from the Minister for the Cabinet Office, but less?

Mr. Kilfoyle: Let me make it clear to the right hon. Gentleman that we said at the outset that the Government would place the drive for implementing our programme at the very heart of Government. That is why, in July, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister reconfigured the Cabinet Office. We have also clearly and unequivocally said what role we expect special advisers to fulfil. I point out to the right hon. Gentleman, who mentioned costs, that the average salary paid to a special adviser under the present Government is £1,000 less than the previous Government paid their special advisers.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): Has my hon. Friend read the remarkable article by the Prime Minister in the new issue of Prospect magazine, in which he asserts the independence and integrity of the civil service and invites civil servants to think across Departments, learn from mistakes, extend boundaries rather than protect turf, and work closely with their European counterparts to advance the interests of the nation and the Government? Will my hon. Friend distribute copies of that article throughout the civil service to encourage initiative and independence and acknowledge its contribution to good government of our nation?

Mr. Kilfoyle: I thank my hon. Friend for reminding me of the occasion on which that speech was made. I am sure that it was so inspirational that, if we made copies available, even Conservative Members would be moved to recognise the Prime Minister's commitment to joined-up government, better government and an efficient civil service. That commitment was certainly recognised by the members of the senior civil service who were present when the speech was made.

Economic and Monetary Union

7. Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): What consultations he has held with Cabinet colleagues over the presentation of Government policy towards European economic and monetary union. [58919]

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Dr. Jack Cunningham): I have regular discussions with Cabinet colleagues on a wide range of issues.

Mr. Wilkinson: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that textual criticism about whether the Chancellor or the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said "if" or "when" is superfluous because they are united on the promotion of the euro, if on nothing else? Will he admit to the House that the real agenda for his party and his Government was spelled out in the document "The European Way", initiated during the Government's presidency of the European Union, which suggests a minimum level of taxation for companies and savings, or, in other words, further imposts on British jobs that would further damage British competitiveness?

Dr. Cunningham: I can certainly confirm that the Government's position on the single currency has not changed. We wish it to be a success; we shall test our position on joining it on the basis of jobs, investment and what is good for British industry and the economy; and if the Government decide that we should join, we shall put that decision to Parliament and to the people of this country.

As for differences in respect of the document that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, that is not a Government-to-Government document, but a document from a party of European socialists who are working towards a manifesto. It does not commit the Government specifically to anything. It is a draft working document. It is not surprising that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer supports that work, because, as the hon. Gentleman accurately said, it commenced under my right hon. Friend's chairmanship during the British presidency of the European Union.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Does my right hon. Friend know that, in my constituency, a large number of businesses are expressing a positive approach towards the prospect of Britain eventually joining the euro? They have changed their attitude over the past two or three years. Is he further aware that the co-operation on policy on a pan-European basis that is being pursued by the party of European Socialists is in marked contrast to the narrow-minded isolationism and nationalist xenophobia on the Conservative Benches?

Dr. Cunningham: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. He highlights the disarray in the Conservative party on Britain's role in Europe, and the Conservatives' general disarray on policy. The Leader of the Opposition disagrees with the shadow Chancellor, who disagrees with the shadow spokespeople on education and health. It is a shambles.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): When the Minister consults his colleagues on the matter, will he make a point of reminding them that repeated opinion polls have shown that only one third of the British people favour economic and monetary union, whereas well over half of them oppose it? Will he ensure that lashings of Government money are not expended on bogus arguments about the inevitability of something that a heavy majority of the British people rightly reject?

Dr. Cunningham: The Government will present our case for what is best for Britain to the British people in a consistent and wholly proper and prudent manner.

Executive Agencies

8. Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): What new powers he is proposing for executive agencies. [58920]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Mr. Peter Kilfoyle): The levels of delegation to agency chief executives under the next steps initiative are a matter for the Minister to whom he or she reports and will vary according to the size and function of the agency. The Government's general approach is to encourage initiative within a clear framework of targets and delegations set by the responsible Ministers.

Mr. Cousins: Will the programme for the modernisation of the state that the Government have in hand include allowing agencies to raise money sensibly, to act as beacon public enterprises and to be fairly and directly responsible to Parliament?

Mr. Kilfoyle: We are looking at all available options with respect to the functions of the agencies. It is a matter for constant review. Recently, there was a conference of the chief executives of the agencies to explore some of the points raised by my hon. Friend.

Ecstasy

9. Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): What consultation he has had with the anti-drugs co-ordinator on policies on the use of ecstasy. [58921]

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Dr. Jack Cunningham): The Government's anti-drugs strategy, "Tackling Drugs Together to Build a Better Britain", outlines action to tackle all illegal drugs, including Ecstasy.

Ms Stuart: Given that evidence clearly suggests that young people respond to factual information when they consider the use of such drugs as Ecstasy, will my right hon. Friend make sure that the information on long-term brain damage associated with such drugs is made widely available not just to schools and children, but to their parents?

Dr. Cunningham: Yes, we shall do that in the course of developing our 10-year strategy to tackle drug abuse in this country. Some of the £217 million in additional expenditure that I announced a few weeks ago will be targeted as my hon. Friend requests: it will be spent on further programmes of education, advice and information.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): Does the Minister accept that the Government's so-called anti-drugs strategy is failing? Will he not therefore set up a royal commission to examine the uses and effects of all illegal drugs?

Dr. Cunningham: No, I do not accept that—and neither does the Liberal Democrat health spokesman, the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who has said positive things about the Government's drugs strategy. If the Liberal Democrats cannot agree among themselves about their party's position on this subject, I cannot take their comments very seriously.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [58891] Valerie Davey (Bristol, West): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 18 November.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Valerie Davey: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the young people at a Bristol comprehensive school that was visited today by the Secretary of State for Education and Employment have a clearer understanding of democracy and the importance of elections than do the anachronistic hereditary members of the House of Lords?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I fully agree. It is not merely the fact that the hereditary peers can decide policy in the House of Lords, but that the in-built Tory majority—three to one—in the other place means that, whatever the election result, the House of Lords can overturn the will of the House of Commons. That is not democracy.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): Of the 20 Labour Back Benchers who have spoken in the House and in Committee about the closed-list system for European elections, how many have spoken in favour of it?

The Prime Minister: Nobody voted—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] Nobody voted against it. In the House of Lords—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

The Prime Minister: Just to correct what the Leader of the Opposition said this morning: although he tried to pretend that it was a broad-based alliance in the House of Lords, only 21 of the votes against the Government in the House of Lords last night were not cast by Tories or hereditaries. That shows them in their true colours.

Mr. Hague: The question was: how many Labour Back Benchers in the House have voted for closed lists? Why does the Prime Minister not ask one of the Chinese mystics to whom he is turning to teach him the ancient art of answering the question? The answer is that one Labour Back Bencher has spoken in favour of closed lists in the House—and even he spoke against them in Committee.

Labour Members are too embarrassed to speak in favour of a closed-list system, and the Prime Minister is too embarrassed to admit that they are embarrassed. Why does he not admit that the Cross-Bench peers voted against the Government last night, that the Law Lords voted against the Government, and that all the bishops who were present voted against the Government? Will the Prime Minister acknowledge that all independent opinion is against a voting system that denies the voters the right to vote for the candidate that they prefer?

The Prime Minister: No, I do not accept that at all. As I have just said, quite contrary to what the Leader of the Opposition is telling people, only 21 of the votes upon which he relied last night were not cast by Tories or hereditaries. Supporting the Labour party's position were the Liberal Democrats, Cross Benchers—[Interruption.] So the Tory party is happy to rely on hereditary peers, but not on Liberal Democrats. Well, I prefer the support of people elected by the people, not hereditary peers—that is the answer. I think it fascinating that Conservative Members count the hereditary peers as more important than people who are democratically elected.

The system that we are proposing brings us into line with other European countries; it is our manifesto commitment. It is wrong to say that it does not list the candidates; the ballot paper lists parties and candidates. The system is used for France, Germany, Spain, Greece and Portugal. The only countries that use the Tories' system are Finland and Sweden. This, however, is no longer about the system; it is about the hereditary Tory peers in the House of Lords.

May I give the right hon. Gentleman some advice, as I know that he is in need of an image consultant at the moment? The right image for him is not to wrap himself in the ermine of hereditary peers.

Mr. Hague: It has come to something when the only independent support that the Prime Minister can find is from the Liberal party, which last week was not meant to be independent at all. It is funny that, when the Lords defeated the previous Government on their Criminal Justice Bill, the shadow Home Secretary of the time said:

"This is a resounding victory for common sense."

Who was the shadow Home Secretary? The right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). There was no whining about an affront to democracy on that occasion, was there?

The Prime Minister is having difficulties with his questions today. He has his file with him; why does he not read out what his beloved Jenkins committee said about closed and open lists?

The Prime Minister: I am not going to do that—the right hon. Gentleman can read it out, and he can ask his own questions. Under the system that we are proposing, we will give away seats, both to Liberal Democrats and to the Tories—it is an act of generosity on our part. If he wants to end up using his hereditary majority in the House of Lords to overturn that, that is a matter for him. The Tories have the power to do that in the House of Lords—they can frustrate the will of the House of Commons. But if he does that, and we go back to the old system of first past the post—[HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."]—which I think some of my hon. Friends—[Interruption.] The right hon. Gentleman has even managed to make me loved by the Labour party.

If we go back to the old system of first past the post, we will watch with delight as the right hon. Gentleman's candidates fight each other for selection. If he uses the House of Lords to overturn the will of the democratically elected House of Commons, and to overturn a system that is used by two thirds of citizens in the European Union, that will show, first, that he has the strategic vision of a bat—because that will do his party more harm than any other party—and, secondly, that when it comes to democracy, the Tories prefer hereditary peers to the will of the people.

Mr. Hague: Is it not fascinating that the Prime Minister has so few arguments to advance his case? I am so sorry that he cannot read from the Jenkins report—Lord Jenkins will be most put out—but fortunately, I have a copy: never travel without it. Lord Jenkins says:

"it is crucial that the voters' right to express their view of individual candidates should be maintained . . . For this reason we greatly prefer an open list, to a closed party list".

So every independent person can see what the Prime Minister cannot see—that the real affront to democracy is his plan to deny the voters the right to vote for a candidate whom they prefer. Is he not overriding every word of caution and every constitutional check and balance to expand the power of his clique of cronies at the expense of the power of the people?

The Prime Minister: First, Lord Jenkins voted with us rather than with the Conservatives. Secondly, what the right hon. Gentleman is saying is that there is no argument in favour of the list system that we are putting forward. As I have pointed out, the vast majority of people in the European Union vote according to the system that we are putting forward. It is the system that is used by most large countries. Under the system that the right hon. Gentleman is putting forward, a candidate with fewer votes could get elected over someone with more votes, which is plainly absurd.

In any event, the right hon. Gentleman has never dealt with the essential point: is the will of the House of Commons the will that should be upheld, or is it the will of the Tory hereditary peers? Perhaps he can get up and admit that it is only with Tory hereditary peers that he comes anywhere near winning this vote. That is the real issue: Conservatives' support of hereditary peers, or our support for an elected House of Commons.

Mr. Hague: The Prime Minister knows that that is not the case. If he looks at the figures that he has in front of him, he will see that 47 Cross-Bench peers voted with the Opposition and 12 with the Government. The three bishops voted with the Opposition and not with the Government. Four Law Lords and ex-Law Lords voted with the Opposition and not with the Government. If those people had voted the other way round, the Government would have been successful. The reason why the Prime Minister lost in the House of Lords is that he lost the argument—and he has lost the argument in the House of Commons as well.

The Prime Minister: No, the right hon. Gentleman is wrong. Without Tory hereditary peers, he would have come nowhere near winning the vote. The truth is that he wins only through Tory hereditary peers. What he has done today is to decide not merely against his own party's interest, but to use Tory hereditary peers to frustrate the will of the House of Commons. That is his choice, and he will live with its consequences.

Q2. [58892] Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): My right hon. Friend will be aware that I was not sent here by the voters of Norwich, North to be dictated to by a bunch of in-bred, homozygous recessives.

It is estimated that one in two people in this country will contract cancer by 2010. Does the Prime Minister agree that we need to tackle its causes—asbestos, tobacco and other agents? Does he further agree that the inequalities throughout this country in care and in the treatment and detection of cancers are not consistent with the modern society that we are going to construct? Does he now agree that the time for Britain against cancer has come, and that part of the success story in the United States—a national cancer institute—might be an element of our plan?

The Prime Minister: It may be part of our plan, but already, as my hon. Friend will know, we are putting some £20 billion into the health service—that is extra—from next April; that is opposed, of course, by the Conservative party. The Government have guaranteed that everyone with suspected cancer will be seen by a specialist within two weeks of their general practitioner referring them as an urgent case, so we are not just putting that extra money in: we are directing some of those extra resources to cancer.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on all the work that he has done in campaigning on the issue. We are also going to ensure, of course, through the £2.5 billion hospital-building programme, that we get the right buildings and infrastructure as well.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil) rose—

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ashdown: I am grateful for that expression of support from both sides—truly non-tribal.

As we are discussing actions in Committee, is the Prime Minister aware that, when open lists in the European elections were debated in Committee in the House of Lords, the Conservatives refused to vote in favour of them and the Conservative spokesman claimed that open lists were "manifestly unfair"? Is this not absolutely clearly an example of extraordinary opportunism and double standards on the part of the Conservative party? Worse, is there not now a risk that the actions of the hereditary peers will deny the voters of Britain a fair electoral system for the European elections—a system for which two thirds of them voted in last year's general election?

The Prime Minister: Of course that is true. It is a manifesto commitment on the part of the Government that is being frustrated.

I have just turned up the figures relating to hereditary peers. The largest single group voting with the Conservatives were hereditary peers, who made up just over half the vote. As I have said, if we put Tories and hereditary peers together, we find that there were only 21 other votes. Talk of the great so-called cross-party and Cross-Bench alliance is absolute and utter nonsense.

What the right hon. Gentleman says is true: the system represents a manifesto commitment. Under the system that we propose, the ballot paper will list parties and candidates, so it is nonsense to suggest that voters will not know which group of people they are voting for. Our system would bring us into line with the majority view in the rest of the European Union—but the Opposition do not care about the manifesto commitment; they are more interested in using hereditary peers to frustrate the will of this place.

Mr. Ashdown: So does the Prime Minister agree that the proper constitutional process now would be for both Houses to pass the European Parliamentary Elections Bill today, on the basis that the Government will ensure that the review that they have already promised will take place after next year's elections will be conducted by an independent body such as the electoral commission proposed by Lord Neill? [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I will have order. Three Members, whom I could name, are shouting their heads off. It must stop.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the Government ensure that the review will be conducted not by the Government, but by an independent body such as the electoral commission proposed by Lord Neill and supported by the Conservative party, which will then be able to recommend appropriate improvements and a more open procedure for subsequent elections?

The Prime Minister: That is a perfectly good suggestion. We have made it clear throughout that we are happy to arrange an independent review. The suggestion is intelligent, but we have an Opposition who are not interested in the issue at all. What they are interested in doing is using the issue to make a point of their own about the House of Lords. I happen to think that they are not making a very sensible point. As I have said, under the system that we propose ours will be the party that gives up seats. I think the Conservatives will find that their short-term diddling will lead to quite a long-term problem for them.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): And now for something completely different.

Is my right hon. Friend aware that the board of Vaux, which employs 670 people in Sunderland and a couple of hundred in Sheffield, is putting its brewing interests on the market? Although the two companies concerned are profitable, and although Vaux has received a bid from its own management to run the companies as a going concern, it is contemplating selling them to one of its rivals, which will close them down, sack the work force and thereby eliminate a competitor. I know that we are all supposed to believe in market forces nowadays, but does my right hon. Friend agree that such action would represent the unacceptable face of capitalism?

The Prime Minister: I understand my hon. Friend's concern, and the fact that people are worried about their jobs. I am sure that those people will take account of my hon. Friend's powerful case. As he knows, the decision is not one for Government, but I am aware that he has made his case to those concerned, and I hope that they will listen carefully.

Q3. [58893] Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): How many times must the Paymaster General fail to register his financial interests before the Prime Minister has the courage to sack him from the Government?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General will make his statement after Question Time. I hope that the House will allow him to do so. The Committee has made findings, to which he will respond. He should be left to respond to those findings. As my right hon. Friend has already pointed out, this refers to a time before he was a Minister. He accepts that it was an oversight on his part, and I think that the House should listen carefully to what he has to say.

Q4. [58894] Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South): Will the Prime Minister—in congratulating my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment on the latest literacy and numeracy initiatives—urge him and all Departments to press ahead with expenditure in areas that will promote social inclusion? Will he congratulate my own borough of Blackpool on appointing a reader in residence in their schools, to promote reading among parents and children? Will the Prime Minister emphasise again to the House that such actions demonstrate the Government's commitment to public expenditure and to social inclusion, as opposed to the social exclusion practised by the House of Lords?

The Prime Minister: There are three things that we are doing for people in the position of my hon. Friend's constituents. We are putting £19 billion extra into education next year; ensuring that there is the new deal for young unemployed and long-term unemployed—our action has resulted in youth unemployment for over six months being cut by between 30 per cent. and 40 per cent.; and introducing the working families tax credit, which will improve the earnings of low income families. The three measures will help constituents—such as those of my hon. Friend and other hon. Members—throughout the land. All three measures are opposed by today's Conservative party, and nothing could better demonstrate the difference between us.

Q5. [58896] Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking): Is the Prime Minister now aware that his continued support for the closed-list system is seen by so many as one more example of his contempt for the democratic process and for the electors of the United Kingdom, and as further evidence of the Government's desire to control, control and control?

The Prime Minister: On a point of fact, all the systems that have been discussed—all of them—are list systems that parties put into effect. As I said, the list system that we are proposing is used by most of the large countries in the European Union. The idea that we are proposing something that has never been heard of before is therefore absurd. The system was, of course, pioneered in the United Kingdom—in Northern Ireland, by the Conservative party.

Surely the democratic monstrosity is not the House of Commons deciding that one variant of the PR system is the best, but the Conservative party using its permanent in-built majority of Conservative hereditary peers—elected by no one and accountable to no one—to overturn the democratic majority in the House. That is how the vast majority of people will see it.

Q6. [58898] Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe (Leigh): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his announcement last week of £1.24 billion extra for police forces has been received with acclamation by both police and public? Is he aware that there is a growing appreciation among the British people of the fact that our Labour Government are determined to defeat crime at every possible opportunity, reinforcing once again the public's confidence in Labour's tough policies on crime?

May I also tell my right hon. Friend that certain chief constables are essentially scaremongering about their budgets? If the chief constable of Manchester is right in prophesying that his police authority's budget—which he has not yet received—will be short to the tune of £18 million, 224 police support jobs will have to go. Would it not be complete folly if we failed to find a few million extra quid to avoid major damage to our police force, so that we do not undermine our successful policies in dealing with crime?

The Prime Minister: There is a lot of negotiation at about this time of year on budgets. However, no allocations have yet finally been made. We are quite considerably increasing the police budget. My hon. Friend drew attention also to policies on law and order, particularly those on youth justice and crime and disorder. This Government, unlike the previous one, are not only being tough on crime but—through the new deal—tackling the underlying causes of crime. It is important to get both parts of that equation right.

Q7. [58899] Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): If the Prime Minister is serious about securing economic stability, does he accept that it requires not just an independent Bank of England, but a strategy for stabilising exchange rates and bringing our interest rates closer into line with already low European rates? Is not that failure of policy the reason why today's Treasury survey of independent economic forecasts shows that manufacturing industry is predicted to decline sharply next year, contrary to the Chancellor's forecasts? Is he now so confident that manufacturing industry will avoid recession in 1999?

The Prime Minister: We have made it clear—indeed, I made it clear a couple of days ago—that industry and jobs face a tougher time in the next year. The question is: what is the right way to get through this? We believe that Bank of England independence and keeping tight control of fiscal policy—which we have done, slashing the enormous budget deficit that we inherited from the Conservatives—are the right things to do. If we combine them with measures to improve working conditions for people, such as the working families tax credit and the new deal, on which the OECD report today specifically congratulates us, we have the best chance of weathering the storm. The difference between us and the Liberal Democrats is that, although they want interest rates down, they want spending massively increased.

Mr. Bruce indicated dissent.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but on any basis they do. It is important that we get the right mix of monetary and fiscal policy. I believe that we have done that. That is why long-term interest rates are at their lowest for more than 30 years. Holding our nerve and staying firm on the policies that we have set out provides the best chance for this country to come through in the next 12 months.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I am a firm supporter of the first-past-the-post system, and am utterly delighted that the suicide club on the Conservative Front Bench and their cronies along the Corridor are determined to maximise the number of Labour Members of the European Parliament and minimise the number of Tory MEPs. As attempts are being made to label my right hon. Friend a control freak—something that I have been told to say is completely alien to his nature—does it not strike him as bizarre that the unelected Chamber along the Corridor is trying to block his attempts to minimise the number of Labour MEPs who could be elected on a first-past-the-post system, thereby seeking to disperse power, authority and representation away from his Front Bench?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend makes an immensely persuasive case. Our proposal means that we would give away seats in the European elections next year. If the Conservatives wish to take us down another route, that is a matter for them. However, as my right hon. Friend implies, it is wrong for them to use hereditary Conservative peers to do so.

Q8. [58900] Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): On Monday, the Prime Minister told the City that he found economic stability sexy. Does he realise that British business would find him rather more sexy if he stopped flirting with Europe and made up his mind on the euro? When will the Prime Minister stop teasing British firms with his ifs and his buts, commit himself—and make a date?

The Prime Minister: I believe in a sustained period of wooing before relationships are entered into. What business wants above all is to know that the Government are going to hold to Bank of England independence and tight fiscal policy, making the additional investment in infrastructure, schools and hospitals next year.

In the past few weeks the Conservatives have provided the country with a simple choice. They would scrap Bank of England independence, they oppose our investment in schools and hospitals next year, they would scrap the working families tax credit and they would scrap the new deal. That is their decision. Business has a clear choice. And, of course, the Conservatives would rule out the euro for—is it two Parliaments or 10 years?

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Longer.

The Prime Minister: I cannot wait for the Euro-selection contests to begin in the Tory party.

There is a simple choice, and business knows it. It now has a clear choice between this Government, who are pursuing the right policies for long-term stability, and a Conservative party that would return us to boom and bust.

Ms Debra Shipley (Stourbridge): Does my right hon. Friend agree that his Government have brought in good working practice such as the minimum wage and the working time directive, and are also striving for ethical trade? Is he aware of the fair trade initiative, which ensures that people in other countries get a decent wage and decent working conditions as they produce the products for us to consume here? Does he welcome the fact that many people in my constituency, including societies, community groups, Churches, schools and even my researchers, have all decided to choose fair trade products?

The Prime Minister: The principles behind the fair trade initiative are admirable, although as a Government we must be careful not to do anything that would inhibit free trade. I agree 100 per cent. with my hon. Friend about the minimum wage. Again, that represents a clear difference between ourselves and the Conservative party. We believe in minimum standards in the workplace, and think them fully consistent with a competitive economy; whereas the Conservatives oppose minimum standards such as the minimum wage. Workers will go into the next election knowing that, if they vote Conservative, the minimum wage will be withdrawn from them.

Bereavement Benefits

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Alistair Darling): With your permission, Madam Speaker, I shall make a statement on the next stage of our welfare reform programme.

We have already launched the new deal, the biggest ever investment by Government in jobs and training. We have begun to tackle child poverty, with the biggest ever rise in child benefit. We have introduced a national child care strategy. We are modernising our tax and benefits system to make work pay, with a new working families tax credit, which will benefit up to 1.5 million people, underpinned by the national minimum wage.

Three weeks ago, I set out wide-ranging reforms to disability benefits, giving more help for severely disabled people and those disabled early in life. We are modernising the system to ensure that benefits go to those for whom they were intended. All these reforms are driven by our central objective—work for those who can and security for those who cannot.

Today I am publishing a consultation paper on our proposals for the reform of bereavement benefits paid to people of working age. Copies of the consultation paper are available in the Vote Office. The reforms apply only to people of working age who lose their husbands or wives. Women already widowed, widows over state pension age, and war widows will continue to get the support that we give them now. They will not be affected by the reforms that I set out today.

My announcement is one in a series of long-term reforms that will form the basis of legislation at the earliest opportunity. However, today's proposals will not be introduced before April 2001, so as to allow time for implementation.

The system of bereavement benefits that we inherited is out of date. When it was introduced 50 years ago, most women did not work, certainly not after marriage. Today, seven out of 10 married women work—almost as many as the eight out of 10 married men who work. Today, 1.5 million women benefit from their late husband's pensions, compared with the 100,000 who did so 50 years ago. About 40 per cent. of the women currently getting widows benefit are in the top half of the income bracket. The world has changed, and the benefits system needs to reflect those changes.

The system also fails on four specific counts. First, it is unfair to men: 15,000 husbands bereaved each year get no help at all. That unfairness cannot continue, and it is already being challenged in the European Court of Human Rights—so doing nothing, as some urge, is not an option. Secondly, the system does not provide enough help with the immediate costs of bereavement, such as unpaid bills or funeral costs. Thirdly, money often goes to those who have the least need of it. Widows without children who have substantial incomes can get benefits for years, but a man—who may have growing children and modest means—gets nothing at all. Finally, the present system fails to support the poorest mothers on income support. Widows who have children to care for lose their benefit pound for pound, and so get no financial gain from their widows benefit.

The reforms that I am announcing today will change all that. Our reforms will, for the first time, get help to men who lose their wives, and on an equal footing with widows. They will provide extra financial help with immediate needs, such as funeral expenses.

We will continue to help those older people without children during the period immediately after bereavement and, as with our other reforms, our priority is to provide security for families with children, and to get the greatest help to the poorest. Our proposals will ensure the security of families with children, and we will do more for the poorest families and their children.

First, I can announce today that men who lose their wives will get help on the same basis as women who lose their husbands. We will go further—once the reforms are introduced, they will apply not only to newly bereaved widowers, but to those husbands with children already widowed. For the first time, we will be providing security for around 20,000 men and their children.

Secondly, I wish to refer to immediate help on bereavement. The loss of a husband or wife is traumatic, and a time of great need and anxiety. We recognise the need for immediate financial help. Indeed, it is one of the strengths of the current system that, on bereavement, a widow gets a £1,000 lump sum within four days. In my view, that payment is no longer high enough—the amount has not changed in 10 years—so, today, I can announce that we are doubling the lump sum cash payment to £2,000. We want to give more help with a range of costs, such as bills or the cost of a funeral.

Thirdly, we want to ensure that we get help to those who need it most. Today, long-term widows benefits may go to many who do not need them because they do not have the extra costs of bringing up children, or because they have good incomes from jobs, pensions or insurance. Some argue that those are grounds for abolishing the benefit completely, but we do not believe that that would be right. We recognise that financial support is needed in the period immediately after bereavement, so we will continue to provide a financial breathing space for bereaved spouses—aged 45 and over—who do not have dependent children by paying a weekly benefit, worth up to £64.70. The new bereavement allowance will be paid for six months only—providing transitional support at a time of particular need.

We also recognise that, for the generation of widows and widowers aged 55 or over at the time when the changes are introduced, special arrangements will be needed because it could be difficult for them to make new plans. I can announce today that anyone from that generation who qualifies for income support and who is widowed in the five years after the changes are introduced will get support worth the same amount as the current widows pension.

Fourthly, we are determined to ensure that the greatest help goes to those with greatest needs. Our reforms will continue to provide long-term financial help to bereaved parents with children. I can confirm that bereaved husbands and wives will continue to get a weekly benefit—currently worth, on average, £85—payable until their youngest dependent child leaves full-time further education. As with our other proposals, that help goes to both men and women who lose their spouse. However, we want to go further. We are determined to do more to help people who need help most, and we will ensure that the system helps the poorest widows and widowers, and their children.

Today, I can announce that the poorest bereaved parents who are on income-related benefits and getting bereavement benefits will gain additional cash help worth up to an extra £10 a week—providing the greatest help to those with greatest needs. The reforms modernise the benefit, treat men and women equally, give immediate help where it is needed, give more help to the poorest and do not affect existing widows.

As with the reforms that I announced three weeks ago, the structural changes will deliver significant savings, of around £500 million in the long run. However, we will do so by ensuring that the greatest help goes to those with greatest needs, and, in the short term, we are spending £140 million more to meet real need. As society gets wealthier, the amount that we spend on the most vulnerable should increase—but benefits must go to those who need them most. We must give more help to those in greatest need. We are planning now for the needs of the future, to ensure that the system is affordable, fair and effective.

Some people will urge us to do nothing, and, yes, turning our backs on the failure of the current system would have been the easy option. However, the real scandal would be for a Government committed to social justice to ignore the unfairness, to ignore the needs of children and to do nothing to help those in greatest need.

These are fair reforms, which provide real security and real help at a time of real need for bereaved husbands and wives and their children. I commend the proposals to the House.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green): I must thank the Secretary of State for giving me a copy of his statement in advance. It contains some good and some bad proposals, and I shall deal with those fairly quickly.

Obviously, it is the Government's right and responsibility to reform the benefit. They are right: things have changed. The way in which people live their lives is changing all the time. No benefit is fixed in concrete and should stay the same for ever—that is an agreed principle. Therefore, the Government are right to consider this benefit. There is no question about that.

Clearly, the question is how the Government go about it. Who will be the winners and the losers? What will be the long-term prospects for those who would, or should, be dependent on assistance and support as a result of national insurance contributions made, in many cases, by husbands but now, obviously, by wives?

When we introduced the lump sum concept in the mid-1980s, it was the right thing to do. By increasing it—that is welcome—the Secretary of State has agreed that that is the right principle. It goes to people at the moment when they most need it, and does not depend on their filling out huge forms and getting into difficulties. The right hon. Gentleman was therefore right to focus on that; it is welcome.

Clearly, the issue of men being dependent on the benefit was relevant because of the court case. It was a necessary change. The Government have taken the view that the case will be won, and whether they are being a little previous is not the point of this debate. The fact is that they have taken that view, and there is no point in discussing it further.

However, the Government must answer some other major questions. First, the Secretary of State talked about the average £85. Will he break that figure down? He said that the benefit was currently worth, on average, £85. Does that mean that the future commitment is to retain it at that purchasing power? How will he calculate that in future? Obviously, the £85 is a mix of what is there at the moment, but why not specify how it is broken down and the Government's commitment for the future?

I must criticise the Government on their handling of the second issue, as it concerns me that they have put the cart before the horse. Surely the issue is linked inextricably with pension reform. Everything that the Secretary of State has said puts the burden on those in work to provide not merely for their own retirement, but for their dependants and spouses. He is suggesting that that will, and should, happen; yet we have heard nothing in 18 months from the Government about pension reform, other than leaks and suggestions in the papers that they are eroding the pension. They have said a little about what they may do, but there has been no great focus on the subject. So many of them—[Interruption.]

It is all very well for those on the Treasury Bench to snigger. The fact is that many people outside this place who have listened to the statement will be concerned about what means testing means to them and how they can provide security for their families when they have no idea what framework the Government propose for pensions. The Government must accelerate that process; otherwise, people will remain in fear and will worry about what will happen to them.

The second part of the statement was the most critical. This Government seem to be unable to admit that they are about getting rid of the contributory principle. That is what this is all about. They do it by stealth. Each time the Secretary of State produces another proposal, the ending of the contributory principle lies at its heart.

The Secretary of State is being very clever in talking about widows pensions. He says that, after the six-month transitional period, those on income support will continue to receive the benefit for five years. However, those who are not on income support clearly will not receive it. Those on the margins, with small savings, will fall off.

The Secretary of State admits that he has an obligation to those who pay national insurance, but he limits that obligation to five years and to those who are on income support. He is saying that the contributory principle is no longer relevant and will be ended. People outside the House who hear that should remember that the Government are hellbent on completely changing their position.

If the Secretary of State and the Chancellor of the Exchequer intend to means-test the basic state pension after the next election, they should say so. They should say: "The contributory principle is over. We shall now have a means-tested set of benefits." That is what the statement suggests—it proposes taxed and means-tested transitional relief.

The proposals contain an absurdity. The Government will means-test those on upper incomes for this benefit, but the working families tax credit—which the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, the hon.

[Mr. Iain Duncan Smith]

Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), who is chirping away on the Treasury Bench, admitted would create no jobs—will be paid to people with incomes as high as £38,000 year. The Government seem to be unable to settle that conflict. They means-test to reduce some benefits, whereas they scatter money around and waste it on other benefits, increasing expenditure by £1.5 billion.

Reform of the benefit is necessary, but this reform is driven by a Government who are in desperate need of short-term savings. They are scraping away, saying, "We've got to find some way to save the money." The Secretary of State is, in no small measure, robbing Pauline to help Paul.

Mr. Darling: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for acknowledging the fact that I gave him a copy of the statement, but I had hoped that he would read it. The proposals contain no short-term savings, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has pointed out. As I said in the statement, we are spending more in the short term to meet immediate need. The £500 million savings will be in the long term—like the measures that I announced some three weeks ago, these proposals represent major structural changes to the benefits system, which will enable us to plan for the future.

I am also grateful to the hon. Gentleman for welcoming the fact that the lump sum will be increased, which most people recognise will meet an immediate need. He said that we were right to extend the benefits to men and women, although he thought that we were premature in taking account of the case that is before the European Court. I take a slightly different view: I believe that it is unfair to treat men and women differently, which is why I wanted to put right that wrong.

If the best that the hon. Gentleman can say is that he is against my announcement because it did not deal with pensions, I shall have to accept it. I shall make a separate statement on pensions when the Government publish their proposals, as we have promised. Today's announcement was about widows benefits.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the make-up of the £85 a week. That figure—the widows maintenance allowance—will depend on how many children a widow has. There is an allowance of £9.90 for the first child and £11.30 for the second. There is also a state earnings-related pension scheme element. The hon. Gentleman asks whether we will keep the figure under review. As he should know, all benefit figures are kept under review.

The contributory principle is worthy of discussion, although perhaps not in these exchanges. Successive Governments have changed the conditions attached to the contributory principle. Indeed, the previous Government did so on several occasions—most recently in 1996, when the entitlement to unemployment benefit was reduced from a year to six months. We are in many respects increasing the benefits available—we are extending benefits to men, and we are increasing the lump sum.

Over the past few weeks, the hon. Gentleman and other Conservative Members have called for welfare reform. However, whenever any reform is suggested, they say: "Welfare reform, yes, but not this." They will not address themselves to the fact that there are many problems with the current benefits system and that not least among them is the problem that we are paying benefits to people who do not need them and not doing enough for people who do. That in itself is a case for reform, and that reform deserves support.

Conservative Members must do a little bit better than merely apologising for cutting the married persons tax allowance—which is their policy on the family—and proposing a transferable tax allowance which would cost £4 billion every year; they cannot tell us how they would fund it.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Is the Secretary of State proposing that the existing package of benefits for widows should be extended to widowers? If so, how many widowers and how many women will lose benefit when the reforms come into force, and how many people will be pushed on to means tests?

Mr. Darling: No, we are not proposing to apply the existing benefits regime to men. That would cost about £250 million a year and could not be justified. We are continuing the system of support for mothers, and now fathers, with young children, which is entirely justified, and ensuring that the allowance payable to people without children runs for six months only. That is a major change from the present scheme. We cannot justify spending money on those who do not need it while many people who need help are not supported.

I know my right hon. Friend's view on income support—he is against means-testing—but income support and means-testing are ways of ensuring that we get the help to those who need it most, and that is an extremely important safeguard as a fundamental part of the structure of the benefit system. Our reforms for widows benefits overall will ensure that we give help where it is needed.

On my right hon. Friend's detailed points, I sent him a copy of the consultation document, and he ought by now to have received it.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): I, too, am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving me a chance to read his statement before he delivered it. I have both read it and listened to him delivering it, so I hope that I know what is in it. The Liberal Democrats welcome the doubling of the lump sum but, given the Secretary of State's cogent arguments for it, should it not be done straight away? It will be given universal acclaim and could probably be implemented by regulation rather than by primary legislation. If the costs are already much greater than £1,000, we could surely do something about that immediately.

We also welcome the reform to make all the payments payable to men who lose their wives as well as to wives who lose their husbands. That is clearly right, as I have said to the Secretary of State before, and I am glad that he has acknowledged that in his statement. Is the new bereavement allowance to have an earnings-related element, as I believe the current widows pensions do?

Is not six months far too short a time for the bereavement allowance to run? The Secretary of State will surely know that, when people lose their spouses in middle age, it can take them months to get over it or even to start thinking straight again about their future. His comments about those who will be over 55 in 2001 suggest that such people may take much longer than six months to start making new plans. Would it not be sensible for the bereavement allowance to last some years rather than some months?

Mr. Darling: I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman on that point. The period for which an allowance should run is always a matter of judgment. We took the view that six months would be a suitable period to allow someone to adapt to changed circumstances. Almost as many women work as men; the situation is now very different from 50 years ago, when very few women worked after marriage. All the experience shows that women wanting to return to work want to do so rather sooner than after a period of several years.

The hon. Gentleman asked why the lump sum cannot be introduced now. The proposals are part of a package. Following an exchange that one of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues had with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister during Prime Minister's Question Time, I must tell the Liberal Democrats that, at some point, they have to square up to the fact that all these things have to be paid for. This is a coherent package of reform.

I am grateful for the general welcome that the hon. Gentleman has given to a number of the specific proposals. The hon. Gentleman asked whether there will be an earnings-related element. I was not quite sure exactly what he was getting at. The widows payment is taxable now. If he is concerned about the state earnings-related pension scheme, he will see that the details are spelled out in the consultation paper. However, SERPS continues for the parents allowance.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North): I welcome the Government's search for a modern approach to this important issue on widows, widowers and bereavement. I welcome particularly those parts of the package that do not rely on means-testing. There are some useful ideas about targeting resources without recourse to the means test.

I put it to the Secretary of State that, over the past 20 years, a number of ad hoc policy reforms have touched on the national insurance system, yet, paradoxically, we have never had a serious debate about the future of national insurance and the contributory principle in this country. We have to find a means of holding that serious debate about a national insurance system based on the principle that people contribute to the community chest when they can, and draw out, as of right, when they need to do so. Given the new issues such as how we fund long-term care and perhaps pay for parental leave, surely we need a debate to see whether a renaissance of the social insurance principle could be the future of social security if we are to avoid the increasing move towards the nastiness and division of the means test.

Mr. Darling: As my hon. Friend knows more than most, the benefits system in this country is complex. The contributory system sits alongside means-tested payments for extra costs and so on. I suspect that most people going along to the Benefits Agency will ask not about the origin of the payment but about how much they will get and the conditions of entitlement. I agree that this matter ought to be debated and I know that a number of hon. Members would like such a debate. By good luck, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House is sitting next to me, and she will no doubt be pencilling in a date as we speak. It is a serious debate in which I intend to engage before too long.

The Government approach this as a matter of principle. In general terms, first, we want to ensure that we encourage all those who can work to do so and, secondly, we want to provide security for those who cannot. In each case, particularly where we want to provide greater security, we must ask ourselves how we can best get money to those who need it most. This afternoon's announcement goes a long way to meeting some of the gaps in need that have existed before. I believe that income-related benefits will remain part of the system for some time to come. They are important, particularly for the low-paid. I shall be happy to have a general debate; I am sure that some hon. Members cannot wait, but I suspect that others possibly can.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove): Can the Secretary of State explain why it is fair to take away widows benefit from widows without dependent children when they have incredibly modest means but not sufficiently modest to be able to qualify for income support while, at the same time—if I understand the Secretary of States's announcement—proposing to give benefit to other widows and widowers who may have been left a substantial amount by their dead spouse?

Mr. Darling: My proposal is that we continue to help the surviving parent and children. What is more, we want to extend that help to men with young children who do not get a penny under the present system. For those without children, the widow and widowers pension should be payable for a transitional period of six months because we believe that that is a reasonable time to adjust. I repeat my earlier point that I find it difficult to justify the current situation where, in many cases, we are paying benefit for years to people who do not need it while not doing nearly enough for others, particularly those with young children. I should have thought that the hon. Lady would support that, rather than defending the status quo, which most people find it difficult to defend.

Audrey Wise (Preston): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is absurd for the Tories to complain about means-testing, which is their favourite tool? By the same token, we have to be cautious about making it a tool of ours. I offer my warm congratulations to my right hon. Friend on the extension of the principle of benefits to widowers for the first time, which is a good move. However, I wish to express my concern and ask for more information about the position of older widows. My right hon. Friend referred to the fact that many women now work, but he did not mention that they are still congregated in low-paid, temporary or part-time work or that the gender gap in wages is widening. Will he give more thought to, and explain, the plight in which older widows may be left by his proposals?

Mr. Darling: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her welcome for many of the proposals. Low wages for women generally, and older women in particular, will be helped by the minimum wage. It is more difficult to take account of women aged 55 and older when changing the structure of the system, but we want to ensure that those on income support are no worse off after the changes.

[Mr. Darling]

In other words, we wish to safeguard the position of that older generation of women who are probably less likely to be in work than younger women because of the changes in working habits.

My hon. Friend makes a good point about means-testing. I am not sure whether the Conservatives have now come out against means-testing as part of their strategy, but we will wait and see. Today, we have introduced a disregard of £10 for the poorest widows and widowers to ensure that they get a benefit from the widows and widowers payments that they do not currently get. That is a similar move to ones that we have made for other benefits, and it means that the poorest will keep the benefit of £10 a week. That will be welcome.

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): May I seek the Minister's confirmation? In the simplest terms, he appeared to say that the widows pension will be abolished for those under 45, whether men or women, if they are widowed in the future; there will be a more generous payment on bereavement; there will be a payment for six months; and otherwise they will need to rely on income support and other child allowances. That seemed to be the essence of his statement.

The role of men and women in our society may have more overlap than before, and both may work, but there are still significant differences. Because women generally have a lower earning power and many break their careers to have families, a system of benefits for those who are widowed that is precisely equal for men and women is not entirely suitable. Indeed, most women will feel that it is unfair, given the patterns of employment and different responsibilities of men and women.

Mr. Darling: I am becoming increasingly puzzled about the Conservatives' position on these matters. Over the years, patterns have changed and the work force is now almost half made up of women, thanks in many ways to the reforms that we are introducing. The difficulties of low pay are being addressed, and many women have successful careers and have chosen to work throughout their lives. The benefits system must reflect that. The hon. Gentleman should remember that the system was introduced in the 1940s, when most women did not work. When Beveridge drew up the plan, it was never the intention that people should remain on benefit when they could be working.

I believe strongly that the benefits system must change to take account of completely different economic and social circumstances. I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's argument; he seems on the one hand to argue for the status quo, but on the other to display a new-found sympathy for the low-paid. I cannot understand such an attitude from the Conservative party, which has spent a lifetime fostering lack of such sympathy.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): My right hon. Friend knows that I represent part of north-east England where working class men die younger than in any other part of England. Is he telling me that, as a result of the changes that he proposes, a woman partner of one of those working men who is left a small quantity of savings or a small works pension that still accrues to them after her husband's working life will be completely excluded from all long-term bereavement benefits unless her savings and income are reduced to the bare income support level? If he is saying that, I urge him to think again.

Mr. Darling: I am not saying that. All bereaved husbands or wives will be entitled to an allowance for the six-month period. Those with children will receive the allowance for a lot longer. Those who are dependent on or entitled to benefits will receive them. My hon. Friend must face the fact that nearly 40 per cent. of women who currently receive the benefit are in the top half of the income bracket. Others are working and earning quite good wages. I am determined to ensure that bereavement benefits bring help to those who most need it. That is what the reforms are designed to do.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): Can the Secretary of State say at what level of earnings a widow or a widower who has children will begin to lose benefit under his new proposals?

Mr. Darling: If the hon. Gentleman cares to consult the various income support tables that we publish each year, he will be able to find that level easily.

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North): I welcome the statement, particularly the £10 disregard on income support and the doubling of the lump sum. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, contrary to reports, the new bereavement allowance will not be means-tested? Will he confirm, too, that the generous current contributing conditions for the lump sum will remain the same?

Mr. Darling: The contributory conditions will not be affected, and the benefit will not be means-tested.

Mr. Chris Pond (Gravesham): Does my right hon. Friend realise that many of us share his puzzlement that the Opposition now oppose means testing, and champion the national insurance principle? Does he recall that, when the previous Government made the change from unemployment benefit to jobseeker's allowance—a major breach of the national insurance principle—they changed the signing-on rules so that those who had previously not worked for 10 years and were aged 50 or over would not have to sign on, but those in that position after 1996 would have to do so? Can he clarify whether those bereaved in later life will be required to sign on?

Mr. Darling: It is the case that, as a result of reforms introduced by the Conservatives, widows had to sign on a week after losing their husbands. As a result of my proposals, at their introduction women aged over 55 will not have to sign on for work, because I do not think it reasonable that they should have to do so.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): May I refer briefly to a constituency case that touches on the Secretary of State's statement? A woman in my constituency was widowed about four weeks ago. She is in her mid-50s, and her husband was in his late 50s. She receives about £60 a week in bereavement allowance, and she works eight hours a week as a cleaner. She would like to work more to supplement her diminished income, but fears that she cannot do so because her widows allowance will be reduced for every hour she works or every pound she earns. Is that correct; if it is, does the Secretary of State's statement remedy her situation?

Mr. Darling: If the hon. and learned Gentleman would care to write to me, I will look into that case. If the situation is as he described, it occurs under the system that we inherited. His constituent ought to be receiving £64 a week, which is a taxable benefit, and it is not clear how she is losing the benefit to which he referred, but I will look into the case if he writes to me.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): After the complexities of the transitional period are out of the way, how many more people than at present does the Secretary of State estimate will face means tests?

Mr. Darling: Again, Conservative Members are expressing concerns about the means test, which many Labour Members find extraordinary. Using a variety of measures, such as the new deal and the single gateway, we are ensuring that as many people as possible have the opportunity to work rather than be reliant on benefits. I repeat my earlier point that many women work at present and many more are choosing to work, and we propose to make it easier for them to do so.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): Will the Secretary of State clarify whether existing widows will benefit from the proposals? I had a telephone call two weeks ago from a constituent who is on benefits because he had been caring for his wife. She died, and he had a visit from the Benefits Agency for the sole purpose of tearing up her benefit books. He asked me angrily, "How can I pay for the funeral and live with my two kids on £117 a week?" I hope that, following the statement, I can ring him and give him good news. Will the Secretary of State tell me whether I can do so?

Mr. Darling: The proposal is that, from the implementation date of the changes, widowers will be treated in exactly the same way as widows, so that we avoid a situation in future where bereaved women receive the widows allowance and lump sum for themselves and their children, but men do not.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): May I follow on the questions asked by the Secretary of State's colleagues, the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and the hon. Members for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks) and for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins)? The right hon. Gentleman knows that, since the Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act 1925, widows pensions have been based firmly on the contributory principle. Will he therefore confirm that the proposal is a decisive shift away from that principle towards means testing, and tell the House how that will foster a responsible society?

Mr. Darling: That is a bit rich from the Conservative party, which spent almost a quarter of a generation trying to undermine the contributory principle. The benefits remain contributory. The proposals are not a move towards means-testing. The hon. Gentleman ought to be aware that, during the past 50 years, many changes have been made to the widows benefits regime and to the contributory principle. In many cases, we are extending the benefits that in the past were not available to men and increasing the lump sum. We are determined to ensure that those benefits are modernised to meet the needs of today's society. To say that no change is necessary, and ignore injustices, is absolutely crazy.

Caroline Flint (Don Valley): I very much welcome my right hon. Friend's statement, particularly because it addresses the changing roles for men and women in our society. Some of the inequalities, such as low pay, that women face today are caused by the fact that there is still an assumption that they are earning pin money to keep the family going. That is not the case. Many women in my constituency are the only breadwinner in their family. I welcome the policy because—I hope that my right hon. Friend will reassure me on this point—it addresses the changing roles of men and women, particularly the parenting role of the father. For too long, child care and domestic and family roles have been seen as women's burdens, and the proposals are part of the means of beginning to challenge that.

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend is right on the latter point, that fathers and mothers should play a greater role in bringing up their children. Perhaps some of us have further to go than others.

On my hon. Friend's general point, the Government's whole strategy on welfare to work and reform of the benefits system is to do everything possible to encourage men and women to work and to make work pay, something that the Conservative party opposes.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): I thank the Secretary of State for going one step further than he needed to go. He may have been forced to extend widows benefits to widowers, including those with children, but I thank him for extending them to existing widowers with children. I draw his attention to the case of my constituent, who was widowed earlier this year, has two young children and is struggling to keep a part-time job to pay for child care. If I tell my constituent that he will have to wait two and a half years, he will be desperate. Must the package take two and a half years to be introduced? Could it not be introduced in even one and a half years?

Mr. Darling: The measure is part of a package. It will not be possible to implement the package before April 2001. It is always tempting to implement one part while delaying another, but the measure must be seen as part of a coherent package. Whatever the date is, there are bound to be problems either side of it.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for welcoming the fact that, from the implementation date, we will be able to help fathers with young children, even those without mothers now. The hon. Gentleman must accept that all these changes take time. We need primary legislation, and we need to change our systems to enable us to introduce the package. April 2001 is probably the earliest that we can do that.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): Will the right hon. Gentleman clarify a point that builds on the interesting question from the hon. Member for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks)? Is it his intention to put men and women on the same basis? Will the payment of the new six-month bereavement benefit be determined by the level of contribution of the other spouse? If so, how will the Government deal with the question raised by the hon. Member for Preston (Audrey Wise), as contributions from wives are likely to be less than contributions from husbands? [Interruption.] Almost certainly. The hon. Member for Preston has a great deal of experience of these matters and knows what she is talking about. How will the right hon. Gentleman deal with that shortfall? Will there be a mechanism to equate the level of pension that husbands and wives receive?

Mr. Darling: As I said earlier, this is a contributory benefit. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. He wants to defend the status quo, and now he is asking for a slight change in the contributory benefits system. Far more women now make contributions than was ever expected 50 years ago.

Personal Statement (Paymaster General)

4.16 pm

The Paymaster General (Mr. Geoffrey Robinson): Madam Speaker, I am taking the earliest opportunity available to me to apologise to the House for the late registration of my ownership of Stenbell Ltd., and the directorships of Agie UK between 1984 and 1987 and Transtec plc between 1987 and 1990. I have apologised in writing to the Committee on Standards and Privileges, and have amended my entry in the register to include Roll Center Inc., which I owned between February 1988 and January 1992.

The House will want to be assured that these shareholdings and directorships were matters of public record. No attempt was made by me at any time to use my position in this House to advance any commercial interest. The oversight concerning registration, for which I apologise, is entirely my responsibility.

BILL PRESENTED

FINANCIAL SERVICES (ETHICAL, &C. CONSIDERATIONS)

Mr. Tony Colman presented a Bill to require the Financial Services Authority to issue guidance to persons authorised to provide financial services regarding advice to be given to clients: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed [Bill 264].

Freedom of Information

4.17 pm

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to extend the right of access to information held by public authorities; and for connected purposes.

A freedom of information Bill is long overdue and much needed, as the role and complexities of Government are increased, particularly with the growth of the new technologies. The promise of such a Bill is one of the few promises to have endured in Labour manifestos since 1974, and it is yet to be realised. It survives there because, apart from the fact that it is supported by the overwhelming majority of my hon. Friends and many hon. Members throughout the Chamber, the concept has the endorsement of the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister stated that in the introduction to the White Paper that was prepared for my right hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). My right hon. Friend was a principal architect of the White Paper, and many of us would have liked to see him pilot through the legislation and realise that election promise by getting it on to the statute book as a Government Bill. However, I am pleased that he is in his place today. His presence, together with that of other hon. Members, underlines the fact that there is widespread support for a freedom of information Bill across the political spectrum. That support is also reflected by the sponsors of the Bill, which I shall publish today.

We desperately need to change the public service culture on the keeping of records and public access to such records. My Bill would make it a presumption that all records held by public bodies could, and should, be available for public access and scrutiny. The legislation draws upon the experience and the statutes of other jurisdictions, such as the United States, the Netherlands, Sweden, the Republic of Ireland, Canada, Australia and New Zealand. It defines "records" as any written or printed document, any plan, map, photograph, tape or electronic record.

The Bill does not exclude the security services, the police or the Crown Prosecution Service from its scope. It is right that we should not jeopardise their role in detecting crime and determining who should be prosecuted and the means of prosecution. The defence of the realm should not be put in jeopardy. My Bill would introduce safeguards to guarantee that those important functions were not impeded in any way. However, I believe that it is quite wrong that there should be a blanket exemption for the services to which I have referred.

Many members of the public will welcome the fact that the Bill's provisions would apply to the former publicly owned industries that are now in private hands, which enjoy a monopoly or near-monopoly. I have in mind industries such as water, gas, electricity and so on. The spirit of the Bill is one not of compulsion, but change: we want to change attitudes and encourage the holders of public records to prepare now to make them available. We want to reassure them that any reasonable custodian of such records would have nothing to fear from the fact that the public would have access to them.

Whenever there was disagreement, mediation would be the key. My Bill envisages that every Ministry, public agency, or former public utility that is now in private ownership would designate a senior person to listen to the arguments of those seeking access, and of any agency refusing to grant access by claiming that the disclosure of information would cause substantial harm. We hope that the resolution of such differences would be dealt with in house, but, as a fall-back position, a new information commissioner would be appointed. He would have the status of a judge, and the power to demand access to documents and to reach some conclusion. He would also be able to issue instructions as to what documents could, and should, be made available.

"Reasonableness" is the key word throughout the Bill. That includes reasonableness in the cost of access. We will not tolerate any abuse of the right of access. However, the Bill also ensures that individuals with few resources who were trying to fight the big battalions—perhaps they opposed some motorway scheme or a proposal that adversely affected their businesses—would not be disadvantaged by cost. Charges would be very modest, but there would be safeguards against those who might seek to abuse the system. In addition, the legislation ensures that the disclosure of public records would not place a disproportionate additional burden on the public purse. I re-emphasise that I want a culture whereby our Ministries and agencies prepare documents and records in such a way that they can be made available at minimal cost and with least delay.

Obviously there would be tests for disclosure. The primary test would be the public interest, and exemptions would be justified only where the people resisting the disclosure of information could show that substantial harm would be done to the public interest. I make no apology for reminding the House of recent scandals: the BSE scandal; the Bristol royal infirmary scandal, in which people should have been given information a lot earlier; and the plight of, and distress experienced by, many people in respect of Gulf war syndrome—in all those cases, there was a failure to grant access to information, and to recognise that there were problems.

The history of all those shameful parts of our recent history would have been different had such a measure been on the statute book. Most related to the previous Administration. However, I am disappointed that, when I asked my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister a parliamentary question about the dates on which the Cabinet has met since the general election, I was not able to have that information. That underlines how we must change the culture of government and of people who advise Ministers. Why on earth cannot such information be made available?

I draw strength and support from the Prime Minister himself. Addressing the Campaign for Freedom of Information, he said:

> "It is not some isolated constitutional reform that we are proposing with a Freedom of Information Act. It is a change that is absolutely fundamental to how we see politics developing in this country over the next few years."

I acknowledge the bottleneck for legislative time, but I say to my right hon. Friends that placing such a Bill on the statute book could be a great benchmark for the radicalism of the Government and, indeed, this Parliament, in which we are all privileged to serve. The Bill would become an enduring Act, which would create new rights and enhance our democracy. I therefore hope that I have the overwhelming support of the House to introduce the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Andrew Mackinlay, Dr. David Clark, Mr. Mark Fisher, Mr. Chris Mullin, Mr. Rhodri Morgan, Mr. Richard Shepherd, Mr. Archy Kirkwood, Ms Roseanna Cunningham, Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, Mr. Martin Bell, Dr. Tony Wright and Mr. Ronnie Campbell.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay accordingly presented a Bill to extend the right of access to information held by public authorities; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Thursday 19 November, and to be printed [Bill 265].

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Speaker shall not adjourn the House until any Messages from the Lords shall have been received.—[Mr. Hanson.]

European Parliamentary Elections Bill

Lords Reasons for insisting on certain of their amendments to which the Commons have disagreed and for disagreeing to the further Commons amendment to the Bill in lieu, considered.

Lords Reason:

The Lords insist on their Amendments in page 2, lines 1, 2, 15 and 18 to which the Commons have disagreed and disagree with the Commons in their Amendment in lieu thereof, for the following Reason:

Because the review proposed by the Commons is not an adequate substitute for an electoral system that allows electors to vote for the individual party candidate of their choice.

4.28 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): I beg to move, That this House insists on its disagreement with the Lords in their Amendments but does not insist on its Amendment in lieu.

I understand that, with this, it will be convenient to discuss the further Government amendment to the Bill in lieu of the Lords amendments, in page 3, line 46, at end insert—

'Review of electoral system

.—(1) The Secretary of State shall appoint one or more persons—

(a) to review, in accordance with subsection (2), the operation of the system of election provided for by section 3 of the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978 as substituted by section 1 of this Act, and

(b) to make a report to the Secretary of State within six months from the day of appointment.

(2) The review shall consider, in particular, how the ability of electors to vote for particular persons on a party's list of candidates might affect the results of an election.

(3) The Secretary of State shall carry out his duty under subsection (1) within one month from the date of the first general election to the European Parliament which takes place after the coming into force of section 1.

(4) The Secretary of State shall lay a copy of any report received under subsection (1)(b) before each House of Parliament.'.

For the second time this week, I find myself at the Dispatch Box, which is always a pleasure, seeking this House's agreement to overturn a vote in the other place on the Bill. I am here because a group of people—whose only claim to sit in the legislature is some action of their forebears—believes that it has the right to impose its will on this democratically elected House.

Since we last discussed the Bill less than 48 hours ago, we have amended the review clause to give statutory effect to my promise last time to consult the Opposition parties about who should undertake the post-election review. That is now, or will be, if the House and the other place agree, in the Bill. In addition, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear at Prime Minister's Question Time, there could also be a role for the independent electoral commission that was proposed by Lord Neill and his colleagues, which has been welcomed by hon. Members on both sides of the House, and on which we hope to legislate as soon as possible.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): We are pleased to hear that the review has been strengthened, and hope that Conservative Members who have said that they enjoy the Neill approach to electoral commissions will be satisfied with that; but I wonder whether the Home Secretary is aware that the Conservative spokesman, Lord Mackay of Ardbrecknish, called for precisely such a review in Committee. I wonder whether the Home Secretary feels that the amendment is now satisfactory in terms of what he knows about what the Conservative peers wanted in June.

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but it was not only in the other place that Conservatives were calling for a review. It is difficult to follow the contortions of the Conservative party on the issue over the past two years. On Monday, the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) said:

"We cannot accept the latest review put forward by the Government."—[Official Report, 16 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 716.]

He added that it was "ludicrous", and criticised us for the fact that we were proposing that the review should cover the merits of the open list as well as the closed list. His comments were more revealing than he thought. They showed how this decrepit Opposition have lurched from one wheeze to another, and are now impaled on the ludicrous and indefensible proposition that hereditary Conservative peers should block the will of this elected House.

Among his other problems, the hon. Member for Hertsmere is suffering from a bout of serious amnesia.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Straw: I shall give way after I have dealt with the hon. Member for Hertsmere.

Here is a man who now says that a review, post the elections next June, is "ludicrous", yet, on 12 March in the House, the same man moved new clause 4 to the Bill. What did that propose? That said that the Secretary of State should establish an independent review of the advantages and disadvantages of the electoral system under the Bill—the closed list system—compared with the open list and first-past-the-post systems, and to do so no sooner than 12 months after the June elections.

That is the same thing as we put before the House on Monday, with one difference: we propose to carry that out within six months; the hon. Member for Hertsmere did not want it to happen until 12 months had elapsed. If he has some explanation of why he has changed his mind, I should be happy to give way to him.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): Certainly. As the Home Secretary will know, we opposed the closed list from the outset, but, on the review, the Home Secretary's own memory is playing a few tricks on him. He will remember that, on Second Reading, he promised to listen to and to look at both sides of the arguments. Since then, he has received no representations in favour of the closed list, but has come down in favour of it. How can we have any confidence in him and his reviews when we have had an experience such as that?

Mr. Straw: If I had been in the hon. Gentleman's position, I would not have made that intervention, because it explained nothing. Of course I have been willing to listen. No one can accuse me of not having listened to the debate. I have sat here for almost every minute of the hours and hours that we have devoted to the issue.

Indeed, I can fairly claim—I think I will have the generous approbation of Opposition Members on this—that, if I have done nothing else during the 35 hours, now, of debate, which is almost a world record, I have made Mr. Victor d'Hondt famous, and greatly contributed to the forthcoming annual Christmas quiz: name 10 famous Belgians. [HON. MEMBERS: "Who are the others?"] Well, four hereditary Tory peers have Belgian origins.

Mr. Lansley: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Straw: I am going to give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment, but let me deal with the hon. Member for Hertsmere.

We had the Second Reading of the Bill on 25 November. I did say that I would listen to the arguments, and I did listen to them. As my record on the Human Rights Bill shows, I believe in listening carefully to the arguments, and, where possible, accepting them, from whatever part of House they come. We were not able to accept the arguments in favour of the open list, for reasons on which—whether the hon. Gentleman likes it or not—I shall expand in a moment; nor were we able to accept the arguments in favour of the Belgian system.

The hon. Gentleman knew all that by 12 March. On 12 March, he tabled new clause 4, which called for a review, not before we introduced the closed list, but after. On Monday, he turned on his head and said that he was not in favour of a review after all.

Mr. Lansley: I recall the same joke about the Belgians being made in the course of those many hours. We are even hearing the same jokes all over again.

Can the Home Secretary recall how many of his Back Benchers, in all those hours, spoke in favour of the closed-list system for next year's elections, and how many spoke in favour of an open list? In fact, all his hon. Friends are opposed to a closed list and in favour of an open list.

Mr. Straw: As ever, the Conservative Opposition spoil their case with exaggeration and invention. It is not true that every Labour Member has spoken with a difference of emphasis—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] I will. The numbers are clear from Hansard, and include my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) in the original debate on 25 November. The proposition was absolutely clear on that day. My hon. Friends the Members for Battersea (Mr. Linton) and for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg) said the same two days ago. Such is the power of the argument we have advanced that we have been massively supported in the Lobbies not only of the House of Commons, but of the other place. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. We must be able to hear the Minister.

Mr. Straw: The Conservative party must face up to what happens once someone is removed from the list.

[Mr. Straw]

The fact that 131 hereditary peers voted in favour of the change to closed lists provides the clearest possible mandate.

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): Is the Home Secretary seriously suggesting that the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) was in favour of the closed list?

Mr. Straw: Yes. I listened to his speech with great interest, and, if he was not in favour of the closed list, he could have voted in the No Lobby.

Mr. David Lock (Wyre Forest): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Straw: I will in a moment. I have some more illuminating remarks to make to Conservative Members first.

Beyond the issue of a review, little has changed since Monday, except that the British people now see more clearly than ever why they were so wise to approve another categorical Labour manifesto commitment—the commitment to remove the right of hereditary peers to sit and vote in the House of Lords. The more the public see of them, the stronger they make the case for abolition.

On the one o'clock news on the BBC, we witnessed the risible spectacle of the fourth Baron Ampthill—a Cross Bencher, as it happens—claiming to speak for the British people and British democracy. He, of course, voted with the Conservatives, as nearly all Cross Benchers do. [Interruption.] Thirty Cross Benchers voted on the Tory side—because most of them are Tories—and six voted against.

It was a stunningly difficult case for the fourth Baron Ampthill to make, and it was made no easier by the fact that his main claim to fame is that for four years he was general manager of the co-operative stores to the upper classes, Fortnum and Mason. His great-great-grandfather received the peerage, in 1881, for being no more than British ambassador to the German empire. I ask the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins), or any other Conservative Member, in the 117 years since creation of that barony, what right has Lord Ampthill or any other hereditary peer had to sabotage the decisions of this elected House?

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): I am grateful to the Home Secretary for giving way. While he is being gratuitously offensive to a Member of the other place—first because he earned his living working for a perfectly reputable company; and secondly because an ancestor gave distinguished public service—will he remember that the claim to fame of his noble Friend who has been appointed to lead another place is simply that she is the daughter of a former Labour Prime Minister and was married to a former ambassador?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hawkins: Will the Home Secretary—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will calm down while I am speaking. First, his intervention was too long. Secondly—I tell those on both sides of the House—let us not get into the personalities of the other place.

Mr. Straw: We now have a statement from the hon. Member for Surrey Heath, who speaks for the moderates among Tory Members—God protect us from the rest of them. He is a serious Conservative Member. It is therefore interesting that he is claiming that hereditary peers have the same status—the same right to sit and to vote in the other place—as those who are appointed on their own merits. I note that, and file it.

I was casting no aspersions on Lord Ampthill, except to say that I find it risible that he was claiming to speak on behalf of the people of the United Kingdom. It is important to examine the background not of individuals who are currently in the other place but of those who were "elected" there initially. The 26th Baron of Mowbray, Segrave and Stourton—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The House will have heard what you said about not dealing with personalities. If that applies to Conservative Members, may we assume that it applies also to Labour Members and to the Home Secretary?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. Members on both sides of the House will have heard what I said. May I tell the Home Secretary that it does not help to talk about the personalities of individual office holders. We should be temperate in our language. I also tell hon. Members that I want to hear the Home Secretary. He is a very nice Home Secretary, and I want to hear him, but I have not been able to.

Mr. Straw: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I note that I had only to read out the name—the fact that he is the 26th Baron. That is all I said about him.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Straw: They rise to the point. I shall give way to the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan). I should like to know whether he is making the same point as the hon. Member for Surrey Heath—that hereditary peers have the same right as life peers to sit in the other place, and that those who are appointed on the merit of some long-dead forebear have the same right in the other place as those who are appointed on their own merit. Is that the point?

Mr. Robathan: I am grateful to the Home Secretary. I shall not talk about personalities, but simply ask whether the Home Secretary believes that one criterion for being Lord Chancellor, for example, might be having been the Prime Minister's pupil master, or that one criterion for being appointed Solicitor-General might be having shared a flat with the Prime Minister?

Mr. Straw: There is a serious point to make, which is that people on both sides in the other place who are appointed as life peers are appointed on their own merit. Although the hon. Gentleman may disagree about who is appointed—as we sometimes disagreed about appointments by Conservative Prime Ministers—there is a profound difference between those who are appointed on their own merit, however much that may be challenged, and those who are there simply because of the actions or claims of their long-dead forebears.

As I reminded the House on Monday, the great Tom Paine, whom the Tory party at the end of the 18th century was trying to have locked up, and who had to go off to America, said, in a phrase that is as right today as it was then:

"The idea of hereditary legislators is as inconsistent as that of hereditary judges, as hereditary juries; and as absurd as an hereditary mathematician, or an hereditary wise man; as absurd as an hereditary Poet Laureate."

Mr. William Cash (Stone) rose—

Mr. Straw: I have given way a lot. I just want to make a couple more points.

Mr. Cash rose—

Mr. Straw: Well, if the hon. Gentleman wants to ask me about Tom Paine, I shall give way.

Mr. Cash: The Home Secretary is making an analogy with the 18th century. Does he not think that the new system that the Government are devising for replacing the hereditary peers is going back to the 18th century? Instead of rotten boroughs, he will be creating rotten peers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are not debating the replacement or removal of peers. [Interruption.] Order. I am stating to everyone in the House that that is not what we are debating, and everyone on both sides will have to listen.

4.45 pm

Mr. Straw: We are not replicating a system that existed in the 18th century, for one incontrovertible reason, which will be acknowledged by hon. Members on both sides: Mr. Victor d'Hondt was not born until the 19th century, and without him none of this would have been possible.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) rose—

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) rose—

Mr. Straw: I shall give way to the two hon. Gentlemen, then I shall get on.

Sir Peter Tapsell: I should like to bring the Home Secretary back from the 18th century to 1998, and back from personalities to the constitution, which he, as Home Secretary, is partly responsible for protecting. We rightly hear a great deal from him about the need to protect the rule of law in this country. Whatever may happen to the House of Lords in the next Session of Parliament, for the moment the law of the land says that hereditary peers have the same voting rights in the upper House as life peers. It is not open to the Home Secretary to change the constitution by diktat.

Mr. Straw: It is certainly not open to me to change the constitution by diktat, and I should not have the impertinence to try to do so. The creator of modern so-called Villa Conservatism—Lord Salisbury—devised the Salisbury doctrine in the late 1880s, recognising the right of an elected House of Commons to meet its manifesto commitments. We have an unwritten constitution, so there is nothing in tablets of stone and no formal basic law that describes the powers of the other place or this House. We are dealing with carefully crafted conventions.

One of the most important conventions, which has kept a balance between this House and the other place, is that established by a distinguished former Conservative Prime Minister and party leader. Those on the Conservative Front Bench, and the other place, are seeking to destroy that convention.

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope that this is a point of order.

Mr. Cash: It is indeed a point of order. It is about the application of conventions in this House. The Home Secretary has just alleged that there was a Labour manifesto commitment on this issue. That is not the case—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman catches my eye, he may be able to rebut the Home Secretary's argument, but it is not for me to worry about what the Home Secretary says.

Mr. Straw: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady), and then I shall get on.

Mr. Brady: I apologise if I spoil the Home Secretary's fun by returning the debate to its theme. Instead of discussing the House of Lords, perhaps he could consider the difference between the democratic legitimacy of someone elected as a candidate standing in an open election and that of someone who is elected simply because the leader of his party put him at the top of a list.

Mr. Straw: I shall come to that.

We would not be holding these debates were it not for the fact that the other place has sent the issue back to us for the fourth time. Our manifesto commitment was clear—to introduce a proportional system of representation for the European Parliament. As with any party's manifesto, we did not set out every last detail, on that or anything else. That is a verity for all parties.

The closed-list system is used by more voters than any other system in Europe. Moreover, as I shall remind Conservative Members at greater length in a moment, it is a system that their own party used in the 12 months before the general election. They might therefore have spotted that it was the system most likely to be used.

[Mr. Straw]

I know of no Conservative candidate—I shall be happy to give way if there is one—who, whether he or she won or lost a seat at the general election, raised the issue of what kind of list system we should use for the European elections. Everybody understood what we intended to do.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) rose—

Mr. Straw: I shall not give way; I have already given way many times.

The other place asked us to think again, yet it has offered us no new arguments to support that request. I have studied carefully what was said there. Yesterday's debate was notable for an excellent speech by the former Labour Prime Minister, Lord Callaghan, who made the important point that no electoral system is perfect, but that the open-list system contains within it, as I have shown, the possibility—indeed, the likelihood—of perverse results. My noble Friend also exposed the Conservative party's tactics for what they are—nothing to do with principle, and everything to do with opportunism.

Another notable aspect of the debate in the other place was what was not said. No new arguments in support of open lists were advanced, and no attempt was made to justify the perverse results that they can produce, or to say how those would be explained to a bemused electorate.

I shall spell the problem out, because I do not believe that Conservative Members properly understand what would happen. In the other place, the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman, Lord MacKay of Ardbrecknish, said that he accepted that, under the open-list system, someone might be elected despite having received fewer votes than someone else on another party list. I take that admission as an important sign that, at long last, the penny has dropped a little with at least some of the supporters of the fundamentally flawed so-called open system.

The noble Lord then spoiled his argument by saying that such an outcome, whereby someone could lose but win, and someone else could win but lose, happens all the time under first past the post—when, he added, one compares one constituency with another.

It is an obvious truth that that may happen when we compare one constituency with another. I cannot quite remember how many votes I got at the general election, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because there were so many, but it was a lot. Other people may have got more votes and lost—but that would have been in another constituency. Nobody in the House was elected having received fewer votes than somebody else in the same constituency. Yet that is the proposition being supported—

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Straw: No. I want the hon. Gentleman to listen, if he does not mind. If he pays attention, I may consider giving way to him later.

Conservative Members have not yet properly understood the point that I have just made. We are talking not about a comparison between votes cast in different electoral areas, but about votes cast in the same electoral area.

For example, one of the candidates for one of the parties—let us assume that that person is the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler)—may be so well known, in the west midlands, say, that he has got near the top of the list, or even right at the top. Everybody wants to vote for him, and few people want to vote for anyone else in the multi-member constituency. The right hon. Gentleman will get most of the votes, and the other Conservative candidates will get very few. In the other parties, the votes are more evenly distributed, and all the other candidates in the other parties get more votes than the second, third, fourth and fifth Conservative candidates. This point can be reversed.

Under the so-called open, or personal system—and because of the high vote that the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield got—the result would be that people who received more votes than the second, third and fourth Conservative candidates would not get elected, and the people who got fewer votes than them would get elected. I suggest to Opposition Members that that would be an extraordinary and perverse result. What I have said is accurate, and has been acknowledged by Lord Mackay of Ardbrecknish. All he could say is that that happens under first past the post—when it does not.

Mr. Brazier: In trying to make his case that one system of PR is even worse than another, could I ask the Home Secretary to recall in a few months the remark that he made a moment ago—that the great merit of the existing system is that you cannot be defeated by a candidate who gets fewer votes than you, which, of course, would disappear if alternative voting were introduced, as Lord Jenkins has recommended?

Mr. Straw: It might disappear because of some other things that Lord Jenkins may propose, but not because of the alternative vote. Under that system in single-member constituencies, the only person who can conceivably be elected is the person who receives the most votes. [Interruption.] I know we are talking about second or third preferences, but it is still the person who pops up at the top. Of course I understand that. It is no good the Conservatives getting angry about it. I am not arguing for the alternative vote system, but, under the system advocated by the Conservatives, there would be the most extraordinary results from the so-called open list, which is scarcely an open list at all.

If there were five vacancies under a true open list in a multi-member constituency, the voters would be given five votes. They might be given five votes as crosses to allocate equally, or five votes to allocate in order of preference. Under the Conservative system—which, I suggest, is only dimly understood by Conservative Members—voters in the five-member constituency would be given not five votes, but one vote, so that they could vote for only one candidate of their choice. Having voted for one candidate of their choice, they would trigger the operation of a list.

We are, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has spelt out, trying to save the Conservative party from itself in this endeavour. The Conservative party is saying that people will have a choice, but they will have nothing of the kind—except the oddest kind of choice, in which five vacancies have to share one single vote.

In contrast to the extraordinarily complicated system that the Conservatives are proposing, with the serious and perverse result that the winners lose and the losers win—a system which can best be described as last past the post—there is the closed-list system. The great merit of the closed-list system is that the voters know exactly what they will get. They vote for the list as a whole, and they choose which team they wish to support.

Mr. Martin Bell (Tatton): Speaking as the only Cross Bencher in this place—although I am not allowed to speak from the Cross Benches—can I wonder whether the British, as a free people, should not be voting for individuals rather than a party slate?

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman is the exception in this House that proves the rule. He stood as an independent candidate without a party.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The Labour party backed him. [Laughter.]

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend also makes my point, and I am deeply grateful to him—as ever. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Bell) may have had Labour party backing, but he stood as an independent. The people of Tatton had a choice between a Conservative candidate, who happened to be named Hamilton, and an independent candidate—the hon. Gentleman.

All the rest of us, who carry party labels, came here as party candidates on closed lists of one. [Interruption.] It is no good Conservative Members complaining about that, because it is the truth, for the following reason.

It is easy to devise a system in which voters have a choice of party, but are also given a choice of candidate for that party—some systems of that sort exist in the United States. The ballot paper would offer a choice of, for example, the Labour, the Liberal Democrat and Conservative parties, which would determine which party won, but it would also offer a choice of, say, three Liberal Democrat, Conservative or Labour candidates. Therefore, the primary takes place on the same day.

No party in the Westminster Parliament operates that system. Each selects its own candidate and presents the electorate with a single, closed list: one party, one candidate. So the principle that we are dealing with for the European elections is the same principle under which everyone in the House, bar the hon. Member for Tatton, has been elected.

5 pm

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Straw: No. If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I have already given way a great deal.

Nor was any attempt made in the other place to answer the point made by the Conservative Lord Bethell—no friend of this Government—that Members and aspiring Members of the European Parliament would be known only to a tiny minority of the electorate, and that choices made between them would inevitably involve much randomness. I remind the House that the noble Lord said in a letter to The Daily Telegraph, which was published on Monday:

"I wonder, though, if the Conservatives want the elections to be fought on the fully 'open list' system. If so"— this is a warning that Conservative Members would do well to note—

"they will run into problems. The open list offers a choice so wide as to be confusing, especially since hardly any of the several hundred candidates whose names will be put forward have any public profile. Ballot papers will carry 50 or more names. Hardly anyone will know of them. Voters will mark their crosses at random."

The arguments for the closed list are simple and persuasive. It is an easy system to use, it removes the need for randomness, and for possibly discriminatory choices, and it does not have the potential for anomalous results. It is used in five other major European countries: Germany, Greece, France, Spain and Portugal, whose people are just as committed to the principles of democracy as we are.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): What has that to do with us?

Mr. Straw: The hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) asks what Europe has to do with us—

Mr. Alan Johnson (Hull, West and Hessle): It has very little to do with her.

Mr. Straw: Well, I understand her xenophobia, even though I do not share it.

I have never supported the proposition that, just because something happens in Europe, we should follow it, and I do not think that anyone supports it. However, the people of Germany, Greece, France, Spain and Portugal are just as committed to the principle of democracy as we are. They have been ready to accept the system. It has worked, and there have been no complaints about its fairness there.

I would also point out, in particular to the hon. Lady, but also to her hon. Friends, that she may have forgotten—those on the Conservative Front Bench have plainly forgotten it, but we have not—that the closed-list system was exactly the system that the Conservative Government used two years ago. [Interruption.] It is no good groaning about it. I know that Conservative Members do not want to be reminded of any of their history, but the closed-list system—

Mrs. Gorman: The right hon. Gentleman is being insulting.

Mr. Straw: I am not insulting the hon. Lady, but I will be happy to give way to her.

Mrs. Gorman: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way. Notwithstanding the fact that the right hon. Gentleman is substituting rhetoric for argument, I have stated in this House, and will do so again, that I do not particularly admire European systems. On examination, one realises that, over the centuries, they have produced unstable Governments or dictatorships, whereas our system of first past the post has guaranteed a democratic system under which this Government have flourished.

Mr. Straw: Those countries use modern systems, which have not produced what the hon. Lady suggests.

The Conservative Government introduced the closed-list system only two years ago. The system that the Tories now say raises a fundamental principle of democracy is the very one that the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), described as "fair and balanced"; he said that it would produce "a representative outcome".

As became obvious to all who heard the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield on Monday, there was really no way out of that box. All he could come up with was that the former Prime Minister had decided to use the system because of the "special circumstances" of Northern Ireland. The principal special circumstance was the creation of a path to democratic government in the Province.

Are we seriously being asked to believe that the former Prime Minister chose the closed list notwithstanding the fact that he believed at the time that it was an anti-democratic system? Of course he did not. He chose it because, as he said, it was fair, balanced, and representative; he also chose it for all its other merits of simplicity, which the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) spelled out at the time.

Over and above the arguments for the change, a simple, stark fact stands out. On each of the four occasions when the Government were defeated in another place, the outcome of the vote would have been different without the votes of the hereditary peers. Last night, the Labour Government achieved one of their highest votes ever for any of their legislation. A clear majority of those—from all parties and none—who were appointed to the other place on their own merit, voted for the closed list. Only the votes of the hereditaries—including 103 Conservative hereditaries—who are in the other place not on account of their own merit, but through the chance of their birth, defeated the Government's proposal.

The end of the Session is almost upon us. The Government remain committed to the electoral system in the Bill. If the other place persists in its stance, it must do so in the knowledge that it will cause the Bill to fall in this Session. The Government will have failed to achieve one of their manifesto commitments because of the obstruction of another place—a clear breach of the doctrine established by Lord Salisbury, the great-grandfather of the current Leader of the Opposition in another place.

Both on the merits of the issue, and on the constitutional principle, the House of Commons is right. I ask it to send the clearest possible message to the other place.

Sir Norman Fowler: The Home Secretary has spoken on this matter four times, but his case is becoming significantly weaker and more threadbare. He has again set out the range of arguments that he used first time round. He keeps quoting Lord Bethell, but Lord Bethell said in the debate in the House of Lords last night:

> "I know that we cannot have a closed list, which is abominable. My noble Friend on the Front Bench is quite right."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 17 November 1998; Vol. 594, c. 1139.]

The Home Secretary cites as support among Conservative peers someone who regards the closed list as abominable.

The Home Secretary is wrong in all his arguments. Moreover, many people will object to the arguments that he directed against named hereditary peers; those arguments will do neither his cause nor his reputation any credit, especially as—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) should listen. One of the noble Lords who has consistently voted for the Government is Lord Warner, who was sent to the House of Lords for no reason other than the fact that he was the Home Secretary's special adviser. We shall not take lectures from the Home Secretary on this issue. As for Cross Benchers—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Whip must be quiet.

Sir Norman Fowler: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Home Secretary ignores the argument about Cross Benchers and says that they normally vote with the Conservative party. Historically, that is rubbish. In the previous Parliament they voted almost consistently against the Conservative party. Cross Benchers' votes show that anyone who considers the issue from an independent point of view comes out against the Government's proposition.

The Prime Minister calls the position that we are in an affront to democracy. The true affront to democracy is to have a closed list, which denies the public the right to choose a candidate; to put power in the hands, not of the electorate, but of the party bosses; and to force this measure through in spite of all the arguments made, not only by Conservative Members and the House of Lords but, time and time again, by Labour Members.

The Home Secretary says that we have a constitutional problem, but he has no one but himself to blame for the mess that the Government are in. He has ignored all advice and pushed ahead with the closed list. If there is a constitutional problem, he is its author. His handling of the Bill has been an example of blundering incompetence, and all his arguments have been discredited.

The Home Secretary has made it clear that if the debate is lost we will go back to first past the post. I have made it clear that I would prefer that; but that is not the issue. The issue is the form of electoral system that we have under proportional representation. I am tempted to ask the Home Secretary whether his announcement that we will go back to first past the post is a threat or a promise. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Ronnie Campbell, please be quiet.

Mr. Cash: I have found it difficult—in fact, impossible—to vote with my party on this question, because I am so much against the principle of proportional representation, but I congratulate the Opposition on the fact that it looks as though we will go back to first past the post; and thank God for that.

Sir Norman Fowler: I knew that the time would come when my hon. Friend and I would march arm in arm together.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The right hon. Gentleman will know that there are no Conservative Members of the European Parliament from Scotland under first past the post. Has he consulted the Conservative candidates who have been chosen to go on the list for Scotland about the implications for their prospects of what he is doing?

Sir Norman Fowler: If the hon. Gentleman takes any interest in such matters, he will know that we are committed to first past the post. I do not think that he attended any of the other debates on this subject, so he will not have noticed, but I have clearly set out that policy on every occasion.

The Home Secretary says that he is trying to deliver a manifesto pledge. The closed list was not a manifesto pledge. It could not be, because on Second Reading the right hon. Gentleman himself set up a review of a system—the Belgian system or semi-open list—that went wider than the closed list. If everyone knew that we would get a closed list in any event, his review was a complete sham, so why did we waste our time?

The Home Secretary's argument is that everyone in the country secretly knew that the Labour party was pledged to a closed list. That will take a great deal of swallowing. Are we really to believe that Labour went to the polls in 1997 telling the public, "You can have a closed-list system or a semi-open system, but not an open-list system"? That is an absurd proposition.

That proposition was knocked down most conclusively by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who said:

"Is there a mandate for the Bill? No one came up to me during the general election campaign to say, 'Tony, we will vote Labour only if you promise that we cannot vote for an individual candidate in the European elections.' No one said any such thing, and I did not know that that was the policy."—[Official Report, 16 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 685.]

The Home Secretary does not appear to have been very successful in explaining the position to the public, let alone convincing his own side.

The closed list was not a manifesto commitment, so let us forget that nonsense. No more credence should be given to the Home Secretary's argument that the use of the system in 1996 for the Northern Ireland deliberative forum creates a precedent for the Bill. My right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) made it clear at the time that the system was not ideal and was intended to meet the special circumstances of Northern Ireland, and that was the view of the then Leader of the Opposition, who is now the Prime Minister.

Above all, the Home Secretary knows that there are and have been special circumstances in Northern Ireland. I assume that he does not propose to set free terrorists and criminals here in the same way that the Government are doing there. There are fundamental differences. Let us have no more of this nonsense.

5.15 pm

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Gentleman keeps failing to answer a fundamental point. His argument is not based on the merits of whether we had a closed-list or another system in Northern Ireland. He is saying that the closed-list system is anti-democratic: in other words, that it is absolutely beyond the pale for all purposes. Given that strong assertion, why did he support the use of that anti-democratic closed-list system for Northern Ireland?

Sir Norman Fowler: The system is anti-democratic in the way in which it will be used in the European elections. My right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon said:

"I agree with his view that the electoral solution is not ideal."—[Official Report, 21 March 1996; Vol. 274, c. 500.]

The word "his" refers to the view of the then Leader of the Opposition, now the Prime Minister.

Mr. Straw: Does the right hon. Gentleman believe that the use of the closed-list system in Northern Ireland was anti-democratic?

Sir Norman Fowler: It met the special circumstances of Northern Ireland. That is exactly what we have been saying. It is also exactly what the Prime Minister and the previous Prime Minister said.

By far the most significant feature of all our debates on the issue has been the almost total reluctance of Labour Members to speak out in favour of the closed list. As was demonstrated again last Monday, some of the most bitter criticism of the closed-list system comes from the Benches behind the Home Secretary.

On Monday, the Home Secretary claimed "overwhelming support" for the closed list, or what he then began to call the "simple list" system. The Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), who is rather franker on these issues, said:

"It is customary to begin by saying that we have had a good debate. On this occasion, perhaps I will be forgiven for saying that it has been an interesting debate."—[Official Report, 16 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 717.]

By that, he meant that of six Labour Members who spoke and listened in the debate, four abstained from voting. Two thirds of those who spoke could not bring themselves to support the Government in the Lobby, while the two who voted with the Government said that they preferred the open list. They held their noses and voted with the Government.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the fear that grips the Home Secretary is that, if the open list is adopted, people in Manchester, Yorkshire, Birmingham or London who traditionally vote Labour may be tempted to vote for the old-fashioned socialists who have been shuffled off down to the bottom of the list and to reject the new Labour luvvies who have been put at the top of the list by Mandelson towers?

Sir Norman Fowler: My hon. Friend makes a very good point.

Let me remind the House of some of the contributions from Labour Members. They are entirely relevant to what is now being seen as a clash between the Commons and the Lords. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield, who is not exactly a stranger to the debate on the House of Lords and its functions—[Interruption.] If the Minister for Local Government and Housing, the hon. Member for North–West Durham (Ms Armstrong) wishes to intervene, I will be happy to allow her to do so. She was not much good in her previous Department, I cannot believe that she is much good—[Interruption.]

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield said:

"the arguments against the closed-list system are absolutely overwhelming. Indeed, those arguments are the same"—[Interruption.]

[Sir Norman Fowler]

The Home Secretary should listen to this. The Minister for Local Government and Housing will not offer any advice. The right hon. Gentleman said:

"Indeed, those arguments are the same as those arguments against the House of Lords itself for its Members all got in on the closed list. The Prime Minister draws up a little closed list, and puts all its Members into the House of Lords. If we get rid of the hereditary peers, which I would welcome, we shall have nothing but a closed list in the Lords. They will all be the Prime Minister's friends. My objection to the Bill is, therefore, the same as my objection to the House of Lords."

I do not think that even the Home Secretary would regard that as a wholehearted endorsement of his policy. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield does not like hereditary peers, but he seems to like even less the policy of appointees and placemen, which seems to make up Labour's vision of the future—the House of Lords as a giant quango.

In the same debate, the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said:

"It has been suggested that I should regard this as a battle between Lords and Commons, and that I could do myself a bit of good by voting with the Government this time. [Laughter.] Labour Whips do give us helpful advice: that is what they are there for. As Opposition Members are laughing, I want to make it clear that the Labour party is not a party of control freaks—I am authorised to say that . . . I shall leave the Chamber for a little while to commune with destiny . . . I intend to contemplate my vote, eat my sausage and mash, and hope that someone comes down to see me."

I do not know whether anyone went down to see him, but he did not vote for the Government.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) said:

"I feel very strongly about this matter . . . I saw the effect of list systems on the European Parliament and the control that all political parties exercised. I explained time and again—wrongly it now appears—that we would find it difficult to accept that system in Britain, because we had a genuine commitment to a constituency link and we believed that the individual was tremendously important in our system of government. I believe that very strongly."—[Official Report, 16 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 684-705.]

The hon. Lady also abstained.

Let no one think that the debate on Monday was in any way exceptional. The advantage of having so many debates on the same issue is that it has been possible to see the trend in the argument. The cast of Labour Back Benchers may change, but the arguments against the closed list are basically the same. In the debate on 27 October, the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) said, quite bluntly:

"I am not in favour of the closed-list system. I did not vote for it on Second Reading and I do not intend to vote for it tonight."—[Official Report, 27 October 1998; Vol. 318, c. 196.]

On 10 November, the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) was equally blunt when he said:

"the closed-list system allows fixers to get their way, which is the real reason why I oppose it."

Those are some of the Labour Members who have spoken against the measure. Labour Member after Labour Member has opposed the system. They have opposed the transfer of power to the party organisation, and I suspect that, for every one who has spoken, there are dozens of others who echo those feelings.

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that a further deficit in the closed-list system is that in no circumstances can there ever be a by-election?

Sir Norman Fowler: That is true. It is just another of the issues involved.

We then get to the desperate defence from the Home Secretary. He recognises that the balance of the argument in this debate has been against him. He would have to be blind and deaf not to recognise that. He says, "Labour Members voted for us, you know." We must ask why so many Labour Members voted for a system in which they do not believe. The answer was given by the hon. Member for Wrexham in the debate on 10 November. He said:

"My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) argued, with good grounds, that there was no majority in favour of the closed-list system in the parliamentary Labour party. Yet, he also argued that the Government would have a large majority tonight. I ask the House to think about that contradiction. If there is no majority in the Labour party but the system is such that the Whips and the Patronage Secretary can dragoon Members through the Lobby—and I admit that I will be dragooned when the time comes—what legitimacy does the elected Chamber have in comparison with the unelected Chamber whose Members may, by and large, vote according to their own judgment on the right course of action for the country?"—[Official Report, 10 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 226-29.]

That is a good question. Surely it is the question that we should be asking. This is a voting system that is wanted by next to nobody and it is being forced through against the opinion of both Labour and Conservative Members and against the vote in the House of Lords. The real issue is not whether the House of Lords is carrying out its right and proper function, but that Labour Whips are forcing support for a voting system which, if the Labour party was left to its own devices, it would reject.

In the House of Lords, the Labour party had substantial difficulty finding speakers to support its measures. Lord Shore, not exactly a Conservative hereditary peer, has to his great credit, spoken and voted consistently against the measure, as has Lord Stoddart. As I pointed out in the previous debate, even those who spoke in favour of the Government were careful not to argue for the closed list, although yesterday one of their Lordships did begin by arguing in that way, and then gave the game away when he said that he hoped that the court would be gentle with him. He had picked up a brief and momentarily forgotten where he was.

The real irony is that the only party which appears to have had anything approaching enthusiasm for this case is the Liberal Democrat party. Its official position is in favour of the open list so, naturally, it voted in favour of a closed list. The credibility of Liberal Democrats is in question, not only here but in the House of Lords. We have even seen the sad prospect of Lord Taverne voting for the closed list. Quite contrary to what the Home Secretary asserts, Lord Taverne once established that a named candidate could beat the party.

Lord Rodgers, now the Leader of the Liberal Democrats in the House of Lords, is very much in the mould of his predecessor, Lord Jenkins, but without Lord Jenkins's common touch. After all his changes of party, he has voted for the closed list. In this whole debate, after the Home Secretary, the Liberal Democrats have come out with least credit.

The argument has gone solidly against the Government. It has gone against them in Parliament and outside. The Times continues to condemn the measure, as do other newspapers such as the Daily Mail. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin) is laughing. When Labour Members vote at the views of the Daily Mail, I wonder why the spin doctors, such as Alastair Campbell, spend so much time trying to win that newspaper's support.

Having lost every argument on the issue, the Government are now desperately trying to get going a debate on the Lords versus the people. It is the only argument they have. It is a little late for that argument, however, as one cannot run up a flag of democracy for an anti-democratic measure. This is an anti-democratic measure because it transfers power from the people to the party. [Interruption.] It puts power in the hands of the party bosses. That is the essence of the proposal, and that is why the House of Lords is entirely right to check that power. If the Government want a debate on the House of Lords, that is fine by us. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Caplin, you must be quiet. You must calm down.

Sir Norman Fowler: If the Government want a debate on the House of Lords, that is fine by us. They will find few people in their party, or anywhere else, who agree with their concept of a House of Lords of placemen and appointees, a giant quango of men and women who are on the list only because they can be relied on to vote for the Government. The Government do not want a second Chamber that takes an independent line. They do not want a second Chamber that exercises independent judgment. This Government cannot bear to be criticised, they cannot bear to be questioned and, above all, they cannot bear to be defeated. They reveal themselves in their true colours. The Government are arrogant, and that arrogance, sooner or later, will bring them crashing down.

5.30 pm

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): I wish to make it clear that I have abstained on this issue throughout, but I have done so with a heavy heart. I do not want the Conservatives to exploit what is, for many people, an issue of conscience. There has been too much banter and not enough substance to the debate on the problem. I am against not only the list system, but proportional representation itself. The problem is PR. I have not yet come across a more sensible system than our current one, although I am open to debate on another occasion.

I wish that we could have discussed every option, but we are unfortunately not in that situation. We now have trench warfare. Throughout history, both sides have been damaged in trench warfare. In this case, both sides will suffer and democracy will be no better off for it. My abstention is based on my belief in democracy and my belief that I am accountable to a constituency. I have the right to stand for election as a human being, on the party ticket but not as a mere cog in a party machine. That is not why I am in Parliament.

If I get the sack from the people, so be it, but I would rather be sacked by the people than through the fiddling of a party list controlled by people who are almost unknown. I am not against the Labour Government, but I feel strongly that we need a system that allows the expression of the people's opinion to be heard and counted correctly.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe): My hon. Friend has so far argued on the merits of the issue. Does he also argue that the unelected and undemocratic House of Lords has the right to overrule the House of Commons, even when a general commitment to a proportional electoral system was in our manifesto?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman may not have been present at the time, but I have already made the point that we are not debating the structure of the House of Lords or its powers. We are debating the amendments before us.

Mr. Michie: I have no truck with the hereditary peers or the Tory party. It is ironic that some Conservatives do not like the so-called closed-list system, but they support a closed list that has lasted longer than any other—the hereditary peers, who are selected by the elite. I do not want the same to happen to the House of Commons or to our democratic voting system. The closed list does not give total freedom of choice to the electorate. Fortunately, my abstention will not rock the Government, and it may be a futile gesture, but I feel that I have to make it.

I do not doubt that the present system leaves much to be desired, but the breaking of links with the present constituency system is wrong. The proposed system will not help democracy in any way. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) made the point that we have no real choice if we have to choose between an inadequate system and an even more inadequate system. That is the dilemma that I and many other people face. It is not that we have no confidence in the Labour Government or that the Tories have any better ideas. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was very kind today because he said that he wanted the system changed to give other people a chance. He is also being kind in allowing the Tories to have a platform, because since the election they have not had one and that is why they are so enthusiastic about the issue.

We all worry that the European Parliament elections are viewed with scepticism and cynicism. We worry about the low turnout, but that is not because of the first-past-the-post system. It is because people are cynical about the European Parliament. They cannot feel any enthusiasm about it because it is so remote, and that is why they do not turn out to vote. Therefore, I cannot understand why we would wish to introduce a system that makes even the candidate remote. The candidate will be no longer a person, but a part of a party machine and that will make matters worse for European elections, not better. I will again abstain with a heavy heart, and I hope that my comrades will understand.

Mr. Allan: I approach this afternoon's debate with the same feelings as someone about to take the driving test for the fifth time—slightly nauseous and with my customary optimism dimmed by the previous four failures. However, unlike someone who has failed the driving test, we have passed the test in this House on four previous occasions with considerable majorities. What has happened is that the tester has asked a panel of people descended from his grandfather's friends for a second opinion, and sent it back to us on that basis.

I am pleased to follow my neighbour, the hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie), whose views I respect, even though they differ from my own, on this as on many other subjects. I know that he holds them with great sincerity. In deference to the hon. Member for North–East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes), another neighbour, I shall try not to refer to the first-past-the-post system as the closed list of one. Instead, I shall refer to it as a system in which the electorate have no option but to vote for the single candidate selected by the party if they wish to vote for that party. I hope that that more accurate and snappy rendition will satisfy him.

The people last year elected a Government with a mandate to bring in fair votes for Europe. Two thirds of the people in this country gave their votes to parties committed to that principle. This elected Chamber has now voted four times for the Bill to be passed without further amendment. If the Conservatives hold to their belief that their opposition should be loyal and democratic, they should stop playing partisan games and let the people cast their verdict on the system in the elections next year.

At worst, the closed-list system has been said to be an affront to democracy because party machines can be less than perfectly democratic in ordering their candidates. The Labour party has done its best to give us examples to highlight the problem for us, but party machines at least have to seek a mandate for their internal processes from their many hundreds of thousands of members. However much I deplore what sometimes happens in some parties, when it comes to a contest about democratic legitimacy, what happens within parties still strikes me as infinitely more democratic than allowing decisions to be made by those selected by heredity. Labour Members who are angry about selection processes should consider that.

Tonight, we have a choice: we are offered an election system decided by the democratic majority in this House, which involves a considerable degree of party influence in ordering candidates; or we are offered the alternative of an election system, chosen by the other place by people who owe their power to an accident of birth and who will combine with the hand of God arbitrarily to choose which candidates are elected from entirely open lists.

Mr. Lansley: Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that it is perfectly possible, even under the system proposed by the other place, for the Government to ask that parties structure the open list in the order of party preference? What the Lords want, and what that would allow, is for those who support a party to be able to choose which candidate they want.

Mr. Allan: That is fine for the candidates at the top of the list—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman is interested in this matter, but his hon. Friends seem keen to engage him in debate. His proposal would suit the top person on the list, and it would be fine in my party's case, where only the top person is likely to win through in many cases. However, it would not suit the second, third or fourth person on the list. Under the system proposed by the Conservatives, only one cross goes in the box. Will they tell their supporters that the list is ordered, and that those whose house numbers begin with one should vote for the first candidate, and those whose house numbers begin with two should vote for the second, and so on? There are fundamental flaws in that system.

Labour Members should realise that the option of our choice is by far the more democratic of the alternatives on offer. They can, at least, be elected to their national executive committee, but they have no hope of becoming Lord Muck of Nether Regions. I am conscious that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) contradicts that point, having been a peer in the past, and having no chance of being elected to the NEC, but Labour Members can change their party's processes if the will exists for change.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): This is the fourth or fifth time I have heard the hon. Gentleman speak on this matter. Perhaps he will give me a straight answer to a simple question. What is his preferred option? I do not want to know what he will vote for, but what he believes in.

Mr. Allan: For the fourth or fifth time, my view is that the open-list system is preferable, but that the system proposed in the amendment is not the one. We prefer the Belgian open-list system, which we proposed in Committee, for which we voted, and on which the Conservatives failed to support us. Irrespective of the merits of selection on the list process, members of any political party have the ability to alter the list through internal mechanisms. That option is not available to those who wish to change decisions made by people in the other place, to which we have no right of entry.

I feel a need to address my comments principally to the Conservatives who are, once again, backing a Lords amendment. I hope that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition will think about their duty at this eleventh hour. An imperfect system is on the table, and I have admitted to the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) that it is an imperfect system, and that it is not the ideal that the Liberal Democrats would propose if we were in power. However, the Government have agreed to a system that will introduce proportionality to the European elections for the first time, although it does not extend voter choice when it comes to candidates. We would like to extend voter choice, but we have accepted the Government's decision. When the matter was debated, and voted on, in Committee, we accepted that the Government had made their decision.

The latest last-minute attempts to amend the Bill are futile, and they are designed chiefly to obstruct the Bill rather than seriously to improve it. The fact that the specific system proposed in the Lords amendment has some clear flaws only adds to that impression. Evidence that the amendment is a ploy to block the Bill appears in the words of the Conservative spokesman in the other place, Lord Mackay of Ardbrecknish. At the Committee stage, Lord Mackay made two interesting points. First, he criticised systems in which people could be elected with fewer personal votes than others who were not elected, calling such an outcome "manifestly unfair". As the Home Secretary has said, that is precisely what could happen as a result of the amendment. We cannot understand why that shift should have taken place.

Secondly, Lord Mackay proposed precisely the kind of review proposed by the Government amendment in lieu. He told the Committee that he was "a realist", that he accepted that next year's elections would be under a closed-list system and that the most important thing was that there should be a review. He even ventured to suggest that the closed-list system might actually work, saying that, if all went "swimmingly and excellently", the Government would "have nothing to fear at all."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 25 June 1998; Vol. 591, c. 355.]

Why is it, then, that, when the Conservatives are being offered exactly what they wanted in Committee, they appear to want to change the democratic will of the House of Commons? Our conclusion must be that they are seeking to achieve a partisan goal of preserving an unfair voting system, irrespective of any constitutional principle that is broken along the way.

What would happen if the Conservatives withdrew their support for the amendment? The elections would go ahead with a less-than-perfect system, but we would have a fairer voting system, which appeared in manifestos supported by the majority of the electorate. It would mean for the first time that every vote cast in Britain would count. Far from talking down the turnout, all parties would have an incentive to get out every vote in every part of the country. There would be no more electoral deserts once we moved to the proposed system.

I ask the Conservatives to consider the point at which a revising chamber becomes a blocking chamber. It has become clear during the course of our debate that the Lords amendment is not a simple revision, but a fundamental issue facing the Government. Whatever the Government's reasons for their decision, and however unhappy or happy some of their supporters are about it, it was their decision, and they are the elected Government. The Conservatives themselves describe the amendment as an issue of fundamental principle. In that case, there is no argument for saying that the other place is merely tidying up the Bill, or revising it at the margins. The other place is raising a fundamental issue of principle. The Government take one view, the peers take another. It is clear that the elected will should prevail.

To continue to seek to reverse the Government's decision once it has been so clearly made is not, in any sense, to seek to revise the legislation. It is an explicit challenge to the Bill as a whole. I must ask the official Opposition whether they see their role as one of blocking legislation for which the Government have a mandate, and which two parties that commanded 60 per cent. of the vote last year espoused at the general election and have consistently supported in Parliament ever since.

The Conservatives have called the people to their aid throughout the debate, claiming to act on the people's behalf against the party machines. I challenge the Opposition to let the people have their will as expressed at the ballot box on 1 May 1997, when they voted for parties committed to electoral reform. Let the people give their verdict on the system in the Bill. We have heard much pre-judgment about what the people will or will not accept for the elections. We have heard apocalyptic visions of how the system will mean that the people will not bother to vote. However, we should give the people the chance to make their own decision about the system next June. If they do hate it, the Conservatives can have the satisfaction of saying, "Told you so."

There is a firm commitment to a review. I assure the Conservatives that the Liberal Democrats will play an active role in that review, and we shall campaign with anyone for change where problems have been identified. If the Conservatives have any confidence in their own abilities, they should work on the assumption that they can win a general election before the European elections of 2004. They would then have the chance to outline their own ideas for a better voting system. It could be a key part of the Conservative manifesto, and the party could seek its own mandate for a reversion to the first-past-the-post system.

Until then, the Conservatives should make a careful judgment about when loyal and effective opposition slips into a bloody-minded, partisan attempt to frustrate change for which there is a mandate. The official Opposition can no longer hide behind the fact that there is no explicit mandate for a technical aspect of the Bill. It is absolutely clear that the whole Bill is at stake now.

I ask my hon. Friends to use their votes, once again, to help the Bill on to the statute book. If it passes, every citizen in Britain will next year, for the first time in a national election, have a chance to cast a vote with real value. We shall not support the Conservative amendment. We shall back the Government's call for a review.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Like a bad film, this is where we came in, and came in, and came in, and came in. I am told that there have been astonishing scenes in the other place during the past week. Apparently there were more Range Rovers than ever before in the car park, and some people had to ask their way to the Chamber. There is an undelicious irony in the fact that the other place is lecturing the House of Commons on the essence of democracy.

Those hereditary peers who sit in the other place have never stood in elections, and know nothing about elections, yet they are telling us how to run elections. They are wilfully overturning a clear Government commitment to introducing a system of proportional representation for the European elections. They are, in effect, allowing themselves yet again to be Mr. Hague's poodle. They are signing their own death warrant and their actions are totally self-defeating. The essence of the matter is that they know that time is running out for the Government and that the alternative is the first-past-the-post system.

The Conservatives are, as always, against any change. If there were to be a first-past-the-post system for the European elections next May, the major casualties would be Conservative candidates. The Government, in their enormous beneficence, have provided a system that will help to raise the Conservative party's corpse from the dead.

Mr. Lansley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Anderson: No, I want to be brief.

Perhaps the Conservatives' motive is to reduce the number of Conservative MEPs because they know that, when they go to Brussels and Strasbourg, they tend to go native and might not support party policy.

[Mr. Anderson]

I accept that open and closed lists are not a barricades issue or a great issue of principle. The arguments are finely balanced. The closed-list system ensures that women and people from ethnic minorities can have their rightful place in the list.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): As a woman from an ethnic minority who succeeded under first past the post, I ask my hon. Friend whether he thinks that the closed-list system proposed tonight would be passed in the House on a free vote.

Mr. Anderson: I am not a Whip, I have never been a Whip and I am unlikely ever to be a Whip, and my arithmetic is very bad, so I would not like to answer that question.

The open-list argument is based on simple fallacy—the argument that it is more democratic. It is as if there were, on the Rousseau analogy, a forest clearing in Switzerland where the citizens meet and decide who are the best to go forward in their name. Surely the essence of multi-member constituencies is that they are all large and the individuals will be known only to a very few of the electorate. An election can therefore degenerate into a beauty contest between media stars. I know of other open-list systems in which there are several party members, but they are a recipe for internal party strife and an investment in the worst sort of populism.

It is absolutely clear that this is not a debate about a great principle; it is surely no more than a device used by the Opposition to embarrass the Government and kill off a Bill.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): I thought that, with the speech of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie), we would at last have a Labour Back Bencher supporting the Government, but of course he did nothing of the sort. The speech of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) on behalf of the Liberal Democrats demonstrated once again that he prefers open lists but will vote for closed lists. So much for principle and the Liberal Democrats.

This is the fifth debate on the European Parliamentary Elections Bill in which I have taken part. I do not intend to repeat myself, so I shall be brief.

Certain misconceptions have arisen, particularly during the past few weeks. The first, which was said on the "Today" programme yesterday and has been repeated in a number of newspapers and stated by the Home Secretary, is that the Lords are acting deliberately to frustrate a Labour party manifesto commitment. That is either sloppy journalism or the Labour party spin doctors have been working extremely hard, because it is not true. The Labour party manifesto commitment was simple: there would be elections for the European Parliament on a regional basis and by proportional representation. None of the amendments that have been returned to the House in the past few weeks by the Lords has contested those points.

The second misconception is that we already have closed lists for Westminster parliamentary elections; it has been put forward by the Home Secretary time and time again. He knows that it is pure sophistry on his part. We all know that in our selection systems hundreds of local people and supporters make selections from hundreds of candidates. That is not a closed-list system such as the system that the Home Secretary intends to operate, in which the order of the candidates and their likelihood of being elected would be determined by Millbank tower.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): My hon. Friend is absolutely right about how candidates in our party are selected, but in the Labour party, candidates such as the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Howarth) are simply parachuted in by the central party.

Mr. Sayeed: My hon. Friend makes a perfectly fair point. If the Labour party had a selection system similar to ours, it would not be in its current difficulties.

The third misconception is that it is for a political party alone to decide its selection procedures. If a proposed law permits an undemocratic system that ignores the wishes of the local people and promotes those of the party machine, it is right for either of the Houses of Parliament to try to amend that law. That is not simply a matter for parties, because democracy is a matter for Parliament.

Mr. Bermingham: Surely it is for a party to decide how it will select its candidates. That is an entirely internal matter. If one has a dispute with an internal system, one fights it internally. That is not a matter in which outside bodies should interfere unless it is contrary to natural law.

Mr. Sayeed: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. A law that would permit an anti-democratic system is a bad law.

Mr. Allan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Sayeed: No. I wish to be brief.

The fourth misconception is that expressions of support for the Government can be counted only in the voting lists. Anyone who knows how Labour Whips work, who knows the power of the Patronage Secretary—that name is not given lightly—and who knows the brutal tactics of Millbank tower will know that many Labour Members are dead against the party's proposals for closed lists but will vote as their Whips dictate. Labour Back Benchers' thoughts are demonstrated not by votes but by how they have spoken during the five debates and by the fact that not one has given whole-hearted support to his Front Benchers.

Mr. Donald Anderson: I am as whole-hearted as I am likely to be in supporting any Government measure.

Mr. Sayeed: If that is whole-hearted, I would hate the hon. Gentleman to be agin me, because I would still not understand whether he was agin me or for me. It sounded as though he was sitting on the fence. If he wants to be a great supporter of the Government's measure, all I can say is that he is the first.

The ability to resolve the dilemma is in the Government's hands. They can make sure that they fulfil their manifesto commitment to conduct regional elections to the European Parliament on a PR basis. All they need to do is abandon closed lists. Alternatively, they might be able to get away with it in the Lords if they undertook to operate closed lists as we intend to operate them. If they do neither, the loss of the Bill will be the Labour Government's fault. They will deserve all they get.

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North): This is the first time I have spoken in the many debates on the Bill, but I felt the need to speak tonight. As I have done on every occasion, I shall support the Government tonight, even though I am 150 per cent. committed to the first-past-the-post system.

The Bill fulfils a manifesto commitment. I know that that is a strange concept to the Conservatives, which is part of the reason why they are on the Opposition Benches. A proportional system was endorsed as part of the Labour party manifesto in the general election. The only arguments left are on implementation. However improbable it may seem, a closed list is obviously the best system of implementation for the regions in question. For a region such as Yorkshire, with 5.5 million voters, it is nonsense to suggest that people in Redcar will recognise someone from Sheffield, 90 miles away.

Mr. Lansley: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the one set of people who are likely to be recognised by the voters and to attract support in a European election are existing MEPs? Will he therefore remind the House how many existing Labour MEPs have been placed by his party in a winnable position on his party's lists?

Mr. Rooney: The hon. Gentleman is wise enough to know that most of us in this House are far less recognised than we would like, and that is even more true of MEPs, with the larger constituencies that they represent. One of the greatest fallacies perpetuated by politicians is the weight of their personal vote. The personal vote is nonsense. Personal identification is nonsense, except in a small number of cases. [Interruption.] I do not even mind saying in my own case that personal identification is nonsense. In the Bradford, North constituency in the 1997 general election, whoever was the Labour candidate would have won. It was not Terry Rooney who won. I might have made five votes difference in a positive sense—or lost 100 votes, for all I know.

What matters is not the individual, but the party. We know that that is overwhelmingly the case. That is why the closed-list system is much simpler and easier for the electorate to understand and deal with than a ballot paper with 50, 60 or 70 names on it. If we look at the local council elections in London this year, and the number of votes that each party's candidate got in each seat, we see that, without exception the candidate placed highest on the list got the most votes, and the next highest on the list of that party got the second highest number of votes.

That is the system proposed for the European elections, which would mean that voters had to read down a list of perhaps 50 names to identify the seven or eight candidates who were Conservative, Labour or whatever—what nonsense.

The real concerns about the closed-list system relate to the ranking order, but those are internal matters for a political party. The day this House tries to interfere with the rule book of a political party is the day this House dies. The political parties must determine their own rules.

I shall support the measure tonight, and I beg the House to do so too.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet): I apologise to the House for the fact that I missed the first part of the debate. As you are aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I was chairing a Standing Committee.

I shall make a straightforward contribution on behalf of my constituents in North Thanet and those living in the Euro-constituency of East Kent, in which I also live.

At Question Time this afternoon, the Prime Minister told the House that this was a device of the Tory hereditary peers designed to wreck a piece of legislation that the House wanted. You know me well enough, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to know that I would not for one moment suggest that the Prime Minister misled the House, but there is some case for saying that he tried to mislead the British public who might have been watching on television.

The matter has nothing to do with Tory hereditary peers. The argument is simple. It concerns the right of the individual elector to vote for an individual candidate of the party of his or her choosing. The rest is a smokescreen. I shall give two examples—one theoretical and one literal—of the practical effect, beginning with the literal example.

For the past four and a half years, the Euro-constituency of East Kent has been represented by a Labour Member. There are many things that that Member has not done which might have furthered the interests of his constituents, which is a source of some criticism. There are things that he has done which are also a source of criticism. Specifically, he claims authorship of the European ferry passenger registration directive, which will affect the livelihoods of people working on the cross-channel ferries.

Hon. Members may not be aware that, if that directive is introduced, it will require every man, woman and child travelling back and forth across the channel to register their name, age and sex, before travelling. As a result, the queues from the channel ports will stretch far back along the roads, and the ferries will be disadvantaged. One MEP has been responsible for that legislation, which has deeply angered his constituents. I cannot tell whether that anger will manifest itself to such a degree that he will be ejected from his seat at the next election, but I know that the electorate of East Kent want the opportunity to voice judgment on his stewardship of his seat.

Under the proposals before us, that MEP has been placed by the Labour party at the top of the list. Unless nobody in East Kent or the south-east votes Labour—dream on—that MEP will be there for life, provided that he stays on-message and keeps his nose clean. That cannot be democratic.

Let us consider a theoretical situation.

Mr. Bermingham: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gale: No. The hon. Gentleman intervenes on virtually everyone. I want to be brief.

Consider the case of a Labour voter who is anti-abortion and wants to vote for candidates to his or her moral liking. If that voter casts a vote and if the Labour candidate at the top of the list is pro-abortion, the voter is inevitably voting for a moral principle that he or she abhors. That is not democratic.

[Mr. Gale]

No, the issue is nothing to do with the hereditary peerage. It is to do with the right of one voter to exercise his or her vote for the candidate of his or her choice, of whatever political party and moral persuasion.

The Prime Minister said at Question Time this afternoon—with considerable arrogance, some of us felt—that, were we to go back to the old system—the one that everyone understands, first past the post, one member one seat, win or lose—the Conservative party would indubitably win fewer seats in the European elections. That is a chance that we are prepared to take in defence of a principle: the right of the individual to exercise his or her vote as he or she wishes. That is the principle that the Prime Minister seeks to abolish.

Mr. Bermingham: I was sad that the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) would not let me intervene, and accused me of intervening all over the place. I do not. I intervene only when an hon. Member makes a patently bad point, as I see it. I expect that others intervene in my speeches if I make patently bad points. That is what the Chamber is all about—at least, it used to be when the hon. Gentleman and I first came here. There seems to be a little intolerance in the Opposition these days, but these things happen. He well knows that, under the current system, if a Member has what is called a safe seat, he or she will be there for life—assuming that that Member obeys the party rules.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way, because he has just made a patently bad point. If a so-called safe seat ensured that a Member was elected for life, 100 of my former colleagues would be sitting beside me this evening. However, under first past the post, they were thrown out.

Mr. Bermingham: That is because they were patently not safe seats. So we return to the subject at hand.

I have spoken several times about this matter, and I am sad that my old and hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) is not in the Chamber. I intended to try to persuade him not to waste his vote by abstaining. That is what one does when one abstains: one makes no point one way or the other.

We have reached a situation where the Government—my party—wish to put their political will before the country. At the end of the day, the people will decide whether the system is good or bad. If the system is bad, they will thump us. The Government wish to introduce a system that will be reviewed in due course. At this stage—on the fifth occasion—surely the House of Commons has the right to tell the Lords that this is the will of the people.

The measure was in the manifesto, and it has been accepted by members of the governing party. Labour Members are not rolling about the aisles in rebellion. I accept that there has been the odd vote against the measure and the odd abstention—such is the entitlement of any hon. Member. However, the overwhelming bulk of the Government party has voted consistently for the measure in its present form.

I say to the Lords: that is the will of the people. If their will as expressed by the Government is wrong, the people will surely tell us by voting against us. The next referendum—as it were—on this subject should be in June next year. It is time that this ping-pong farce ended.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In response to the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham), I contend that, if the voters had wanted a closed-list system, we would have seen some evidence of that desire. If the focus groups had suggested to the Government that the people wanted a closed-list system, it would have been stated specifically in the Labour party manifesto. The truth is that not a single party represented in the House included the closed-list system in its manifesto. It is worth repeating the words of the bishop who said last night in another place:

"I believe that we shall be doing the right thing by the democratic principles which have prevailed in this country for a very long time."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 17 November 1998; Vol. 594, c. 1148.]

There are two constitutional principles involved. The first is that the governing party with a majority in the House of Commons should expect to get its way. If the Government were to accept the amendments, they would still have a proportional representation system—albeit not the one on which they have lately decided to insist. The second principle is that the second Chamber tries to defend the rights of the voters. For example, the House of Lords has the opportunity of preventing the House from extending the life of a Parliament. Those are the kinds of democratic principle that the second Chamber represents.

We turn to the question of support for the form of proportional representation that the Government are attempting to force through Parliament. This time, I will put my question to the House, not the Minister. Will those Labour Back Benchers who embrace the closed-list system as their personal preference intervene on me now? Not one Labour Back Bencher is prepared to state that that is his or her personal preference.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): Was the hon. Gentleman not in the Chamber earlier this evening when several Labour Members spoke in favour of precisely that system?

Mr. Bottomley: Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will bear witness to the fact that even the Minister has not declared that the closed-list system is his personal preference. The hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) said that he was 150 per cent. behind the single-member constituency. I have made my point. The Minister failed to answer my question during his winding-up speech on Monday: he could not name one Labour Back Bencher who has disclosed that this system is his or her personal preference. We know how the Government Whips can force Labour Members through the Lobby.

Let us turn to the only other significant argument in this debate, which was advanced by the noble Lord Callaghan in the other place. He pointed out that the Government were offering a review that would make it possible to introduce a better system. By proposing that the Lords should go quietly because a review is promised, he acknowledges that the closed-list system is not the best system even in his view.

My conviction is that the other place will be justified if it decides to hold to its view that the voters should be able to cast their votes for individual candidates and influence who represents them, and to decide that it should not be left to the parties to put names on a closed list. I believe that the other place will be right to say that the Government's insistence on their course of action is unjustified and undemocratic.

Mr. Martin Linton (Battersea): I have three questions that I hope will introduce new points into the debate and be addressed by the Opposition.

My first question concerns the nature of the system that the Opposition propose. They favour not the so-called Belgian open-list system—which the Government considered and rejected—but the Finnish open-list system. As far as I can establish, that system is used by only two countries in the European Union—Finland and Luxembourg—and I have not heard any Labour or Liberal Democrat Member speak in support of it. The system prevents voters from voting for parties: they can vote only for candidates. That leads me to my first vital question.

Mr. Lansley: Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House why the Government have chosen not to return to another place, in lieu of the Lords amendments, an amendment in favour of the Belgium list system, if that is the system that he—by implication—and the Liberal Democrats support?

Mr. Linton: The Government considered that course of action and decided against it.

Mr. Lansley: Why?

Mr. Linton: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman ask the Minister.

My first question for the Opposition is: how will the system work? How will you order your candidates on your list? As I understand it, there are only two ways to do that under this system. You can put the candidates either in alphabetical or in random order. Should you decide to put your candidates in alphabetical order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) keeps using the term "you". I do not have any candidates to put in order—at least, not yet.

Mr. Linton: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was of course referring to potential Conservative candidates. I have a copy of the Conservative party's list of candidates for the European elections, who are listed under the party name. If those candidates were re-listed alphabetically, Javad Arain, who is currently No. 4, would jump into first place in the east midlands. This is a perfectly relevant question, because that is precisely what happens in Finland. That country has an alphabetocracy: the people whose names begin with the letters A and B are much more likely to be elected.

In the eastern region, Sir Graham Bright—former Parliamentary Private Secretary to the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major)—would find himself in first place on the list. Most interestingly, Lord Bethell—who is now at No. 3—would go to No. 1 on the list for London. Before we take this proposal seriously, the Opposition must explain how the system would work.

My second question concerns Lord Bethell. When the issue was debated in the House of Lords last night, two of the three Conservative peers who are standing in the European elections voted with the Opposition. The third, Lord Bethell, did not vote.

I ask myself why Lord Bethell did not vote. We may have a clue—

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): From the list.

Mr. Linton: No; we may have a clue from the letter that Lord Bethell wrote to The Daily Telegraph, which said:

"The open list offers a choice so wide as to be confusing, especially since hardly any of the several hundred candidates whose names will be put forward have any public profile. Ballot papers will carry 50 or more names. Hardly anyone will know them. Voters will mark their crosses at random."

That is the view of the most senior Conservative peer who has already been a Member of the European Parliament expressing his views on the Opposition motion. He went on:

"A change to the open list will also cause conflict between candidates of the same party, who will be competing as much against their colleagues as against their adversaries. One advantage of the closed list is that in London, for instance—where I hope to stand—all 10 of us Conservatives are in the same 'job lot'. A vote for one is a vote for us all."

Those are the views of the most prominent Member of the House of Lords who is a candidate in the European elections. How does he square that with Conservative Front-Bench support in the House of Commons for a system that he has denounced?

My third question is intended to be helpful: have Opposition Front Benchers considered the effect on their own party lists were—heaven forbid—that system to be adopted? If there were seven, eight or nine names on a list in alphabetical order, and a vote could be registered only by voting for one of those candidates, there would be increased temptation for people to vote for Europhile or Europhobe Conservative candidates. There would immediately be a campaign to support the Europhobe candidates, which would no doubt be backed by a large sum of money. Many voters would want to move those candidates to the top of the list.

On the other hand, Conservative voters, in their maturity, may prefer the Europhile candidates, and may fill the European Parliament—

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): Does that not precisely illustrate the point about voter choice? The system proposed by the other place would give voters the ability to make that choice, which the Government's proposals would deny them.

Mr. Linton: That illustrates the point very well, but can Conservative Members explain what would happen if Conservative voters returned to the European Parliament only pro-European Conservative MEPs? Those MEPs would stand on their own manifesto as pro-Europeans and pro-single currency, but we understand that the Conservative party manifesto puts off a single currency until the election after the election after next. On whose manifesto would those MEPs be elected—their own, or the party's?

[Mr. Linton]

As soon as Conservative Members introduced that dog's breakfast of a system, they would have not only serious problems with different campaigns for Europhile and Europhobe candidates, but a complete lack of clarity about who those people would represent and on whose manifesto they were elected. It would be in the interests of the whole House if Opposition Front Benchers admitted that they supported the amendment, of which they know little, for opportunistic reasons. If it were enacted, it would damage their party more than any other.

Mr. Lansley: The debate is becoming positively surreal on the Government Benches: we have arrived at a point at which the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) is trying to protect the Conservative party from internal divisions and debate over Europe. I had thought that the opposite was precisely the Government's objective, on all occasions.

The hon. Member for Battersea does that because—as distinct from his speech on Monday night—he did not want to explain his own preference. That preference was clearly stated on Monday: he favoured an open list.

Mr. Linton: The Belgian list.

Mr. Lansley: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to converse with his Front Benchers about why they did not adopt a Belgian list. Of course, that was not the Conservative party's proposal; we have been clear all the way about through the fact that we would prefer the election to be fought under the first-past-the-post system.

The Government said in their manifesto that they wanted a proportional representation system. The Liberal Democrats support such a system—they want the Belgian system, as does the hon. Member for Battersea—and the overwhelming majority of Labour Members who have spoken want a PR system and an open list. The Belgian system is available to them; why have the Government said no? They have said no for one reason: they want a closed list. Why do they want a closed list? They want to dictate who is elected as a Labour Member of the European Parliament. They do not want the electorate to choose, and they do not even want Labour party supporters to choose; they want to choose themselves.

As was rightly said in the other place, a choice has to be made between the electorate and the selectorate—the selectorate of the Millbank tower panels, which have chosen the lists for the Labour party. That is the decision that has to be made. The Lords returning the Bill to this place, amended on each occasion, is far from being an affront to democracy; they have done so in pursuance of democracy, because they seek to defend voter choice.

I have read the debates in the Lords, and hon. Members will know that I have attended the debates in the Chamber on each occasion. It is perfectly clear that, on each occasion, the Lords have not been dragooned into going in this direction by the Conservatives. Cross-Bench peers have overwhelmingly chosen to send those amendments back to this House, and the decisions have been made on the balance of the argument. Each time, they have been fed by the simple fact that, in debates in this House, Members of the governing party have been unwilling to support their Front Benchers.

That is what gave the Lords the impetus to send the Bill back amended, and they have been challenging the Government to have the honesty to follow the line of argument that is supported by Labour Members.

From the corner of my eye, I see that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) wants me to give way.

Mr. Allan: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, and I have been listening to his case with interest. I have much sympathy with what he says about voter choice, but does he agree with two propositions? The first is that the proposed closed-list system is no worse than the first-past-the-post system, which also presents candidates selected by a small number of party members. The second is that the logic of his position must inevitably lead him to suggest that in a Westminster election he should be selected by the entire electorate and should put himself forward with other Conservative candidates, rather than rely on a small selectorate of party members.

Mr. Lansley: Two propositions were put, but they are essentially one. I do not accept either, because the constituency link—this would be true for the European Parliament—on the basis of one member, one seat is wholly to be preferred.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: May I check this point with the hon. Gentleman, so that people outside the House are clear about what is argued? Is he agreeing with Lord Bethell, who said that, under the Tory proposals, ballot papers would and that an individual elector would have to pick names out of the 50 and tick them off? Is that what he proposes?

Mr. Lansley: No. The hon. Gentleman is wrong on that, first, because the Bill specifies that, under the regulations that are to be made, a party cannot present more candidates than there are places up for election. Secondly, as I read the Bill, it is perfectly possible for the Government to specify that a party should present its candidates, not in an alphabetical or an arbitrary list, but in a list of that party's preference. It is therefore perfectly possible for the electorate to be presented with a party's preferences, but the voters would be able to choose from within that list and not be bound to accept the preference of the party apparatchiks.

The Home Secretary made an absurd point about perverse results and someone from one party being elected although he had fewer votes than someone from another party. The right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that that is accurate statistically, but he will not recognise that it is directly the result of proportionality. He has argued in debate after debate that, primarily, people vote on the basis of party—yes, indeed. In a proportional system, that means that people will be elected from that party's list first, rather than elected from another party's list.

What the Home Secretary will not accept—he should listen to this—is that, even within a preference for party, voters may have a preference between individual candidates. That is what it comes down to. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Bell) said—this is true for the electoral system in this country that we are used to—that voters want to be able to choose an individual candidate. That is what the Home Secretary sets out to deny.

6.30 pm

Mrs. Laing: It has been fascinating to listen yet again to a debate on the complexities and anomalies of proportional representation systems, as set out by the Home Secretary and other Labour Members, in particular the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton). Again, the Home Secretary has advanced excellent arguments for keeping first past the post, although he will not welcome my saying that, and will not admit to it. He knows that he has lost the argument, so he blames our constitutional system, which allows members in another place to revise what we have discussed in this place—our well-trusted and long-standing constitutional system.

We have heard much about closed lists, open lists and individuals. In Epping Forest, we are individuals. I was elected as a Conservative candidate, but I have, unusually, a bit of support from some non-Conservatives. Therefore, it is a pleasure to put forward the view of a party that has no representation in the House.

Labour Members have argued that opposition to the clause is confined mostly to hereditary members of another place. That is not true. Our position on these Benches is supported by a wide range of fair-minded people who believe in and seek to defend democracy: for example, the Epping Forest Democratic Left. The secretary of that august organisation, a Mr. Peter Relph, has written an excellent letter to the West Essex Gazette, an excellent publication, which is known, if not to all hon. Members, certainly to the Home Secretary and to me.

Mr. Peter Relph has written to the editor of my local paper:

"Dear Sir

Our Member of Parliament"—

I will leave out the flattering bits—

"is to be congratulated on her work with the Electoral Reform Society and other democrats including the majority of the House of Lords who seek to ensure that the new voting procedures for the European Elections to be held next May . . . will be open, fair and democratic."

He goes on to pay tribute to the Home Secretary, who, as he has acknowledged, was once Mr. Relph's next-door neighbour, or something close to it; I will also leave out the flattering bits about the Home Secretary.

Mr. Relph goes on to say:

"The 'closed' list is one of candidates hand selected by an unelected cabal meeting in smoke filled rooms who will ensure that independent minded 'socialist' . . . personalities . . . will never be on the ballot paper."

I did not expect to find myself in such agreement with Mr. Relph and the Epping Forest Democratic Left. I do not agree with all that they say, but I respect their right to say it.

Conservative Members have been wondering of what the Home Secretary and his Government are afraid. We have concluded that it is of free thinkers in his party.

Caroline Flint (Don Valley): On free thinking, will the hon. Lady clarify this matter? Will the Conservative party allow its candidates, who I understand you have placed in order of preference, to produce individual literature to put their case before the voters, or will you insist that all literature for the European elections will be under the Conservative party banner, with the list of candidates in the order that you wish the electorate to vote for them?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Perhaps I should just say to the hon. Lady that that has nothing to do with me at all.

Mrs. Laing: I hope that the situation that the hon. Member for Don Valley (C roline Flint) has described will not be necessary, because I have every hope and confidence that we will fight the European elections next May under a first-past-the-post system.

From the evidence that we have heard tonight, it is obvious that no one who defends democracy can possibly support a system that gives more power to political parties by taking that power away from the people.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): The Home Secretary would have better spent his time concentrating on the arguments, rather than drawing attention to the forefathers of their Lordships. Irrespective of whether their Lordships were appointed or achieved their peerage by birth, they were not genetically conditioned to vote against the Government. They found themselves in that Division Lobby on the strength of the arguments and not for any other reason. He would have done better to dwell on those arguments.

As I have pointed out before, I have certain base motives for wishing to support the Government on the amendment. I have never believed that the European Parliament was a Parliament at all. To hamper that assembly with an awful electoral system and to let all the frogs that are in the bog hatch out would suit me very well, but representative democracy is more important.

This afternoon, the Prime Minister drew attention several times to the fact that that dreadful voting system is shared by some of our European partners. That is not surprising. Their electoral systems arose after the advent of political parties—political parties organised the people—whereas our system predates the organisation of political parties.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Swayne: I am enjoined to be brief.

We have that rather idiosyncratic system of representative democracy. We have the technology now to do away with representative democracy, to have pure democracy, and to let every voter decide on every issue, yet we persist with a deliberative assembly, where Members representing their constituents make decisions.

That principle is fundamentally undermined by the system that the Home Secretary has brought before us. If we are to be represented by true representatives and not by political parties, as the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) said the previous time that we debated this issue, we must have the ability to get rid of representatives as well as to elect them. That is why it is vital that the list, insofar as we have a list at all, remains an open list.

Mr. Clappison: This has been a good and interesting debate. We are all becoming veterans of these occasions. This is the fourth time, I think, that we have considered the Lords amendments. We have also debated the matter twice in Committee and once on Report; and we had Second Reading, of course, as well.

I think that this is the first time that more than one Labour Member has spoken in favour of a closed-list system: two out of five have done so. One of the others was indeterminate, and two were against. I know that the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), is optimistic, but he can hardly claim that the motion is being carried forward on a tidal wave of acclamation.

We began with the principled and thoughtful speech by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie), who expressed his principled position, and made it clear that he was going to abstain in the name of democracy. He prefers to stand as an individual, rather than as a cog in a machine.

We also heard from the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson). He said that the arguments were finely balanced. In the end, I think that he came down in favour of the closed list, but I notice that he did not respond to the intervention by the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott), who asked him whether the motion would be carried on a free vote in the Labour party, if there were one. I do not think that he was able to answer that.

Mr. Donald Anderson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clappison: No.

The hon. Member for Swansea, East said that he was not a very good Whip, but many others who have heard these debates could come to a different conclusion.

The hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) made the point, with which I am inclined to agree, that a safe seat is only safe until one loses it. Many Conservative Members do not intend to come near that experience, but he hardly gave a ringing endorsement of the closed-list system.

I believe that this was the first occasion on which the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) had spoken in one of these debates. I do not know how many of them he has attended. In any event, he came out in favour of a closed list. He was worried about the confusion that he believed voters would experience as a result of seeing all those names on the ballot paper—a worry echoed by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours).

I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was present for earlier proceedings, but I seem to recollect that, early in the Committee stage, we were told that the Government intended the names of all candidates to appear on the ballot paper in any event. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman is making comments from a sedentary position. I venture to ask him what will be the feelings of the voters when they look at the ballot paper before casting their votes. Will they be unable to decide who to vote for, or—if there is a closed list—will they feel angry about the fact that the names are there but they are unable to express an individual preference? I think that many voters will want to do that.

The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) supports the concept of an open list. We finally dragged that out of him the other evening. He was prepared to pick holes in each of the systems involved, but, as an aficionado of electoral reform, he will know that there are eight systems of open-list voting in the European Union. The Government have been willing to pick holes in each and every one of them, and to support the closed-list system that the hon. Gentleman does not support. That is the answer to the questions put by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: In the hon. Gentleman's constituency, will electors be faced with a ballot paper containing between 30 and 40 names, and have to tick the names of those they support?

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman is missing the point. The names will appear on the ballot paper under the Government's proposal. Electors may feel angry about the fact that they cannot express an individual preference. The hon. Gentleman ought to wonder about what is happening in the other eight countries of the European Union, where this does not seem to have constituted an insurmountable problem. Eight countries have been able to operate an open-list system.

We have heard some very good speeches from Conservative Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) has been an assiduous attender of these debates, and has constantly warned of the danger of centralised control. Another excellent speech was made by my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice), who, as he pointed out, has been another assiduous attender. He rightly drew attention to the danger of dictatorial Government control.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), in a short but excellent speech, spoke up for the rights of the individual. My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) made a colourful and passionate speech, in which he set out his principled view, and stood up for the rights of his constituents. My hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) drew attention, quite fairly, to the wide support for the open-list system, which extends as far as the Epping Forest Popular Front.

In the Home Secretary's speech—and at Prime Minister's Question Time today, from the Liberal Democrats and, I think, from the Prime Minister at one point—we heard a suggestion that this was all being got up by the Opposition. On Radio 4's "Today" programme this morning, I heard the Home Secretary use the words "manufactured" and "synthetic" about our position. [Interruption.]

The hon. Member for Workington is heckling from a sedentary position. I do not know whether he was present for the Second Reading debate nearly a year ago, and it is against my better judgment to refer to what was said in the past, but we drew attention then to the defects of the closed list. We pressed the Home Secretary, and made abundantly clear our opposition to closed lists in principle.

The strange thing is that the Home Secretary said then that he was prepared to listen to the arguments. He summed up the arguments on both sides. He expressed a preference for a closed list, but he said that there were arguments on both sides. He said of the possible alternative—which he later rejected—

"As with any other system, there are arguments both ways. The modification of what we propose in the Bill would provide some direct voter preference and may assuage the concerns even of the right hon. and learned Member for Grantham."—[Official Report, 25 November 1998; Vol. 301, c.814.]

Why, we ask now, are the Government so keen to nail their colours to the mast of the closed list? They said then that they at least had an open mind, and were prepared to listen to representations. As we know, no representations were forthcoming in favour of the closed list. If the Home Secretary had wanted to adopt the Belgian list system, at least he would have been able to make the Liberal Democrats feel happy. The Liberal Democrats have been in favour of an open list, but have not been prepared to vote for it.

Mr. Allan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clappison: No. Time is short. I know what the hon. Gentleman wants to say, and I have already responded to his point. He should read the report of our last debate. That is another advantage of debating this matter on so many occasions.

We maintained our opposition to the closed-list system throughout the Committee, and on Report. In Committee, we said—commenting on what the Home Secretary had said—that we thought the situation remained

"as unsatisfactory as it was on Second Reading. We believe that a closed list system is a bad system. That one word that has been used to describe it is degrading. That is appropriate. It will not get our support in any circumstances."—[Official Report, 26 February 1998; Vol. 307 , c. 524.]

That continues to be our position, which we have maintained throughout our proceedings. We are against the closed list, and maintain a principled opposition to it. There is nothing manufactured or synthetic about our views.

What I suggest is manufactured and synthetic is the rage that the Home Secretary and the Prime Minister have sought to whip up about hereditary peers. Who can blame hereditary peers, or any other peers, for taking the view they took? Cross Benchers have always voted against the closed list by an overwhelming majority, and many other groups and individuals have made representations against it, including the Electoral Reform Society and Charter 88.

This is a rotten system. We agree strongly with the views expressed by Lord Shore of Stepney, who clarified the issue when he said:

"The issue is about the open list against the closed list. It is about an open democratic list against a closed party management list. It is about accountability to the electorate, to the voters, against accountability to a party committee—what we are now officially informed is a joint panel of regional representatives and members of the party's ruling National Executive Committee. It is indeed—I repeat the words I used on the previous occasion—the electorate versus the selectorate."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 12 November 1998; Vol. 594, c. 851.]

That is the issue that remains at the end of all these debates: the right of an individual voter to make a choice, and the opportunity for an MEP to make his case before his constituents and win the support of his electors, whether they are in a constituency or a region. It is about the opportunity for an MEP to represent the interests of his constituency, or his region, rather than the diktat of central party control.

We think that the system imposed by the Government is riddled with opportunities for cronyism and centralised party control. It is the system that is the most favourable to the bosses in the larger parties in any country in Europe. The Prime Minister has said that other countries in Europe use a closed list. That is true: some use it, but on a national rather than a regional system. The system that the Government are inflicting on us is more centralised and more party-controlled than any other system in Europe. It is bad for voters, bad for individual MEPs and bad for democracy in this country. We have said that we will not support it, and we maintain that position. There is a principle at stake, and we will adhere to it.

Mr. George Howarth: We are now debating Lords amendments to the Bill for the fifth time. I believe that the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) has taken part in four of the debates. I must tell him that my affection for him grows in inverse proportion to my comprehension of what he can possibly be talking about.

The right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) and his colleagues maintain the pretence that the other place is simply carrying out its proper function as a revising Chamber. Those who continue to advance that argument are either naive—and I venture to suggest that the right hon. Gentleman is not—or disingenuous. The continuing obstruction of the Bill—as Lord Williams of Mostyn made clear yesterday, as did Lord Callaghan: I was at the Bar of the House of Lords, and heard his speech—has gone beyond any legitimate function for a second Chamber. Let us make no mistake: the Lords are now involved in a highly party political game, although I suspect that many of them only dimly perceive it.

Conservative Members—most prominently, both today and in previous debates, the hon. Members for Worthing, West (Mr. Bottomley) and for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed)—would like to create the impression that Labour Members have been dragooned into supporting the Government on the issue. Any Government—the current Government no less than any of our recent predecessors—will defend legislation by using the whipping system, especially when, as in this case, they are delivering a manifesto promise. I make no apology for that.

Conservative Members like to present themselves as a happy band of amiable idealists, motivated simply by sincere constitutional concern. However, they have defended to the last ditch—or perhaps to the next-to-last ditch—the principle of a voting system that could allow the election of a candidate receiving fewer votes than those attracted by the most popular candidate.

In a speech to the House, on 3 March 1845, Disraeli said:

"The Conservative Government has always been an organised hypocrisy."

Now, 150 years later, we know that a Conservative Opposition also can be an organised hypocrisy.

Opposition Front Benchers simply will not admit that many of their own Back Benchers, in both the House and another place, concede privately not only that they are unhappy about events but that they are afraid to voice those concerns—[Laughter.] Conservative Members laugh. Several Conservative Members have conceded privately to me, and to others, that they are afraid of letting the Euro-sceptic genie out of the bottle. That is what they are afraid of.

We are witnessing an organised hypocrisy in sharp focus, combining the forces of the unelected and the unelectable, who are pitting themselves against the House of Commons and the Government, to try to defeat nothing more than a sensible piece of democratic modernisation.

Today, for the fifth time, the House will by an overwhelming majority reject the Lords amendments. I ask the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) and other Conservative Members by what right they and the hereditary peers in the other place combine to defy—

Mr. Lansley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Howarth: I shall not give way; I was in the middle of a sentence.

By what right do they and hereditary peers combine to defy the will of a democratically elected House of Commons? There is no such right, save their own squalid attempts—for political purposes; they are not issues of great principle—to thwart the Bill and this place.

Mr. Lansley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Howarth: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Let us see them for what they truly are: a creaking and pathetic relic of another age. They are fooling no one. On this Bill, Conservative Members have proved themselves to be out of time, out of place and out of office. It is now abundantly clear that they will stay so for a very long time.

Northern Ireland Bill (Programme) (No. 2)

7.8 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Paul Murphy): I beg to move,

That the Order [17th July] relating to the Northern Ireland Bill (Programme) be supplemented as follows—

Lords Amendments

1. Proceedings on Consideration of Lords Amendments shall be completed at this day's sitting and shall, if not previously concluded, be brought to a conclusion four hours after the commencement of the proceedings.

2.—(1) This paragraph applies for the purpose of bringing proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1.

(2) The Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question already proposed from the Chair and not yet decided.

(3) If that Question is for the amendment of a Lords Amendment the Speaker shall then put forthwith—

(a) the Question on any further amendment to the Lords Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown, and

(b) the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House agrees or disagrees with the Lords in the Amendment or (as the case may be) in the Amendment as amended.

(4) The Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining Lords Amendments as appear to the Speaker to involve questions of Privilege.

(5) The Speaker shall then put forthwith—

(a) the Question on any Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown to a Lords Amendment, and

(b) the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House agrees or disagrees with the Lords in the Amendment or (as the case may be) in the Amendment as amended.

(6) The Speaker shall then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House disagrees with the Lords in a Lords Amendment.

(7) The Speaker shall then put forthwith with respect to the Lords Amendments designated by the Speaker which have not been disposed of the Question, That this House agrees with the Lords in those Amendments.

(8) The Speaker shall then put forthwith the Question, That this House agrees with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Amendments.

(9) As soon as the House has agreed or disagreed with the Lords in any of their Amendments, or disposed of an Amendment relevant to a Lords Amendment which has been disagreed to, the Speaker shall put forthwith a separate Question on any other Amendment which is moved by a Minister of the Crown and relevant to the Lords Amendment.

(10) The Speaker shall put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for the appointment, nomination and quorum of a Committee to draw up Reasons and the appointment of its Chairman.

(11) Proceedings under this paragraph shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

Supplemental

3. A Committee appointed to draw up Reasons shall report before the conclusion of the sitting.

4. Standing Order No. 15(1) (Exempted business) shall apply to proceedings on Consideration of the Lords Amendments for any part of the period of four hours after the commencement of the proceedings which falls after Ten o'clock.

I acknowledge that this is an unusual Bill, proceeding to an unusual timetable. However, I believe that the Bill and the manner of its passing reflect the wishes of the majority of hon. Members, although I know that some have grave doubts about the timetable and the Bill—doubts that we all respect. The dilemma that the Government faced before the summer was that, if we were to meet the target of having the Bill ready to come into effect at the end of January, there was no opportunity for extensive consultation before it was introduced. Had we had such consultation, we should not have been able to put the Bill to the House in this Session.

I believe that we were right to introduce the Bill before the summer. The Government have done all that we can to make up for the adverse consequences of the timetable. The main amendments before us reflect our undertaking on Third Reading to reflect and consult further. We took note of points made in debates here before the summer, along with those made in another place since then. We have held the intensive consultations that we promised with the Northern Ireland parties, including the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, which have continued through a long series of meetings, in which I personally have been involved.

We have also had many meetings with others. We have been ready, of course, to meet all interested Members, whether they supported the agreement or opposed it. We have also met the representatives of many outside interests. All the most significant amendments that we propose today have therefore, as I promised the House, been the subject of consultation with the key Northern Ireland parties, including those represented here, and with hon. Members from parties in Great Britain.

I believe that, as a result of our consultations, we have a much better Bill, which is a more faithful reflection of the agreement. We have augmented its provisions substantially in the areas of human rights and equality, and in strands 2 and 3 in particular. There are also, inevitably in so complex a Bill, many technical adjustments, so we have many drafting amendments made in the other place to deal with. The fundamentals of the Bill, however, are unchanged.

Although there are a good many amendments before us, the key ones will be widely familiar among hon. Members who take an interest in Northern Ireland affairs. Members who are interested will also have read closely the reports of debates in another place, and I hope that the note about the amendments that I made available last week may have been of some help to the House.

This Session has been significantly prolonged by the proceedings on the Bill. Both Houses have put themselves out considerably to deal with legislation that is hugely significant in the history of Northern Ireland. We are now at the end of the Session, and time is very limited—and because of our previous business today, we are all aware that there are still other pressing matters, which are also of great concern to hon. Members, to be cleared up.

We therefore believe that it is right to timetable the present stage of the Bill, so as to give the House an opportunity to pronounce on the Lords amendments, but also to permit other business of interest to the House to be properly dealt with.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): I could not go along with the Minister when he said that everything possible had been done to consult people and give some basis of democracy for the presentation of the Bill. Amazingly, about 450 amendments have been made to it since it left the House in the summer. That must be a record.

Now that we have come here tonight to speak of those matters, it is interesting to see that the First Minister designate and his deputy, although they are both Members of this House, are not even present. The leader of the Social Democratic and Labour party is not here either. That shows that everything has already been decided.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): I am here.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Yes, the hon. Gentleman is here, and he is worth an army—regiments, battalions and all—on his own.

I am simply drawing attention to the fact that everything has already been concluded. We all know that what the Government want will take place no matter what arguments are advanced; it is a foregone conclusion. As a representative from Northern Ireland, I must protest at the way in which the issue has been managed. If the Government had dealt with the future of any other part of the United Kingdom, over such an important matter as devolved government, as they are dealing with the future of Northern Ireland and its people, Members representing other localities would class it as an outrageous insult to be treated in that fashion.

Of course we understand about the timetable, but it is the result of something of which the House should have taken cognisance. Everybody knew that there would be a row about the elections to the European Parliament. I have been a Member of that Parliament, and I would like to have seen how the Labour Members from Strasbourg would have voted here tonight. I have had their ear for the past three months, and they have been telling me how they feel about the way in which things have been going. A row has been brewing.

Why should Northern Ireland suffer because of that? Why should Northern Ireland's representatives not have the opportunity to deal with matters on which we have made representations? The Minister may have had many meetings with the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister designate, but he has not had many meetings with the parties. At least, if he has had as many with other parties as he has had with my party, he will not have had to go to too many meetings. There was one discussion on one simple issue, then that was left, and when we came back we had a discussion on other issues.

The Minister wrote to the Opposition spokesman, the right hon. Member for Bracknell (Mr. MacKay), about an "unprecedented and far reaching consultation process".

I do not think that anyone on the Opposition Benches occupied by Members from Northern Ireland tonight would agree with that.

There are many points to which I would like to draw the attention of the House. The issue most commonly discussed in Northern Ireland is the fact that the Prime Minister said that if people were not satisfied, and he was not satisfied, with what was happening, and legislation was introduced, the problems would be dealt with in that legislation.

We all know about the five pledges, the substantial points, that the Prime Minister made. I notice that not one of those has been reinforced. Everybody in Northern Ireland knows that it was because of those promises that the result of the referendum turned out as it did. However, that result was undermined after the elections, in which 28 Unionist Members who opposed the system were elected, and only 28 who voted with the First Minister designate and his deputy. That shows plainly that there was opposition to what was taking place.

There are many issues affecting people in Northern Ireland at the moment. What will the Minister say about the prisoner releases? When we read in the paper that someone sentenced to 1,000 years for multiple murder is out in 16 years, we are alarmed about the future moral situation in our country. Time should have been given for a proper debate on that issue.

What about decommissioning? We have just heard from one of the leaders of Sinn Fein that that will never take place until there is a united Ireland—so it is clear that there will be no movement on that issue.

I have already spoken about the Prime Minister's pledges, but there are many other matters in the Bill that need to be considered. Of course, many amendments have been made to deal with some of the factors, but I must make the point that we are setting in place a system of government that will stay there until the next election. So far as I can see, there can be no change, and the Bill copper-fastens the First Minister and his deputy in place.

We were told that there would be no cherry-picking of the agreement, but anyone who reads the document will notice that there has been not only cherry-picking but the planting of a few more cherry trees that bear a different type of fruit. I see the Minister smiling, because he knows that that is only too true.

Perhaps the Minister will tell us something about the department of the centre? Will it be based on a similar department in Downing street? Has this proved to be so good that the Government have decided that the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) and the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) need such a system?

The tragedy is that we have an Assembly that is not meeting and is not having Committee meetings. Committees could have been handling cross-border matters, the civic forum and education, but all those have been relegated by the two Ministers to nice little ad hoc Committees at which those who are opposed to the agreement have no say. We believe that those matters should be discussed in the Assembly, but they are not being discussed.

Much was said about the d'Hondt appointment of department chiefs, and it was argued that that was the only way. Why is there to be a departure from the d'Hondt rule when it comes to the appointment of assistant Ministers, or Ministers of State—or whatever they are to be called? It will not matter what the electorate say—the First Minister designate and his deputy will appoint those Ministers. That is a radical departure from the agreement, and it is totally out of order. All appointments will rest on the electoral strength distributed by the d'Hondt method—except junior Ministers. That will bring in the power of patronage, and the First Minister designate and his deputy will have total power.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but I must remind him—as he would wish to keep in order—that we are discussing a programme motion, which does not provide a platform for a mini-Second Reading debate.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I am not trying to make a Second Reading speech. I am saying that these matters need to be argued and that we need time to argue them. I have not sat in this House for 30 years without becoming aware of the point that you are making, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am arguing, legitimately, that these matters depart from the agreement and from statements made by the Prime Minister and other Ministers. As those departures have occurred, we should have time to debate them. Therefore, why should we be limited? That is a good argument.

I must mention the matters that concern the people of Northern Ireland, who want their public representatives to have a forum in which they can be discussed. The Assembly is not meeting to discuss the issues, and never had a real discussion on any of them. At the first meeting of the Assembly, a resolution was passed that the two Ministers should have the opportunity to consult on two issues—cross-border matters and the civic forum. Instead, the two Ministers have not produced a report on those matters, but have gone into other areas—including education, where they have made some vivid changes from documents that I have in my possession.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): My hon. Friend told the House that he has been a Member here for 30 years. Can he remember in all that time a worse piece of proposed legislation than this? Is it not a dog's breakfast of a Bill? It brings discredit to the Government, to this House and to the whole democratic p[illegible]

Rev. Ian Paisley: I might have an even more picturesque description of the Bill than a dog's breakfast, but I will not get into that. I agree fully with my hon. Friend. Mr. Deputy Speaker, I know that you have not called me to order, so you must think that I am now in order. I will now proceed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I, too, have been in the House for a considerable number of years, and the hon. Gentleman and I might agree that there is a narrower focus for a programme motion. I hope that he would accept the narrower interpretation, rather than the wider interpretation on which I thought he was embarked.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I am on narrow ground and, unfortunately, it is getting narrower. If the Ministers had had any more time to make more than a dog's breakfast of the Bill, I do not know what we would have called it.

Matters of grave concern to the people of Northern Ireland need to be elucidated and debated, but we will not have time. The amendment paper is nearly as big as the Bill itself. The amendments are presented to us tonight, and we are supposed to nod our heads. However, we will not be nodding our heads. We will use every minute that is given to us by the House for a thorough and proper discussion of the matters.

It would suit me to say, "What is the use?" and to go home, but I am a democrat, and this is the only forum that the elected people of Northern Ireland have at the moment. It is only right that we discuss the matters and bring them to the attention of the House. It may look to others to be a useless exercise but, as democrats, this is what we have been called to do.

I am glad that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, realise that I am in order. I am pleased about that, and I will try to the best of my ability to keep in order.

Human rights matters—which may be of interest to all sections of the House—need to be discussed fully, but there will be very little time to discuss anything at all. I suppose that most people in the House do not even know what this is about—perhaps two or three have some vague idea. We have a mass of amendments from another place, and a mass of amendments passed through the other place which were tabled by the Government.

I believed that we were to get rid of Orders in Council. The House should look at clauses 71 and 72 and ask itself some questions. The Bill is cementing the role of Dublin in the internal affairs of Northern Ireland, and guarantees a place for IRA-Sinn Fein at the very heart of the Government.

We have had an interesting week, in which we have seen the attitude of the Prime Minister to Saddam Hussein. However, terrorists in Northern Ireland—a bit closer to home—tried to kill the whole British Government on one occasion, but a different attitude is being taken to them. The Prime Minister is not saying that it is the Government's business to put those people out of business—it is to put them in government.

The Government may not like it, but we have to discuss and dispute this matter. Therefore, I oppose the guillotine. It is an insult to the people of Northern Ireland to tell their representatives that the debate is to be guillotined and that they will not be given an opportunity to discuss matters that have taken many hours to discuss elsewhere.

7.29 pm

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): I must start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, and his colleagues on the degree with which they have listened to representations made to them by hon. Members on both sides of the House and by many parties in Northern Ireland, and for the careful consideration that they have given those representations, some of which appear in the Bill. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that.

The Bill was prepared in considerable haste after the passing of the Good Friday agreement, which meant that many matters had to be fleshed out in another place and we could refer to them only in passing when the Bill was before this House before the recess. I for one acknowledge the progress that has been made and very much welcome it. However, I hope that we will have sufficient time to discuss some matters about which I am still concerned. We are debating the programme motion, and I shall describe the areas on which we should have some sort of debate.

One matter that we should discuss is the limitation that my noble Friend, Lord Williams of Mostyn, put on the powers of the European Commission on Human Rights to have referred to it Westminster legislation concerning matters in Northern Ireland. I could deal with that matter and the arguments that surround it at greater length. It is a matter to which we should pay attention. Secondly, we should pay attention to the commission's right to subpoena witnesses and to require discovery of documents.

Thirdly, we should consider the most iniquitous matter. I regret having to use such a word, but that is what I feel about what the Government are doing in seeking to get around the Tinnelly case. It is outrageous that people should not know the facts on which their livelihoods and careers are to be jeopardised, and that those should be secret. It is wrong that counsel should be appointed by the accusor—in this case, the Government—but that they should have no responsibility to the applicant or show any care towards them. It is also wrong that people should not be able to have an advocate of their choice to represent them at all times.

In treason cases and cases held in camera, people know the evidence that is being used against them. This Bill would deny people that right. It is certain to cause considerable worry among those at the Bar, and I hope that we will have time to discuss the matter, given the programme laid down. If we do not have time, I have at least made my feelings known on the matter and we could consider it in more detail if we get that far in the Bill.

To return to my starting point, in spite of some of the problems that I still have with the Bill, I recognise that the Government have moved considerably to tidy it up, expand it and do something about the human rights provisions and the various matters to which we drew their attention in conflict, or which were not fully implementing what was contained in the Belfast agreement. We should recognise that fact and welcome it. I think that I am entitled to spend much of my time in the 45 minutes allowed for this brief debate in congratulating the Government and in coming forward to meet them. They have done a great deal, and we applaud them for it.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): I do not suppose that anyone who heard the Minister introduce the Bill a few moments ago has ever heard someone at the Dispatch Box do so with less enthusiasm and more apologetically, and rightly so.

It is no secret that I am normally coming from a different direction from the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) as regards the Assembly, but on this occasion, I find myself entirely at one with him about the way in which the Bill is being handled.

It is astonishing that a Bill that requires us to consider about 420 amendments, according to my quick count, at this stage could have been brought before the House in the first place. It is all very well for the Minister to say that that is an indication of the extent to which he has listened to representations. The base from which those have had to be made must have been pretty low to require 420 amendments, even when one includes those of a technical nature. Most of us will find that disheartening and frustrating, given our efforts to move the political process forward in Northern Ireland.

How can we possibly consider seriously that number of amendments in four hours, however they are grouped? It is an impossibility, and it shows a disregard for the interests of Northern Ireland.

Last night, when I spoke in the debate on prisoners, I said that it was a pity that the Government had not displayed the same enthusiasm for the implementation of the Stormont agreement as it had displayed for its achievement and putting it in place. I can do no better than repeat that remark this evening and suggest that not only this Government, but the Government of the Irish Republic have shown disregard for the anxiety of the greater number of people in Northern Ireland in the manner in which they have gone about the business of implementing what is, for all of us, a difficult and complex agreement.

The Minister probably knows the pressures facing my local hospital at the moment. I have to return home this evening to my constituency, so I hope that he will accept my apology as I will not be here for his reply. In his response to the points that I and others have made about the time limit set aside for consideration of the Bill at this stage, I hope that he will also find an opportunity to point out to us where we stand as regards the Prime Minister's obligation to the leader of my party on 13 May—I raised this point last night and did not receive a response. The Prime Minister said:

> "Yes—I intend to make it clear that the commitment and the obligations in the agreement must all be fulfilled and that no one can choose to fulfil some part of the agreement and not others."—[Official Report, 13 May 1998; Vol. 312, c. 365.]

It is a matter of grave disquiet to all of us that it appears that the Government have not been assiduous in ensuring that the Prime Minister's guarantee, which was given to the House at the Dispatch Box, is being honoured as it should be and in the spirit in which it should be.

Mr. Robert McCartney (North Down): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way and I appreciate the exigencies that require him to return home, but will he say whether he would have voted against the motion and other measures if he had remained?

Mr. Maginnis: Sometimes I regret giving way to the hon. and learned Gentleman. The sophistry that he brings to the debate is typical of him.

The confidence of people in Northern Ireland—the very people on whom we depend to make the process work—is being undermined by the haphazard way in which the Bill has been presented to the House. My party most certainly cannot concur with the proposal to guillotine debate.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): I very much welcome the Bill as amended by the other place. The number of amendments reflects the undertakings of the Minister and his colleagues to consult widely in Northern Ireland, among both the political parties and the many other community bodies. I am pleased that he has consulted so widely and so well that the Bill, as amended, will correctly interpret the Good Friday agreement not only in words, but in spirit.

The Bill is not a dog's dinner, but a beano; it is a feast to replace the democratic deficit that has existed in Northern Ireland for many years. The Unionist parties constantly acknowledged that democratic deficit, but now that we have the opportunity to establish the most democratic, most consultative and most all-inclusive Assembly, the Bill is rejected. That is a great pity.

The many amendments, some of them substantive, relate to matters that were signalled to the Minister by the House; the Minister has responded to those concerns over the summer. One or two items require attention, especially the procedures of the Equality Commission and the powers and attributes of the Human Rights Commission. The issue of security certificates is a particular concern for me—the Tinnelly company, which my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) mentioned, was based in my constituency, and suffered between 1988 and last summer in trying to achieve justice.

So that other hon. Members can participate in and deal with the matters that I mentioned in the main debates, I conclude by once again thanking the Minister and his colleagues for the widespread consultation and for responding to the requests from all the parties in the debates in July. I believe that the concerns that were expressed are faithfully and fully reflected in the amendments that were made in another place.

Mr. Robert McCartney (North Down): The Bill is probably the most important piece of constitutional legislation on Northern Ireland for almost 80 years. It is placed before the House this evening with more than 400 amendments—curiously enough, those amendments were made by the other place, that much derided Chamber that people think acts undemocratically. The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) has described the Bill as a dog's breakfast, and the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) has called it a beano. The Beano is a comic, and the Bill certainly has many comic features.

I want to deal with some of the issues raised by the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley). The Bill is built on the Belfast agreement. That agreement was endorsed in a referendum that was conducted in a manner that would not have met Lord Neill's requirements and would have been declared illegal in the Republic of Ireland, which has its own legislation on such matters. However, the agreement was endorsed largely because it was believed that, as the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) said, pledges given by the Prime Minister would be reflected in the legislation.

None of those pledges has been honoured. People who have committed the most hideous and serious crimes have been released. Promises have been made to the political wings of terror—to parties that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland described as inextricably entwined with terrorism. That includes a party that may be allotted two seats on the Executive under the d'Hondt principles.

The Bill will create allegedly democratic institutions for Northern Ireland by placing on the Executive political representatives of an organisation that declares: "Unless the demands of our political representatives are met, we reserve the right to use political violence to achieve their objectives. We are determined to retain the weaponry that will enable us to do so."

Against that background, it is vital that all aspects of the Bill can be debated in the greatest possible detail. However, we have been allowed only four hours. Given my professional experience in reading legal documents, I have no hesitation in saying—I think that all hon. Members would agree, if they were truly honest with themselves—that it is impossible to have any real discussion or analysis of the amendments in that time.

We should not dismiss the amendments as purely technical, or say that they are only about housekeeping. Many of them are central to the future of democratic and constitutional government in Northern Ireland. They are about the government of two communities and, if they are to be successful, they need to be treated with great sensitivity and wisdom. The fact that they are being dispatched in four hours is a democratic and constitutional disgrace.

In Northern Ireland, we are familiar with being treated as people in no other part of the United Kingdom would be treated. In some of our prisons, it is as though the lunatics have taken over the asylum. A recent report by Her Majesty's inspector of prisons highlighted the totally unacceptable way in which those prisons were organised. The Maze prison was Northern Ireland in microcosm.

The Bill ignores entirely the fact that parties that are to be in government continue to be in charge of organisations that murder and injure people and destroy property. If that is democracy, it is of a very curious kind, but we shall have only four hours to discuss the Bill, and that is an even bigger disfigurement of the democratic process.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley): I am perplexed by Unionist Members' arguments. We are here to discuss amendments to a Bill that seeks to implement an agreement that was discussed at length and endorsed by the people of Northern Ireland. The question before us is whether the Bill properly implements the agreement.

Rev. Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Surely we are discussing whether the time to debate the matter should be limited. We are not dealing with the matter itself, and the hon. Lady should know that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I think that the hon. Lady will have heard him.

Judy Mallaber: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I realise that the debate is much narrower than was apparent from Unionist Members' contributions.

I have been incredibly impressed by the way in which the Minister has been prepared to listen to everybody and has been extremely patient in considering amendments arising from our previous debates. He has sought to take on board people's views on whether the agreement is properly implemented in the legislation. There has been considerable discussion, and I do not know of anyone who has sought a meeting with him to discuss the amendments who has not been heard. To suggest that there has not been proper discussion of the agreement, the Bill and all the amendments is simply not correct.

The four hours before us are not meant to be a time in which to raise yet again a whole lot of issues that are not in the Bill and not covered in the amendments. The question before us is, narrowly, whether four hours is sufficient time to discuss amendments that have already been considered in great detail.

People on all sides of the argument have had the opportunity to make their views known to the Minister, and I want to place on record my appreciation of the time that has been given to discussing the parts about which I have been concerned; if my hon. Friend has given so much time to those areas that I know of, I am sure that he must have given considerable time to all the other areas.

We have enough time for a discussion tonight. I am not trying to widen the debate: that was done by some Unionist Members who have tried to introduce a range of subjects that are not relevant to our discussion in the next four hours. I support the motion.

7.52 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): I, too, offer my compliments to Ministers.

Representatives of voluntary associations have put the point to me over and over again that the civic forum will need to be given adequate resources if it is not to become a talking shop—

It being three quarters of an hour after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to the Order [17 July].

Northern Ireland Bill [Money] (No. 2)

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

8.4 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Adam Ingram): I beg to move,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Northern Ireland Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any expenditure incurred by the Lord Chancellor under the Act.

The second money resolution is required as a result of changes made to the Bill since it left the House that make the Lord Chancellor liable to incur certain expenditure. The Lord Chancellor was not covered by the original money resolution made when the Bill was first introduced here.

Expenditure may be incurred in two discrete areas, the first of which relates to the tribunal which will be set up under the Bill to consider appeals against national security certificates. Provision has been made in amendment No. 348 for the payment of remuneration, allowances, pensions and gratuities to members of the tribunal, and compensation to former members in special circumstances. The amendment also provides for the payment of remuneration and expenses to the tribunal's staff and others employed by the tribunal. We shall have an opportunity to discuss the amendment later.

Provision has been made in Lords amendment No. 347 for the second area of expenditure, which is the payment of the legal fees that may be incurred by a defendant in criminal proceedings in which a devolution issue arises and for which he is granted legal aid. The additions to the cost of the Bill are both modest and necessary, and I hope that the House will support the resolution.

8.5 pm

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): My hon. Friend the Minister has given no indication of the actual cost that is likely to be incurred in respect of the tribunal. I should be grateful if he did so.

I also ask him to consider whether we want to finance an organisation where the applicant will not see the evidence on which a decision about his future has been based; the tribunal can sit in secret and neither he nor his legal representative will be present. A barrister may be appointed from the Northern Ireland Bar to represent him, but that barrister will have no duty of care whatsoever to the person whom he is supposed to represent, and will have limitations placed on what information he may or may not give to the person whom he is supposed to represent; and if the certificate is upheld, it shall be conclusive proof of everything it contains.

Do we in this House really want to vote money for such a tribunal? I should have thought it a matter about which Members of Parliament who are also members of the legal profession would be somewhat concerned. It would appear that certain members of the Northern Ireland Bar—those who are regarded as the good, the just and the perfect—will be put on a separate panel, from which the Attorney-General will choose people to represent applicants; whereas others will not, and even though they are representing a client they will not be allowed to sit in on the tribunal.

8.7 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): Will the Minister tell us something about those former members of the tribunal to whom he referred?

8.8 pm

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): Will the Minister tell us whether the Government have calculated the cost of the component parts of the legislation? For example, what do they envisage will be the likely cost of the north-south bodies, the implementation bodies and the British-Irish Council? Do they think it sensible to have junior Ministers at additional cost, when the Bill already allows for up to 10 Ministers to deal with the existing six Departments in Northern Ireland? Those appear to be matters of expenditure which, had the Government been left to deal with Northern Ireland on their own, they would have told us were not sensible or prudent.

If the Minister has quantified the expenditure in each of those areas, can he justify it?

8.9 pm

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) made a point about the principle behind the tribunal and I hope that we will have the opportunity to discuss that important matter in greater detail. I know that he is especially concerned. He asked specifically about the costs of the tribunal, but those are hard to establish because they will be driven by the number of cases that the tribunal handles every year. We anticipate two cases per year, at an average cost of £11,500. I said that the costs are likely to be modest, but they will be determined by events. Like everything else that the Government do, we have to make our best assessment; if there are more cases, they will have to be funded.

Mr. McNamara: Did my hon. Friend give an estimate of £11,500 for two cases, which would be £5,750 a case? I may have misheard him.

Mr. Ingram: I said that the cost had been estimated at £11,500 per case, but if I have misled my hon. Friend I am sorry. The cost will be driven by the number of cases, and it may escalate or it may be zero, if there are no cases.

The hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) raised the question of former members of the tribunal. Our proposals are modelled on the approach to the Special Immigration Appeals Commission, and the order allows contributions to be made to pensions. That will give us flexibility to deal with special circumstances, but those costs are also likely to be modest.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) raised issues outwith the terms of the order. I do not know whether he was at the Assembly meeting last week, when my hon. Friend the Minister of State presented the budget. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but it was an important meeting, and it is a matter of regret that he did not hear the full explanation given by my hon. Friend of the budget and the costs that will devolve to the new Assembly.

Indications were given in the report to the Assembly of the costs that would fall on it as a consequence of some of the new bodies that will arise from the agreement. Costs relating to the British-Irish Council will be met by the two Governments, but they will be modest, given the frequency and length of the meetings. Those costs are a necessary component of meeting the Government's obligations under the agreement.

Question put and agreed to.

Northern Ireland Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 4

TRANSFERRED, EXCEPTED AND RESERVED MATTERS

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 2, leave out lines 4 to 7 and insert—

(""excepted matter" means any matter falling within a description specified in Schedule 2;

"reserved matter" means any matter falling within a description specified in Schedule 3;

"transferred matter" means any matter which is not an excepted or reserved matter.")

8.13 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Paul Murphy): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 56 and 222 to 270.

Mr. Murphy: Without touching on the time allowed for the amendments, which was properly dealt with in a previous debate, I wish to touch on the nature of the amendments that the House will consider in the next few hours. Most of them are drafting or technical amendments, and I shall refer to them in detail shortly.

We will deal with three types of amendment tonight. Some are essentially technical. It was necessary that the other place dealt with the changes because the Bill was drawn up in haste. Indeed, I pay tribute to the parliamentary draftsmen and to all those involved in drawing up the legislation in such a short time.

The Bill was designed to enact an agreement and, inevitably, detailed, technical amendments were necessary because it was drafted in such a short time. Amendments came before the House and the other place earlier in the Bill's progress and hon. Members who were present for those debates will recall that my ministerial colleagues and I said that they would be necessary. This Session has lasted as long as it has because of the nature of that parliamentary process and the significance that the House of Commons attaches to the agreement.

The second type of amendments relate specifically to the points made during the Bill's passage through Parliament. Members on both sides of the House withdrew amendments on the basis that the Secretary of State and my ministerial colleagues and I would think again. We reflected on the points that had been made, and then Lord Dubs introduced amendments in the other place. Many of the amendments therefore result from representations made to the Government by hon. Members and others.

The third type of amendments arise as a direct result of consultation. Some thought that the consultation was not adequate, and others have kindly said that they thought it was. One cannot satisfy all the people all the time, but hon. Members will understand that my door was always open; and if any hon. Members wished to discuss with me any issue arising from the Bill, they were able to do so. Many meetings were held with parties, hon. Members and others who expressed an interest in the Bill. In 11 years in the House, I have never experienced a similar level of consultation. Indeed, although we had consultation over the Scottish and Welsh legislation, it was not the same as on the Bill for Northern Ireland, because it enacts the agreement.

In the end, the Government had to decide on the form that the amendments would take, and we have sometimes pleased some people and sometimes displeased them. If there was no clear sign in the agreement, we had to try to work out whether we could have obtained a consensus on a particular issue had the talks continued. That was sometimes difficult to discover. In many cases, and sometimes on controversial issues, there was unanimity, and I shall list those cases as I go through the amendments before us. I shall tell the House on which amendments every party in Northern Ireland that wished to consult with me agreed. Sometimes, some parties disagreed, but that was not always the case—it is important to put that on record because of the large number of amendments. I sat for several years on the shadow Front Bench, and I should have been the first to exactly the opposite if I had thought that that was not so. We are reflecting concerns as far as we can.

Amendment No. 1 is a drafting amendment, which makes it clear that any matters may be transferred out of schedule 3, which lists reserved matters, that fall within the description given there. Amendment No. 56 creates a new clause out of the old clause 20(4)(b), the drafting of which was defective. Amendments Nos. 222 to 270 bear on schedules 2 and 3. We have had to do some tidying up of those schedules, and a number of the amendments are purely drafting or technical points, or are designed to clarify matters that were perhaps open to uncertainty.

Other amendments add new matters to the schedules, including new subjects such as the National Minimum Wage Act 1998, the Parades Commission for Northern Ireland and "assisted areas" under the Industrial Development Act 1982. In other cases, we have had to bring some descriptions up to date, including those of international relations, broadcasting and telecommunications, including the internet. In one or two other cases, it has made sense to move matters from one category into another. For example, we thought it right to move the regulation of activities in outer space from the reserved to the excepted category. That was not, of course, a matter much discussed in the agreement or at the talks.

Amendments Nos. 242 and 270 rationalise the way in which the provisions of the Bill are safeguarded against modification by the Assembly. Most of the amendments are technical.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): I agree with the Minister, and I congratulate him on the extraordinary degree of consultation that has taken place. I am not able to speak for other parties, but the Liberal Democrats thank the Government for being genuinely willing to listen. More to the point, they were willing to act on at least some of the concerns that we raised, and that is a testament to the Minister's genuine willingness to achieve results. All parties will accept that he spent most of his summer, as he said he would, listening, and responding accordingly.

We still have concerns about some amendments. My intention is to highlight only a small number of them this evening. The Bill has been substantially debated, both here and in the other place. I do not share the concerns expressed by some hon. Members that there is not enough time for debate tonight. That is one reason why we supported the Government earlier.

I shall mention only one amendment in this group. The Minister has already mentioned it, and it may seem a little crazy of me to bring it up again. Amendment No. 241, as he rightly said, makes regulation of activities in outer space an excepted matter. One may think that uncontroversial, but I should highlight the fact that, believe it or not, Armagh observatory has played an increasingly important part in some space research, specifically on the asteroid threat—the impact of a heavenly body on the earth, which could cause catastrophic damage, and which could wipe out a vast proportion of the human race. It may seem insane to raise concern about that, and I do not expect the Minister to alter the Bill at this late stage, but advances in technology may make it possible for the Northern Ireland Assembly seriously to consider matters relating to outer space in 30 or 50 years' time. The Armagh observatory may then be actively involved in such activities.

I raise the matter only because Armagh observatory plays such a prominent role through experts such as Mr. Chambers, Bill Napier and others. I merely want to put the matter on record so that it may be read in the future when this concern is more prelevant. Perhaps Armagh observatory will thus be able to play its part in what will become an increasingly important scientific endeavour.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): I want to ask a question about amendment No. 240, which refers to "regulation of sea fishing outside the Northern Ireland zone (except in relation to Northern Ireland fishing boats)", which are defined in the way we would expect them to be. May I plead for parity of esteem among the fishing industries of Northern Ireland, Scotland and England?

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North): And the Isle of Man.

Dr. Godman: As my hon. Friend says, the Isle of Man should be included, too. The Minister knows that the Northern Ireland fishing industry—specifically the catching sector—is much smaller than the Scottish industry. I seek an assurance that fishing communities in Northern Ireland will enjoy parity of esteem with Scottish, English and Welsh communities when negotiations take place in Brussels and in London on total allowable catches and other such matters. My hon. Friend may wish to write to me, but I seek an assurance in principle for now.

Mr. Paul Murphy: If my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) is patient, he will hear me speak about the fishing industry under the next group of amendments. I hope that I shall not have to write to him.

I am grateful for the comments by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik). I, too, have visited Armagh observatory. It was the first observatory I had been to, and it was an extremely valuable visit. The observatory is a great educational asset for Northern Ireland. Activities in outer space have been moved from the reserved to the excepted category because that is the case in Scotland. Amendment No. 241 refers to launching into space, so that it would be possible, eventually, for Northern Ireland—and Scotland for that matter—to take part in such activities.

Putting on for a moment my other hat, as a Finance Minister, I should add that I have not set aside any money for such activities in the forthcoming financial year.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Clause 5

ACTS OF THE NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 2, line 41, after ("6") insert (", (Entrenched enactments)")

Mr. Paul Murphy: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 3 to 24, 26 and 271.

Mr. Murphy: The amendments provide a group of miscellaneous changes to part II of the Bill, which concerns legislative powers. They are, again, mostly of technical or drafting significance. I draw attention to two sets of amendments, both of which are based on the Scotland Bill. There are provisions, starting with amendment No. 11, to permit the Northern Ireland Assembly to regulate fishing in a Northern Ireland zone, and to allow it jurisdiction over Northern Ireland-licensed boats beyond that, which is the matter to which my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) referred earlier.

Amendment No. 11 relates to clause 6, and provides that

"Her Majesty may by Order in Council"— subject to affirmative resolution at Westminster—

"specify functions which are to be treated . . . as . . . exercisable in or as regards Northern Ireland."

That is one of several amendments throughout the Bill to permit the Northern Ireland authorities to regulate fishing in a Northern Ireland zone. The designation of the zone is provided for under amendment No. 219, and the Northern Ireland authorities could be given power as respects Northern Ireland-licensed boats, even outside the zone. The amendments parallel arrangements in the Scotland Bill.

There is also a procedure by which the Assembly can reconsider a Bill that has been referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council under clause 10, and which the Committee has then referred to the European Court.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 3 to 24 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 25, in page 6, line 26, leave out from ("contains") to end of line 27 and insert

("a provision which he considers—

(a) would be incompatible with any international obligations, with the interests of defence or national security or with the protection of public safety or public order; or

(b) would have an adverse effect on the operation of the single market in goods and services within the United Kingdom.").

8.30 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Adam Ingram): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 57 to 61.

Mr. Ingram: The amendments have two purposes: first, to ensure that the interests of defence, national security, public order and public safety are properly safeguarded under the new devolved arrangements in Northern Ireland and, secondly, to protect the operation of the single market in goods and services across the United Kingdom.

Amendment No. 25 provides that the Secretary of State may decline to submit an Assembly Bill for Royal Assent if she considers it to be incompatible with any international obligations, the interests of defence or national security, the protection of public safety or public order, or with the operation of the UK single market. Amendment No. 60 is closely related, and gives the Secretary of State power to revoke subordinate legislation for the same reasons.

Hon. Members will want to be aware that the Scotland Bill also contains provisions for ensuring that legislation meets international obligations and safeguards national security, so the amendments make the Bill compatible with the Scotland Bill, although the provisions are not directly equivalent.

It is worth while outlining the important principle of the single market in goods and services across the United Kingdom. Under European Community law, the Assembly and Northern Ireland Ministers will be required to meet obligations under EC single market legislation in transferred areas; that will include not discriminating against goods and services from any other member state of the European Union.

Community legislation enforces a single market between EU member states, but not necessarily within each member state. The amendments seek to fill that gap, since it is only right that goods and services from England, Wales and Scotland should be treated no less favourably than those from other EU member states.

Amendments Nos. 57 and 58 deal with the Secretary of State's power to direct that certain action be taken by Ministers or Departments or to direct that proposed action is not taken. When the Bill left the House previously, clause 20 enabled the Secretary of State to exercise that power only to comply with international obligations. The amendments extend that responsibility so that the interests of defence, national security, public order and public safety are also protected.

The Government consider the amendments to be important and necessary. It is a vital responsibility of Government to safeguard the interests of defence and national security and to protect public order and public safety. That responsibility extends throughout the United Kingdom and will continue to do so after devolution of powers to the Northern Ireland Assembly. The amendments ensure that the Secretary of State has a means of continuing to discharge her responsibilities in respect of those matters after devolution.

Although I of course hope that no situation would ever arise in which the interests of defence, national security, public order or public safety were in danger of being compromised, the nature of the subjects is such that it would be entirely inappropriate even to leave open that possibility. The consequences are potentially too serious. The amendments would allow the Secretary of State to act speedily if an urgent issue were to arise.

Clearly, it is not possible to describe all the circumstances in which such an issue may arise. Many areas to be governed by Assembly legislation will need to contain ancillary provisions on national security. For example, orders as diverse as the Litter Order 1993, the Food Safety Order 1991 and the Electricity Order 1991 have included provisions such as an override of the powers of entry to protect sensitive areas. We need to ensure that proper provisions continue to be made in that wide-ranging field.

I emphasise to the House that those provisions, by their very nature, will be used by the Government only as a last resort. If an issue were to arise which caused concern, every effort would be made to resolve it through consultation with the Northern Ireland Administration. If, and only if, that were not possible would the Secretary of State use that power of direction. Nevertheless, for the reasons that I have outlined, it is important that such a power is available. I commend the amendments to the House.

Clause 14

FIRST MINISTER AND DEPUTY FIRST MINISTER

Lords amendment: No. 27, in page 7, line 18, leave out from ("within") to ("elect") in line 19 and insert

("a period of six weeks beginning with its first meeting,").

Mr. Ingram: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 28 to 32.

Mr. Ingram: I shall deal with the amendments slightly out of order and speak first to amendments Nos. 29 and 30, which deal with concerns raised during earlier stages of the House's consideration of the Bill about the impact of a vacancy in the First Minister and Deputy First Minister posts.

As the Bill stood, the First Minister and Deputy First Minister needed to make decisions jointly. If one ceased to hold office, the other automatically did so too. That would then be followed by a new election for First Minister and Deputy First Minister.

That was considered during the proceedings on the Bill and concerns were raised by a number of Members, including the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble), my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) and my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman), whom I am pleased to see here this evening. He has followed the Bill through its many stages. Those Members suggested that the Bill could give rise to a vacuum at the centre of the devolved Government. The First Minister and Deputy

First Minister play an important role, and it would be awkward if the posts were vacant at a time when joint decisions were needed.

The new provisions prevent such a vacuum from occurring by enabling the First Minister and Deputy First Minister to appoint alternates from among the Northern Ireland Ministers to exercise functions during their absence through illness or incapacity or during a vacancy.

Under the amendments, if either the First Minister or the Deputy First Minister post fell vacant, the other would too, but the alternate and the remaining postholder would continue to exercise the functions of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister acting jointly in a caretaker capacity until a fresh election had been held. In the event of absence or incapacity, the amendments provide that the alternate would not be able to exercise the functions of the First Minister or Deputy First Minister for a period exceeding six weeks. That time would be used to deal with any concerns raised.

Amendments Nos. 27, 28, 31 and 32 clarify the Bill's provisions, making it clear that the Assembly is to elect a new First Minister and Deputy First Minister within six weeks of its first meeting or, in the case of a mid-term election, within six weeks of the vacancy. I commend the amendments to the House.

New clause

Lords amendment: No. 33, after clause 14, to insert the following new clause—Ministerial offices—

".—(1) The First Minister and the deputy First Minister acting jointly may at any time, and shall where subsection (2) applies, determine—

(a) the number of Ministerial offices to be held by Northern Ireland Ministers; and

(b) the functions to be exercisable by the holder of each such office.

(2) This subsection applies where provision is made by an Act of the Assembly for establishing a new Northern Ireland department or dissolving an existing one.

(3) In making a determination under subsection (1), the First Minister and the deputy First Minister shall ensure that the functions exercisable by those in charge of the different Northern Ireland departments existing at the date of the determination are exercisable by the holders of different Ministerial offices.

(4) The number of Ministerial offices shall not exceed 10 or such greater number as the Secretary of State may by order provide.

(5) A determination under subsection (1) shall not have effect unless it is approved by a resolution of the Assembly passed with cross-community support."

Mr. Paul Murphy: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 34 to 44 and 373.

Mr. Murphy: The amendments deal with a technical but extremely important part of the Bill—the workings of the d'Hondt formula for appointing Ministers. I had never heard of d'Hondt until I went into the talks process, but we hear of nothing else nowadays. As hon. Members know, d'Hondt refers to the system by which members of the Executive—the Ministers for Northern Ireland—will eventually be appointed. Essentially, they will be appointed on the basis of the electoral strength of their party as a consequence of the Assembly elections.

Many of the amendments that we are considering in this regard reflect points made during previous consideration in Committee and in the House on Report. Other amendments are technical, reflecting the complexity of the subject matter. As I said on Report and Third Reading, the provisions on the circumstances in which the d'Hondt formula should be re-run needed amendment in order to reflect the spirit of the agreement fully.

Amendment No. 33 sets out the circumstances in which the First Minister and Deputy First Minister may make a determination, as it is called, setting out the number of ministerial posts, and the functions exercisable by the holders of those posts. Those determinations need to be approved by the Assembly on a cross-community basis.

The First Minister and Deputy First Minister will be able to introduce determinations when they choose, but they must do so if legislation has been passed creating or dissolving a Northern Ireland department, as it would clearly be wrong to create a new department without ensuring that it had a Minister in charge of it.

In addition to new determinations to reflect what we might call the machinery of government changes, the Bill also needs provision for the d'Hondt formula to be rerun within the existing framework of departmental responsibility—a matter that was of great interest to hon. Members in Committee.

The series of amendments to clause 15, and in particular amendment No. 34, concern the circumstances in which the formula would be re-run. As hon. Members will know by now, the d'Hondt formula is a means of allocating posts proportionally. The formula will obviously therefore need to be re-run after every Assembly election to take account of new electoral mandates. In addition, amendment No. 34 provides for re-runs in other circumstances—for example, when a party is excluded from office, leaving its seats vacant, or when a party's period of exclusion comes to an end and its entitlement to hold office has to be accommodated.

The Assembly will also be able to set out in its Standing Orders other circumstances when d'Hondt could be re-run. It is for the Members of the Assembly to determine what those circumstances will be. I understand that the Standing Orders Committee of the Assembly is examining the issues and will continue to do so.

The other amendments deal with technical issues, such as what happens when a party declines to provide a nominee for a post to which it is entitled, a definition of a registered political party and a provision that nominating officers may delegate their powers only to officers of their party who are also members of the Assembly.

Amendments Nos. 37 and 38 are particularly loved, I guess, by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik), who referred to an anorak when he spoke about them previously, as only he understood the algebraic formulas. I now refer to S and how to define it. It is the figure in the d'Hondt formula reflecting the number of seats that the party has in the Assembly.

The revised definition—I am delighted that we do not have to deal with this in the Welsh Assembly—defines S as the number of seats that a party held at the first meeting of the Assembly. We believe that it is right in determining party representation in the Executive Committee to base the calculation on the electoral mandate that the party received in the Assembly election.

Amendment No. 373 is a transitional provision, and ensures that any determination on the number of ministerial posts made during the shadow phase carries forward after devolution.

The reason for the d'Hondt formula, and for S and the algebra, is important. The purpose is to ensure confidence across the community in Northern Ireland, so that people know that their parties will, if they receive a sufficient mandate in the election, have the opportunity for their Members to become Ministers and play their part in the Executive Committee. The referendum was successful for that reason. The formula gives both sides of the community—and others who believe that they do not belong to either of the traditional communities—the opportunity to play their part in the government of Northern Ireland.

As I see the Assembly working, I believe that the overwhelming number of its Members—whatever party they represent—have the interests of their constituents at heart. When those Members must eventually decide their priorities, budgets and policies on hospitals, roads and so on, we will be in a position to say—hand on heart—that the system is satisfactory across the political and religious divide. That is why we chose the d'Hondt formula, that is why the people voted for it, and that is why I commend the amendments to the House.

8.45 pm

Mr. Öpik: I thank the Minister for bringing my long and lonely vigil in defence of proportional representation to a very happy end. I gave the impression of understanding what I was talking about in July—my thanks to others who have been concerned about this issue. It was a good example of intensive and considerable representations leading to a favourable outcome. I suppose that, instead of wearing the anorak of a defender of proportional representation, I now wear the mantle of respectability.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): With knee breeches, tights and silver-buckle shoes.

Mr. Öpik: Perhaps the other place could learn from my experience.

It will be most important to observe the system functioning in the years ahead and to ensure that it works. Once again, I thank the Minister and his staff for listening carefully to our concerns.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): When I raised this issue during earlier debate on the Bill, I asked the Minister whether he would reconsider and include in the legislation a specific requirement to re-run the formula when party numbers changed within the Assembly to such an extent that they impacted on the number of Ministers, chairmen or vice-chairmen from a particular party. Rather than assisting us in that matter, the Minister has done the reverse: he has enshrined in even more definite terms the requirement that the original formula should stand.

That is nonsense, and the Minister has sown the seeds of the Assembly's destruction. I invite him to consider circumstances in which Assembly Members change party in such significant numbers that it affects the number of ministerial and other Assembly posts to which that party is entitled. Under the Bill as framed, that party would not be able to gain the additional posts to which it would be entitled numerically. At that stage, the Executive would not have the power to vote through their own legislation against parties that had been badly done by in those circumstances. A party deprived of ministerial posts because of the insistence on this formula could hold the entire Assembly to ransom and, because of the cross-community rule, prevent decisions from being taken.

The Minister has made this short-sighted determination for only one political purpose. He knows that the most likely movement within the Assembly would be away from the Ulster Unionist party faction led by the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble).

The Minister knows that his agreement would flounder in circumstances in which the right hon. Member for Upper Bann lost numerical strength in the Assembly. Therefore, without any democratic support in the Assembly, the Minister hopes that he can allow the right hon. Gentleman to hold on to office, but he does that only through trickery in the Bill, not through a democratic vote in the Assembly. It is altogether wrong that the Minister takes that course.

It is too late to urge the Minister to think again, because he has taken the matter on an entirely political basis. I entirely oppose what he has done—it is undemocratic. There is no need for any hon. Member to rejoice and think that the Minister is upholding democratic principles. He is not; he is ensuring that, whatever the results at an election, no change will take place in the Assembly thereafter, no matter how much people depart from their manifesto commitments.

The Minister has done a disservice to the House by supporting the amendment and by insisting that the democratic will of the Assembly would be defied in such circumstances. Voting against the amendment would have no impact, other than to reduce the time available for us to speak under this tight schedule. I oppose the measure, but will not be voting on the issue, simply because of time.

Mr. McGrady: Does the Minister agree that the formula enshrined in the amendment copper-fastens in statute the will of the people, as distinct from the will and the manipulative processes of political parties within the Assembly? Does he also agree that the result of the elections to the Assembly is the will of the people embodied and expressed in the number of seats gained by each party? Surely that is the most democratic expression of what the people want and the way in which the Bill allows for the allocation of ministerial seats by the d'Hondt principle.

It is not appropriate for the Bill to provide for the manipulations of parties that are trying to pressurise elected Members to move from one block to another for the purpose of frustrating the agreement, the election and the will of the people.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The Minister had never heard of d'Hondt. All I can tell him is that he should have a look at that Assembly in Strasbourg; he would know perfectly well that such things happen all the time under the d'Hondt system.

Members of the Minister's party have been removed from office and from Committees because of changes in the alignment of Members of the European Parliament. That goes on all the time under the d'Hondt system. It is nonsense for the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) to tell us that that would be a terrible thing, because the d'Hondt system in the European Parliament works in exactly that way. There are all sorts of changes: people from other countries suddenly say that they are no longer affiliated to a certain political grouping, resign and join another grouping. If there are enough resignations, all the chairmanships of every Committee of the European Parliament have to change accordingly.

The European Parliament is always being pointed to as something to be admired, followed and looked up to. The Labour party is dropping a lot of people for the next election, and it will have a lot of other people elected, so it has wide experience of this. The Minister argues that we should adopt the d'Hondt principle, but then he copper-fastens an election for four years. A lot can happen in four years; if such changes happened in this House, the hon. Member for South Down would not say that this House was undemocratic. If they happened in the Dail—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would carry a flag for the democracy of the Dail—it would be all right; and it has happened in the Dail.

I remember a member of Fine Gael who suddenly discovered that he was going to be a member of Fianna Fáil, and it changed the whole Government. Of course, he got a good payment, because he was made a Commissioner for Europe and got a grand handshake twice of £60,000, so it was a good deal, but such changes happen under the d'Hondt system, and the House should be aware of it.

I noticed that the Minister shook his head when my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) talked about the measure sowing the seeds of the destruction of the Assembly. Say, for example, that 28 Unionists disagree with what is happening: technically, they line up behind the First Minister designate. Among them, about eight or nine are completely unhappy. When it comes to a cross-community vote and they vote under the cross-community system, there is no cross-community consensus. Under the rule that the Minister is introducing, the only way out of that difficulty—we have discussed it in Committee—is to have an election.

Will that lead to the stability of Northern Ireland? Why can the d'Hondt principle not be followed through, as it is in Europe? The European Parliament runs for its full term. Those who are members of that Parliament have the happy knowledge of when there is going to be another election; it is not like here, where we do not know when the election will be. Why cannot that system be followed?

Therefore, to say that the measure will remedy the position is incorrect. If the situation is as the Minister wants to have it, when it comes to the division, we are going to have an election, and, after the election, the seats will be allocated in keeping with the d'Hondt principle; so what is the use of trying to put off the evil day if there is a rigid divide in the Assembly?

Say, for example—not that it is likely—that a section of the Social Democratic and Labour party joined Sinn Fein. What would happen then? It may be possible, although I do not think that it is likely; I know that the hon. Member for South Down will not be joining Sinn Fein. However, what I am saying is that that could happen. Therefore, it would far better to follow the d'Hondt principle clearly through the whole system.

Mr. Robert McCartney (North Down): One of the difficulties faced by the consensual arrangement under the agreement for allegedly creating democratic institutions in Northern Ireland is the absence of an effective opposition. Everyone except several minor parties that will never, by their votes, be able to change anything, will be in the Government, and they will be in the Government on the application of the d'Hondt principles.

Therefore, one of the weaknesses of the entire system that has been set up under the Bill and under the agreement is the inability of parties or people to change anything within the period, or the initial period, of the Assembly's lifetime. Everyone will be in government, so, effectively, the Government will at no time be the subject of criticism.

Many people say that that is the difficulty that one has to suffer to provide some institutions that will be generally accepted on a cross-community basis, but that is no reason why one should set in stone provisions that effectively prevent the dangers of those institutions from being ameliorated.

For example, at present the Unionist side contains 28 Ulster Unionists and two members of the Progressive Unionist party who are genuinely in favour of the agreement. There are 28 members of the Assembly—20 in the Democratic Unionist party, five in the UK Unionist party and three in the United Unionist party. Thus, when a crucial issue arises, there will be two groups, one with 30 votes and one with 28.

One of the issues that may lead to a serious realignment of that grouping is decommissioning. The way in which the First Minister deals with decommissioning could cause a substantial number of members of his party to join the 28 who are saying no. Under these proposals, however, because the First Minister had 28 members to start with, he would probably be entitled to three Ministries. Even if, as a result of some change within his party, he finished up with 10 members of his party who were willing to support him, he would still, apparently, be able to continue with three Ministers.

That is a ludicrous situation, which should not be permitted, but, if the assignment of Ministries, under the d'Hondt arrangements, is pinned for all time to the number of members elected to the party concerned at the date of the election, it is effectively what will happen. Such arrangements will prevent anyone being able to change the number of representatives as Ministers in the Executive, because they will be pinned to a certain point in time—the date of the election.

In such circumstances, the absence of flexibility may even bring about what many people, perhaps the majority, would not want: the collapse of the Assembly. If a minority party has three Ministers, and a group with 40 or 50 members only two Ministers, difficulties will arise. That would be such an insult to the democratic process as to be patently unworkable.

[Mr. Robert McCartney]

In the interests not of defeating the Assembly but of giving it a flexibility that will reflect the basic demands of democracy, and perhaps preserving it, I ask Ministers to think again about placing in tablets of stone the entitlement of Members of the Assembly under the d'Hondt principles, and pinning that entitlement to events at the date of the election, which may not, at the relevant time, reflect what Assembly members—or a majority group of them—would want.

Mr. Paul Murphy: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) and to my hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) for their support on some of the issues that we are discussing. Let me make a few points about what was said by the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), the hon. and learned Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney) and the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley).

I do not think that I am sowing the seeds of destruction of the Assembly. That is far from my mind. The hon. Member for Belfast, East referred to "my" agreement. It is not my agreement; it is the people's agreement. They voted for it in the referendum. The hon. Gentleman also referred to the idea of rerunning d'Hondt during a period when the Assembly was in office. He raised the issue in the House, as did his colleagues, during consultation. However, the other parties in Northern Ireland did not share his view. He is probably not surprised about that—it is politics.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East said that I was taking a political decision. However, the other place took a decision on this group of Lords amendments, and the House will take a decision on it. As a consequence of our consultation, we tell the House that we believe that the best course of action is that d'Hondt should be re-run only in the circumstances to which I have referred. The Assembly itself, using its own standing orders, can determine the precise basis of any other circumstances.

I think that people in Northern Ireland will understand full well when they vote for parties that—because of the system in which we are currently engaged in Northern Ireland, under d'Hondt—ministerial responsibilities will be established in accordance with the electoral mandate. That is a very straightforward point.

The hon. Member for North Antrim made comparisons with Europe. As I have been investigating d'Hondt, I have been interested in how other legislatures, particularly in Europe, have dealt with it. There are, of course, differences. We are dealing with d'Hondt in the context of an entirely new political agreement, and of all the other aspects that such an agreement entails. The situation in Europe is very different. Although the system is the same, it is operating within a different context.

I think that the Government have taken the right decision, and I hope that the House agrees with us. The other place has agreed with us. I sincerely hope that the public will understand our reasons. I have no doubt that some hon. Members will not agree with me, but they will be able to make their points forcefully in the Assembly itself when it considers the matters.

Lords amendments Nos. 34 to 44 agreed to.

New clause

Lords amendment: No. 45, after clause 15, to insert the following new clause—Junior Ministers—

".—(1) The First Minister and the deputy First Minister acting jointly may at any time determine—

(a) that a number of members of the Assembly specified in the determination shall be appointed as junior Ministers in accordance with such procedures for their appointment as are so specified; and

(b) that the functions exercisable by virtue of each junior Ministerial office shall be those specified in relation to that office in the determination.

(2) Procedures specified in a determination under this section may apply such formulae or other rules as the First Minister and the deputy First Minister consider appropriate.

(3) A determination under this section shall—

(a) make provision as to the circumstances in which a junior Minister shall cease to hold office, and for the filling of vacancies; and

(b) provide that a junior Minister shall not take up office until he has affirmed the terms of the pledge of office.

(4) A determination under this section shall not take effect until it has been approved by a resolution of the Assembly.

(5) Where a determination under this section takes effect—

(a) any junior Ministers previously appointed shall cease to hold office; and

(b) the procedures specified in the determination shall be applied within a period specified in standing orders."

Mr. Paul Murphy: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 72, 75, 76, 78, 80, 82, 98, 364 and 374.

Mr. Murphy: I suspect that there may be some disagreement in the House on this group of amendments too, but we shall see what hon. Members have to say about it. We discussed the issue of junior Ministers with every party in Northern Ireland, and it has been debated in the other place. When we debated the Bill before the summer recess, we touched on the issue. Unfortunately, the talks process did not get around to talking and dealing in depth with the issue. Consequently, the agreement is effectively silent on junior Ministers.

The new clause and consequential amendments would enable the First Minister, the Deputy First Minister and the Assembly to decide to have junior Ministers in addition to the junior Northern Ireland Ministers provided for in the Bill. As I said, there is nothing in the agreement about junior Ministers, although they are provided for in Scotland, were a feature of previous devolved government in Northern Ireland, and are, of course, a feature at Westminster.

In subsequent meetings with the parties, there has been some strong support for some provision in the Bill for the appointment of junior Ministers. There has been no disagreement on the principle, although there has been disagreement on the methods by which they are to be appointed.

Accordingly, the new clause provides for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, acting jointly, to make a determination that may cover the number, functions and methods of appointment of junior Ministers—who, of course, must be Members of the Assembly. Such a joint determination would not take effect—this is very important—until it has been approved by a resolution of the Assembly itself.

The other amendments in the group are consequential. They would subject junior Ministers to clause 23's provisions on exclusion from office. They provide that junior Ministers, like Northern Ireland Ministers, cannot serve as Chairmen or Deputy Chairmen of Committees. Last, but not least, the amendment to clause 38 would enable junior Ministers to be paid extra.

Amendment No. 364 subjects junior Ministers, as well as Northern Ireland Ministers, to the provisions of the Official Secrets Act. Amendment No. 374 is a transitional amendment, providing that any determination on junior Ministers during the shadow period is carried forward after devolution.

It is for the Assembly to deal with the nature of junior Ministers by internal debate.

Mr. Öpik: As the Minister rightly says, there is no reference to junior Ministers in the Good Friday agreement, so the issue had to be worked out afterwards. If they are a sub-category of Ministers, we can assume that they will be allocated in proportion to party strength, in accordance with the provisions of the agreement. I seek an assurance on how the Minister envisages that working.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Nothing in the amendment makes it clear that that will be done by the d'Hondt principle. The amendment leaves the nomination in the hands of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

Mr. Öpik: That is the concern that I was going to raise. Although we can assume that the posts will be allocated in accordance with the provisions of the agreement, there is no mention of that in the amendment. That is why the Liberal Democrats opposed it in another place. The hon. Gentleman rightly pointed out that the First Minister and Deputy First Minister appear to have the right to appoint junior Ministers however they want. That seems to run against the spirit of the agreement—and perhaps the letter of it, depending on the interpretation of the term Minister.

There is only a minimal check on the procedure. The Assembly must approve the allocation by a simple majority vote. That means that junior Ministers could be drawn from just three parties. I am flagging the issue because we remain concerned that the provisions run against the d'Hondt principle, because it has not been specified in the amendment.

There is an associated concern, which the Conservatives have raised before. Previously, Northern Ireland managed with four or five Ministers. There could now be 10 Ministers and 10 junior Ministers—a fourfold increase. That could be justified on the grounds of inclusivity, but the method of allocation is in no way inclusive—it is just on the whim of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. That increases their power rather further than was envisaged in the agreement. We may trust the current First Minister and Deputy First Minister, but there is no guarantee about the actions and intentions of future incumbents.

I hope that the Minister will go some way towards allaying our fears. It would not be appropriate to call a vote on the issue, but I seek an assurance that he is sensitive to our concerns. I look forward to hearing how he feels a safeguard could be implemented to overcome them.

Dr. Godman: Subsection (1)(b) of the new clause to be inserted after clause 15 refers to the functions exercised by Ministers. If a Minister had responsibility for fisheries, would that responsibility be confined to the Northern Ireland fishing zone?

I have engaged in debate with the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) and my hon. and old Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on the issue before, and, as everybody knows, many Northern Ireland fishermen fish outwith the Northern Ireland fisheries zone. A few years ago, a Northern Ireland fishing boat was almost dragged down by a nuclear submarine, and that happened far closer to Wemyss Bay than to Ballycastle or anywhere else in Northern Ireland.

The livelihood of fishermen in Northern Ireland is largely determined by decisions taken at meetings of the Council of Fisheries Ministers in Brussels. Will the Minister tell me what role a Fisheries Minister from the Northern Ireland Assembly would play in relation to those meetings? That subject caused much concern during the passage of the Scotland Bill.

Perhaps the Minister has already dealt with the matter in one of our debates that I missed. If so, I apologise to him, and to the House for detaining it unnecessarily—but I want to know whether the Fisheries Minister in the Northern Ireland Assembly will be involved in the deliberations of the Council of Fisheries Ministers.

Will there be a concordat, as is to be established between the Fisheries Ministers in Edinburgh and in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food? Hon. Members from Northern Ireland may say that they are well able to look after the interests of their fishermen in this place, through the Fisheries Minister in the Ministry of Agriculture.

9.15 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley: I think that the Fisheries Minister here should be supported in Europe by the Ministers from Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, because only those Ministers will understand the full situation and be able argue it properly and forcefully in Europe. The hon. Gentleman is making a valid point, because, as he knows, such decisions are taken in Europe, and they cannot be taken properly unless the Committee concerned, which makes the recommendation to the Commission, has the full information. I believe that the Ministers from the various Assemblies are the people who will have that full information.

Dr. Godman: As I said, we have often engaged in exchanges on that subject. I remember the hon. Gentleman complaining when a Fisheries Minister from the Irish Republic got more for his people than had been obtained by the Fisheries Minister responsible to this House.

I think that the Fisheries Ministers in the two Assemblies and the Scottish Parliament will have to work in close harmony with the Fisheries Minister in the Ministry of Agriculture. That Minister is the lead Minister for the United Kingdom at meetings of the Fisheries Council, but he or she must pay close and sympathetic attention to the concerns of the fishermen of Northern Ireland, Wales and Scotland.

[Dr. Godman]

Mr. McNamara: There will also be the Council of the Isles in one form or another. The Minister in the Republic will be involved too, so there will be a ministerial relationship between Dublin and Westminster, and also between Belfast and Dublin. Perhaps we could develop a unified British Isles attitude towards fishing.

Mr. Robert McCartney: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As I understand it, the amendment relates to the appointment of junior Ministers in the Northern Ireland Assembly. Have the matters recently under discussion any relevance to that issue?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter of order for the Chair. The hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) is in order at the moment.

Dr. Godman: I would not dare to step out of order with your formidable presence in the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Currently, a Minister in the Northern Ireland office has responsibility for agriculture and fisheries, and some of those responsibilities will be handed over to a Minister in the Northern Ireland Assembly. Is the Minister with that responsibility being confined to the management of the fisheries within the Northern Ireland fisheries zone, which were referred to earlier? These are important issues for our fishing communities in Northern Ireland, Scotland and elsewhere.

To respond to my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), I said in a recent speech in Scotland that I thought that one of the major issues to be determined at meetings of the Council of the Isles—or the British-Irish Council—was pollution in the seas between Scotland and Northern Ireland, and the seas between England and Wales and the Republic. That is another very important issue for our fishermen.

I do not want to detain the House, but the Minister is aware of my interest in the management of fisheries. I would hope to see the development of a concordat between the lead Minister in the United Kingdom's Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries Ministers from Scotland, Belfast and Cardiff. I am seeking that assurance from my hon. Friend, and I hope the Ministers from the Assemblies and the Parliament will play an important role vis-a-vis the deliberations and decisions taken in Brussels.

Mr. Peter Robinson: The Minister was right to say that few, if any, in the House would oppose on principle the possibility of there being junior Ministers in the Assembly. However, the necessity for junior Ministers in the Assembly might depend entirely on the number of Departments there are and the degree of responsibility that Minsters have.

If, for instance, there were only four or five Ministers, one could argue a good case as to why they should be given some assistance and support from junior Ministers. If, on the other hand, the full complement permitted under the Bill of 10 Departments—and therefore 10 Ministers—were to be taken up, the case begins to diminish.

At present, we have two Ministers in the Northern Ireland Office who do all of the work that would be transferred under the Bill. About half of the duties of the two Ministers, who are sitting on the Front Bench, would be in matters which are to be transferred—roughly speaking. That means that, in total, we have the equivalent of three existing Ministers who are doing the work. However, under the provisions of the Bill, there could be 10 Ministers in the Departments, a First Minister, a Deputy First Minister and, on top of that, a plethora of junior Ministers who could also be appointed.

I happen to come from the school of thought that says that one Ulster man can do what three English, Scottish or Welsh men could do, but this proposal seems to be putting that in reverse. Perhaps a dozen or so Ulster men will take over what, effectively, three English, Scottish and Welsh Ministers are doing at present.

The case for junior Ministers still has to be argued, although, in fairness, it must be said that the visibility and closeness of Northern Ireland Ministers will probably mean that they have much more work to do than existing Ministers. They will not be able to hide or escape as easily as present Ministers have been wont to do, and their availability will increase their work load. Of course, the experiences on which I draw apply to both sides of the House.

Although I agree with the principle that there is no reason that there should not be junior Ministers, I am not convinced that a case is to be made for having them. Such a case could be made only after the existing Departments have been working for some time and the work load that falls on the shoulders of Ministers and the Deputy First and First Ministers can be properly assessed.

Junior Ministers will not be working within the 10 Departments as some people have suggested. That is not present thinking among those who are meeting at Stormont. Their view is that junior Ministers should work entirely in the central office and, effectively, take on tasks that run across Departments—for instance, Europe, equality issues and matters that would impinge on more than one departmental responsibility.

The notion that departmental Ministers will each have a junior Minister is wrong. Indeed, under the system that the Minister of State is to throw upon our laps, it would be a disaster. Can one imagine the possibility of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister deciding to appoint a Sinn Fein junior Minister to a Department that had a Democratic Unionist party Minister? One does not need to think about that too long to realise the problems that could arise. Yet, if appointments are left solely to the discretion of the First and Deputy First Ministers, that and many other conflicts could occur.

I have read through the agreement in great detail many times. The parties who were signatories to it seemed to accept the principle that the d'Hondt method of appointment should be used for posts within the Assembly—whether ministerial, a chairmanship or a deputy chairmanship. Clearly, the system was laid out in the agreement. If it is right that a Deputy Chairman should be appointed under d'Hondt, it must be right that a junior Minister should be similarly appointed. Why are the Government not consistent? Why do they not follow through what was clearly the established principle within the agreement?

Once again, the Government are attempting to prop up a certain political cabal within the Assembly. The Minister recognises that a certain person does not have much support at present and that he needs to prop him up. So what does the hon. Gentleman do? He provides him with the instrument that Governments often use to prop themselves up—patronage. He allows him to have the instrument that he can use to keep people in line. So, having ensured in the previous set of amendments that no changes can take place, even if all but one of the Members' party move to another group, the hon. Gentleman is now allowing the First Minister and Deputy First Minister a mechanism whereby they can effectively buy support within the Assembly. Again, that is not good for the democratic process.

If the Bill does not expressly indicate what positions there could be within the Assembly, will the Minister say whether the Assembly is entitled to create those positions? Is that sound under the Bill? For example, if there are 10 Ministers, a First Minister and Deputy First Minister and, perhaps, 12 junior Ministers for all we know, will the First Minister and Deputy First Minister be permitted to have parliamentary private secretaries? Can the patronage be extended beyond what is contemplated in the Bill if the Assembly and the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister propose it? I hope that the Minister will respond to that question, too.

9.30 pm

Mr. Robert McCartney: Northern Ireland has a population of about 1.5 million people. It has a devolved Assembly containing 108 elected Members and 26 local councils. Under the Bill, it will be subjected to a raft of implementation bodies, which are designed to bring about some consensual ecumenicism between Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. It will also send members to the Council of the British Isles. In other words, Northern Ireland will become the most over-governed, most expensive and over-administrated piece of ground in the United Kingdom, if not in Europe, and all that must be paid for.

A great debate is raging between the two major parties in Northern Ireland—the SDLP and the Ulster Unionists—on the number of Ministries or portfolios there should be. The agreement and the Bill provide for a maximum of 10 Ministries, with the addition of a central Ministry that will be supervised by the First Minister designate and the second Minister designate—that means that there will be 11 Ministries. The central Ministry will almost certainly look after finance and personnel, but it will have a general roving commission over the other 10 Ministries.

The criterion for the number of Ministries will be not whether 10 Ministries are required for the functional efficiency of the Administration, but the maximum number that can be obtained politically to spread government across the widest field, so that everyone is brought in, including the representatives of organised and practising terror. Sinn Fein will be in charge of two of the 10 Ministries—it is likely to choose equality and education and cultural activity.

That must all be paid for. As the Minister said in his illuminating address to the Assembly a week last Monday—he was talking about budgetary proposals and the block grant for Northern Ireland—the total cost of the 10 Ministries, with the raft of bureaucrats, civil servants, officials and other personages who are needed to service them, will come from the block grant. The piglets in government will have not only their snouts but their trotters in the trough. It is now suggested that the trough should be extended—even tinier piglets should be brought in to enjoy the Government's largesse.

Is that necessary? The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) mentioned the duties and functions of Ministers who are seconded to the Northern Ireland Office. The six or seven existing Departments seem to function well, but there will be, in addition to the 12 Ministers, an undetermined number of gofers. They will be allotted across the board from the central portfolio held by the two senior Ministers. Why? We know that, when there is a vote and the Whip is applied, all those who benefit from the fruits of office are on the payroll.

The extended payroll will be in the gift of the First and second Ministers: effectively in the gift of the Ulster Unionist and Social Democratic and Labour parties, the parties of the centre that will run the show. Those parties will effectively exercise executive government and downgrade the legislative function of the Assembly.

No mind, however fertile, ever thought for a moment of including junior Ministers in the agreement, because no one ever conceived that there would be any necessity for them. The 10 Ministers, plus the two chiefs, will have an enormous body of assistants. The place is coming down with special advisers. If only the public could see the facilities and the assistants that are being provided for Ministers in Northern Ireland, they would realise immediately that there is no reason whatever to have any junior Ministers, and especially ones who will be totally in the thrall of the First and second Ministers designate.

As the hon. Member for Belfast, East pointed, d'Hondt was written in stone in the part of the agreement relating to the electoral mandate, but now an issue to which d'Hondt does not apply and that was not predicated in the agreement has been put entirely in the gift of the First and second Ministers, when no solid case has been established for the need for the junior Ministers, who will absorb money that Northern Ireland, the Assembly and the Executive could well devote to much worthier causes than providing a source of patronage.

Some of us in Northern Ireland still have a conscience about public expenditure and believe that the measure would amount to no more than the placing of the means of bribery in the hands of the First and second Ministers.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): The case has been fairly put about the over-governance that will take place in Northern Ireland. Six Departments will become 10, and the central Department will be added. Select Committees with a paid Chairman and Vice-Chairmen, elected on the d'Hondt principle, will oversee every Department. There will have to be 11 Committees, because of the new central Department.

Yes, we were under-governed—there was a deficit but it seems to me that we have now gone to the extent of having too many personnel. Because of that, I cannot understand why the Government want to raise the matter of Ministers, of which matter I take a dim view. My party had a meeting with the First Minister and his deputy. We did not understand why they were so dedicated to the idea of having junior Ministers, but I have concluded that it is because they need people on the payroll, whom they can keep in line during tight votes in the Assembly.

Remember that the voting is all cross-community. Unless the total number of people voting represent the majority in each community, there is no majority. In electoral terms, what is needed to make a majority is Unionists who are in the majority in their community, and nationalists who are in the majority in theirs, voting together. There are people labelled "others" who have no part in our lot. They can make only one change, becoming Unionists or nationalists, but it is hardly likely that the Alliance party will become a Unionist party, or that the Women's Coalition will become either Unionists or nationalists.

The Chairmen and Deputy Chairmen of the Select Committees will be important. The Committees will have great power: they will be able to summons Ministers, persons and papers to answer. It will be some Government when all that gets going. The proposal in the amendment should never have been put to us—any suggestion that we should be doubling up is wrong. Perhaps the Ministers here tonight would like to propose to the Prime Minister that he gives all of them deputies to help alleviate the overloading. After all, there are six Departments, so why should those running them now not have assistants?

Mr. Paul Murphy: What an interesting debate. It centred on three separate issues, and I shall deal first with the one raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman), who spoke specifically about the role of Fisheries Ministers in the new Northern Ireland Administration.

I should say first that junior Ministers can have no statutory functions, but they can assist other Ministers. Therefore, on fisheries, a Northern Ireland Minister would have power over the Northern Ireland zone and, beyond the zone, over Northern Ireland-licensed boats—in other words, exactly the same position as in Scotland. The Minister concerned would be involved in European Union discussions, subject to the agreement of the United Kingdom; and, as my hon. Friend said, the issue would be covered in a concordat.

My hon. Friend also mentioned the British-Irish Council. It seems to me that the matters relating to the sea, such as pollution, the environment and fishing, would be obvious subjects for discussion in the British-Irish Council. However, matters connected with the European Union will inevitably be matters for the member states and the appropriate Ministers in that capacity.

The hon. Members for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) and for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) raised the nature of the appointment of junior Ministers. It is our belief—one with which the House of Lords concurred—that, because the agreement was silent on that point, the Assembly should determine that question. In other words, the amendments are enabling amendments. If the Assembly wishes, it can use the d'Hondt principle or any other method it wants—it is for the Assembly to decide by a majority.

The hon. Members for Belfast, East and for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) and the hon. and learned Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney) all raised the question whether junior Ministers should exist at all. The hon. and learned Member for North Down spoke at some length on the lack of a need for junior Ministers. However, a small number of junior Ministers will not greatly add to the burden of government in the way that the hon. Members suggested. They drew attention to the fact that Northern Ireland would have junior Ministers on top of councils, an Assembly with 108 members and Ministers, and they suggested that that would be a great panoply of government.

However, if we consider the situation in Wales after devolution, we see that the Welsh will have community councils, powerful unitary authorities and many public appointed bodies. Wales will also be a member of the British-Irish Council, like Scotland, Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. Welsh Ministers will take part in Europe alongside United Kingdom Ministers, and we must not forget the European Members of Parliament. Other parts of the UK will have similar structures.

Mr. Robert McCartney: Will the Minister say how many Members will sit in the Welsh Assembly and what the population of Wales is, compared with that of Northern Ireland?

9.45 pm

Mr. Murphy: The Assembly will have 60 Members and the population is 3 million, as the hon. and learned Gentleman knows. He also knows that people in Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales voted for the proposals. People in Northern Ireland voted in the referendum for 108 Members of the Assembly. He knows full well also that the Assembly will have so many Members because it has to be acceptable to all the people of Northern Ireland, and that is achieved through a system of the single transferable vote. We must compare costs, and the hon. and learned Gentleman asked me how much the proposals will cost. I can tell him that security in Northern Ireland has cost £1 billion a year. If the price of peace and political stability is 108 Members and the existence of junior Ministers, it is a price worth paying.

Mr. Peter Robinson: That is are paying the IRA's price.

Mr. Murphy: That is another issue. We are talking now about Members and junior Ministers. The talks process did not address the issue in detail. If it had, matters would be much easier for us, because the House would be able to implement what had been agreed. That is why we say that it should be for the Assembly to determine the role and number of junior Ministers.

Clause 16

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

Lords amendment: No. 46, in page 9, line 20, leave out ("the") and insert ("each").

Mr. Paul Murphy: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 66 to 71, 73, 74 and 377.

Mr. Murphy: The amendments parallel amendments already made to the clauses on Northern Ireland Ministers.

They include adjusting the d'Hondt formula in the way already done for Ministers, to provide that the formula should be run on the basis of the party's strength at the first meeting of the Assembly, thus fully reflecting its electoral mandate.

Other changes are more technical, including tidying up the provisions on how Committee Chairmen are to be replaced, and giving parties' nominating officers the power to dismiss their appointees. Perhaps amendment No. 67 is the most significant. It sets out on the face of the Bill the requirement for Standing Orders to ensure that Committees have the powers set out in paragraph 9 of strand 1 of the Belfast agreement. The Bill always gave Committees of the Assembly a key role, but amendment No. 67 addresses the concerns expressed by some parties during the consultation exercise.

There is also one entirely drafting amendment to the provisions on the Executive Committee of the Assembly. That is amendment No. 377, which is transitional and provides that any Committees established, and Chairmen appointed, during the shadow phase will carry forward after devolution.

NORTHERN IRELAND DEPARTMENTS

Lords amendment: No. 47, in page 9, line 31, at end insert—

("(3) If an Act of the Assembly which establishes a new Northern Ireland department provides for it to be in the charge of the First Minister and the deputy First Minister acting jointly—

(a) the department shall not be regarded as a Northern Ireland department for the purposes of subsection (2) or (3) of section (Ministerial Offices); and

(b) the office held by those Ministers as the head of the department shall not be regarded as a Ministerial office for the purposes of subsection (4) of that section or section 15.").

Mr. Paul Murphy: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 48, 49, 375 and 376.

Mr. Murphy: These amendments deal with the location of prerogative and statutory power after devolution. Amendment No. 47 reflects the interest shown by some parties during the consultation process in creating a Department of the centre, to which several hon. Members have referred, under the joint control of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. Such a Department has obvious parallels in Whitehall. A similar Department was in existence during previous devolved Administrations in Northern Ireland. Its functions would be entirely for the Northern Ireland parties in the Assembly to determine, but could include both policy co-ordination and statutory functions.

There is no explicit provision for such a Department in the Belfast agreement. Therefore, we have provided for such a Department to be created by an Act of the Assembly. However, if the parties agree on its creation during the shadow phase, the transitional provisions of the Bill will enable it to continue in existence after devolution. The new clause also ensures that, if such a Department is created, it will not count towards the Bill's maximum of 10 ministerial offices, nor will it count towards d'Hondt.

Amendment No. 48 deals with statutory functions after devolution. During earlier consideration of the Bill in this House, there was some confusion about the scope of clause 18 on the prerogative and other Executive power. The clause gave the impression that the majority of Executive authority in Northern Ireland would be exercised by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister acting jointly. In fact, of course, the prerogative is only a small part of all Executive power. Accordingly, the new clause deals with the most significant element of Executive authority—statutory power.

Statutory functions in Northern Ireland are generally vested in the Departments, under the control and direction of their Ministers. The new clause makes it clear that that will continue to be the case. Amendment No. 49 recasts clause 18, which deals with prerogative and other Executive powers. Despite the sometimes grand language of the clause, it deals with far less significant functions than those covered by the new clause that precedes it. As the amendment makes clear, the most significant prerogative power exercisable under the clause is the management of the Northern Ireland civil service. Prerogative and other Executive powers also include a series of more minor powers that the Government can exercise in the same way as a normal citizen, such as the power to enter into contracts.

Other than clarifying, in subsection (3), the position with respect to the Northern Ireland civil service, the main significance of the amendment is the ability it gives to Northern Ireland Ministers to exercise prerogative powers directly without being authorised explicitly by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. That is important for administrative reasons, since even relatively mundane departmental tasks, such as publishing leaflets, depend to a degree on using prerogative powers, and it would clearly be absurdly cumbersome to require explicit approval for those tasks.

Amendments Nos. 375 and 376 are transitional. They provide that any Department established during the shadow phase under the joint control of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister may carry on after devolution. Amendment No. 378 similarly ensures that prerogative orders made under the 1973 Letters Patent can remain in force after devolution.

COMMUNITY LAW, CONVENTION RIGHTS ETC.

Lords amendment: No. 50, in page 10, line 1, at end insert (", confirm or approve").

Mr. Ingram: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 51 to 55.

Mr. Ingram: The amendments make drafting and technical improvements to clause 19, which prevents

[Mr. Ingram]

Ministers and Northern Ireland Departments from doing things—including making legislation—which are incompatible with rights under the European convention on human rights or European Union law, or which involve discrimination on grounds of religious belief or political opinion. They enable us to set out clearly the possible conduct that we intend to prevent, and to bring certain additional matters within the scope of the clause so as to bring it into line with other provisions of the Bill.

New clause

Lords amendment: No. 62, after clause 20, to insert the following new clause—Quotas for purposes of international etc obligations—

".—(1) A Minister of the Crown may make an order containing provision such as is specified in subsection (2) where—

(a) an international obligation or an obligation under Community law is an obligation to achieve a result defined by reference to a quantity (whether expressed as an amount, proportion or ratio or otherwise); and

(b) the quantity relates to the United Kingdom (or to an area including the United Kingdom or to an area consisting of a part of the United Kingdom which is or includes the whole or part of Northern Ireland).

(2) The provision referred to in subsection (1) is provision for the achievement by a Minister or Northern Ireland department (in the exercise of his or its functions) of so much of the result to be achieved under the international obligation or obligation under Community law as is specified in the order.

(3) The order may specify the time by which any part of the result to be achieved by the Minister or department is to be achieved.

(4) Where an order under subsection (1) is in force in relation to an international obligation or an obligation under Community law, the obligation shall have effect for the purposes of this Act as if it were an obligation to achieve so much of the result to be achieved under the obligation as is specified in the order by the time or times so specified.

(5) No order shall be made by a Minister of the Crown under subsection (1) unless he has consulted the Minister or Department concerned."

Mr. Ingram: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 63 to 65.

Mr. Ingram: Amendment No. 62 permits the making of an order determining the Northern Ireland share of a quota imposed on the United Kingdom by virtue of an international or European Community obligation. The same provision applies in the case of Wales and in amendments to the Scotland Bill. That is necessary to ensure that the United Kingdom as a whole meets its international obligations.

Amendments Nos. 63 to 65 allow arrangements to be made for Northern Ireland Departments to carry out functions on behalf of other devolved UK Administrations, including the Government, or vice versa. Agency arrangements were provided for in the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973 and the inclusion of public bodies and holders of public office in the provisions enables authorities outside central Government Departments in devolved Administrations to act on behalf of the Northern Ireland Executive, should the need arise.

The amendments achieve parity among all three devolved systems and I commend them to the House.

EXCLUSION OF MINISTERS FROM OFFICE

Lords amendment: No. 77, in page 12, line 18, leave out from ("because") to ("other") in line 19 and insert

("it is not committed to such of its members as are or might become Ministers or junior Ministers observing the")

Mr. Paul Murphy: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 79 and 81.

Mr. Murphy: The Government amendments in this group reflect comments made during earlier stages of the Bill and during our consultation with the Northern Ireland parties during the recess.

Amendment No. 77 addresses the feelings that many had that the Bill's provisions on excluding parties from office were too vague. In particular, it was felt that the ability to exclude a party because of the "likely failure" of its members to uphold the pledge of office was too hard to judge and could leave a party vulnerable to exclusion because of the behaviour of an individual.

The amendment makes it clear that exclusion under the provision is based on the Assembly's judgment of the party's policy and is possible if the Assembly believes that the party is not committed to its Ministers upholding the pledge of office. For example, a party might come up with a firm policy of not complying with the decisions of the Executive Committee or reject out of hand the provisions of the ministerial code of conduct.

Amendment No. 81 ensures that if the Secretary of State believes that the Assembly should consider a motion for exclusion, she must require the Presiding Officer to move a motion for the Assembly to debate and to vote on.

During earlier stages of the Bill in this place, hon. Members pointed out that the Bill gave the Secretary of State the option not to press for a motion for exclusion, even if she felt that one would be justified in the circumstances. Government amendment No. 79 is therefore purely a drafting point, making it clear that all resolutions under the clause will require cross-community support to be successful. I commend the amendments to the House.

DATES OF ELECTIONS AND DISSOLUTIONS

("(3A) An Assembly elected under this section or section (Extraordinary elections) shall meet within the period of eight days beginning with the day of the poll at which it is elected.

(3B) For the purposes of subsection (3A), a Saturday, a Sunday, Christmas Day, Good Friday and any day which is a bank holiday in Northern Ireland shall be disregarded.")

Mr. Ingram: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 84 to 86 and 104.

Mr. Ingram: Once again, the amendments reflect the valuable debates that we have had on the Bill here and in the other place. Amendment No. 83 provides for the Assembly to meet within eight days of its election, and is clearly an essential amendment.

The broad theme of the group is the Secretary of State's exceptional powers to deal with crises in the devolved institutions. As it passed through the House during the earlier stages, the Bill included a number of such powers. The Secretary of State had the power to dissolve the Assembly and call fresh elections if she believed that the First Minister and Deputy First Minister and the Northern Ireland Ministers were not able to carry out their functions. Similarly, the Secretary of State had the power to prorogue the Assembly without fresh elections.

During debates on the Bill, there was general agreement across the party divide in Northern Ireland that such powers amounted to planning for failure, which could prove counter-productive.

The people of Northern Ireland have made clear their views on the Belfast agreement. It is in no one's interests to be seen to undermine the structures that received such an overwhelming endorsement at the polls.

We have considered the views expressed in this place and from the parties, and the amendments accordingly remove the exceptional powers of the Secretary of State. The option of Westminster legislation always remains—

It being Ten o'clock, further consideration of the Lords amendments stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the European Parliamentary Elections Bill and the consideration of any Lords Messages and Amendments that may be received may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Jane Kennedy.]

Question agreed to.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. On today's Order Paper there is a business motion in the name of the Prime Minister enabling the House to consider any messages and amendments from the Lords in respect of the European Parliamentary Elections Bill.

Following the Government's defeat in another place, it is open to the Government to bring that Bill back for a fifth time. I understand that there has been a statement in another place, but there has been no statement in this House about the Government's intentions. Will the Home Secretary now explain to the House what he plans to do about the Bill?

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): As many right hon. and hon. Members will by now be aware, the decision of the House early this evening in respect of the European Parliamentary Elections Bill, which was carried by a majority of this House of 193, was rejected in the other place by a majority of 29.

The European Parliamentary Elections Bill has therefore been lost for this Session. It will be reintroduced in the next Session under the procedures of the Parliament Acts. Even so, to hold the June 1999 European elections under the regional list system, the Bill would have to receive Royal Assent by mid-January of next year. That can happen only with the co-operation of the Opposition parties.

If that co-operation is not forthcoming, the Government will still use the Parliament Acts to secure the Bill's enactment, but that would mean that the new system could not come into effect until 2004.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): We must now move on—

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it related to the statement?

Mr. Hogg: It is a matter of procedure, and I want to take your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that we are in the middle of a strictly time-limited debate. The statement does not warrant further debate. I hope that he will be brief.

Mr. Hogg: I will indeed be brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I refer you to page 308 of "Erskine May", and the passage that states:

"Substantive interventions on points of order made by Ministers may be treated by the Speaker as statements, so that questions may be raised thereon and replies given."

[Mr. Hogg]

We have had an intervention on a point of order by the Home Secretary, which clearly enables the House, if you give us consent, to ask questions of him. I ask you to exercise the discretion provided in "Erskine May" and enable us to treat that point of order as a statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The key word in the passage quoted by the right hon. and learned Gentleman is "may". It depends entirely on the view that the Chair takes. My view is that we should now continue with the time-limited debate.

Northern Ireland Bill

Lords amendments again considered.

Question again proposed, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

10.4 pm

Mr. Ingram: Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am grateful for your observations and instructions to Opposition Members, who clearly have no interest in this Northern Ireland legislation. They have entered the Chamber to rejoice about another matter, which they claim is about democracy. This legislation extends democracy to Northern Ireland, but Opposition Members are not prepared to listen to the debate.

Before the points of order, I pointed out that the option of Westminster legislation always remains if the devolved institutions are seen not to be working. However, we clearly do not want to work on that assumption from the start of the new Assembly. Amendment No. 85 therefore restructures the Bill's provisions on extraordinary elections, bringing them more into line with the provisions in the Scotland Bill.

Accordingly, the new clause leaves the power to call early elections with the Assembly, on a majority of two thirds of all Members—not just those who vote. In addition, a fresh election will be triggered if the Assembly fails to elect a First Minister and Deputy First Minister within six weeks. Amendment No. 104 deletes altogether the Secretary of State's power to prorogue the Assembly. The other amendment in the group, No. 86, is consequential on the new provisions regarding extraordinary elections. I commend the amendments to the House.

Clause 27

VACANCIES

Lords amendment: No. 87, in page 14, line 39, at end insert—

("( ) The validity of any proceedings of the Assembly is not affected by any vacancy in its membership.").

Mr. Paul Murphy: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 88, 91 to 103 and 276.

Mr. Murphy: This is a rather large group of amendments covering with a series of related and technical issues, but dealing broadly with the powers, privileges and proceedings of the Assembly.

Amendments Nos. 93 and 96 concerning the Assembly's power to call witnesses and papers are relatively minor and technical. The most important is amendment No. 97. It enables the Presiding Officer to apply an oath to a witness, meaning that those giving untruthful answers will be guilty of perjury. Amendment

No. 87 makes it clear that the Assembly's proceedings will not be invalidated by any vacancies in its membership.

Several other amendments concern the Assembly's privileges. In line with the Scotland and Wales legislation, amendments Nos. 102 and 103 provide that those reporting the Assembly's proceedings will not be liable to conviction for contempt of court under the strict liability rule only if the reports are also "accurate" and "in good faith". Amendment No. 88 deals with the issue of disqualification, providing for cases of bankruptcy and mental illness along similar lines to the Scotland Bill.

Amendments Nos. 91 and 276 concern the Assembly's Standing Orders. They make it clear that the Standing Orders require cross-community support to be amended or repealed as well as made, and delete from schedule 6 redundant references to the Royal Assent. Amendment No. 92 alters the Bill's provisions on petitions of concern.

As the Bill stands, a petition of concern leads automatically to a vote on the issue, which then requires cross-community support in order to succeed. During consultation with the parties, it was made clear to us that they felt that paragraph 13 of strand 1 to the Good Friday agreement should enable petitions of concern to be dealt with by the Special Committee procedure set out in paragraph 11 of strand 1. The agreement provides for the paragraph 11 Committee to examine and report on whether a measure or proposal for legislation is in conformity with equality requirements, including the European convention on human rights and the Bill of Rights. This amendment requires the Assembly, through its Standing Orders, to set out procedures by which petitions of concern may be referred to such a Committee for scrutiny, and thus brings the Bill closer to the provisions of the agreement.

Amendments Nos. 98 to 101 are technical and concern remuneration of Assembly Members. Amendment No. 98 provides for higher salaries to be paid to holders of junior ministerial office. Amendment No. 99 provides for higher salaries to be paid to Members of the Assembly Commission. Amendment No. 100 sets out rules for continued payment of Members' salaries after dissolution. Amendment No. 101 is consequential on amendment No. 98. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Öpik: I have one point to make, relating to amendment No. 100. Although it deals primarily with remuneration, I understand that it also allows Members of the Assembly to keep their title and status during elections for the new Assembly. There is a contrast with Members of Parliament: even if they are re-elected, they are not MPs during the election.

I understand the remuneration point, but my slight concern is that the amendment's provisions favour incumbents at election times, and I presume that that reflects the fact that the Government have consulted with incumbents. I want to be clear about whether I have understood the amendment correctly and, if so, whether the Minister is concerned about that issue.

Mr. Ingram: My understanding of the point that the hon. Gentleman makes is the same.

COMMISSION

Lords amendment: No. 89, in page 17, line 3, leave out ("the statutory functions conferred on the Commission;") and insert

("the functions conferred on the Commission by virtue of any enactment;")

Mr. Ingram: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 90 and 272 to 275.

Mr. Ingram: This is a group of minor and technical amendments to the provisions for an Assembly Commission. The principal function of the Commission is to provide the Assembly—or to ensure that the Assembly is provided with—the property, staff and services required for the Assembly's purposes.

The amendments enable the Commission to charge for goods and services, and make a number of other minor and technical changes to the provisions on bringing proceedings by, or against, the Commission; on the Commission's status as a Crown body; and on its functions. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Peter Robinson: The Minister may draw my attention to an amendment in the group entitled "Miscellaneous and supplemental", but the Assembly Commission met the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, in relation to the exercise of control in the Stormont estate. I think that we have reached a mutually satisfactory arrangement, but it would be helpful if it was given to us from the Dispatch Box so that it is clear that the Commission will be in control—not only of Parliament buildings, but of the apron of land that goes down in front of Parliament buildings—so that no demonstrations can take place without the Assembly's permission.

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman is a member of the Assembly Commission—other hon. Members may not know that—and has been involved in the debate about the Stormont estate. Discussions have been proceeding, and agreements that have been reached within those discussions will, of course, be honoured. I can give him that assurance from the Dispatch Box.

New clause

Lords amendment: No. 105, after clause 43, to insert the following new clause—("Part IVA—

NSMC, BIC, BIIC ETC.

NORTH-SOUTH MINISTERIAL COUNCIL AND BRITISH-IRISH COUNCIL

.—(1) The First Minister and the deputy First Minister acting jointly shall make such nominations of Ministers and junior Ministers (including where appropriate alternative nominations) as they consider necessary to ensure—

(a) such cross-community participation in the North-South Ministerial Council as is required by the Belfast Agreement; and

(b) such cross-community participation in the British–Irish Council as is so required.

(2) It shall be a Ministerial responsibility of a Minister or junior Minister nominated under subsection (1)(a) or (b) to participate in the Council concerned in such meetings or activities as are specified in the nomination.

(3) Without prejudice to the operation of section 19, such a Minister or junior Minister shall act in accordance with any decisions of the Assembly or the Executive Committee which are relevant to his participation in the Council concerned.

(4) A Minister may in writing authorise a Minister or junior Minister who has been nominated under subsection (1)(a) or (b) to enter into agreements or arrangements in respect of matters for which he is responsible.

(5) The First Minister and the deputy First Minister acting jointly shall, as far in advance of each meeting of either Council as is reasonably practicable, give to the Executive Committee and to the Assembly the following information in relation to the meeting—

(a) the date;

(b) the agenda; and

(c) nominations made under subsection (1) for the purposes of the meeting.

(6) A Minister or junior Minister who participates in a meeting of either Council by reason of a nomination under this section shall, as soon as reasonably practicable after the meeting, make a report—

(a) to the Executive Committee; and

(b) to the Assembly.

(7) A report under subsection (6)(b) shall be made orally unless standing orders authorise it to be made in writing.

(8) The Northern Ireland contributions towards the expenses of the Councils shall be defrayed as expenses of the Department of Finance and Personnel.

(9) In this section "participate" shall be construed—

(a) in relation to the North-South Ministerial Council, in accordance with paragraphs 5 and 6 of Strand Two of the Belfast Agreement;

(b) in relation to the British-Irish Council, in accordance with the first paragraph 5 of Strand Three of that Agreement.")

Mr. Paul Murphy: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 106 to 108 and 158 to 160.

Mr. Murphy: The amendments relate to strands 2 and 3 of the agreement, and respond to points made when the Bill was being considered in the House and to consultations with the Northern Ireland parties. Together, the amendments introduce new clauses to replace clauses 65 to 67 in the Bill as it left this House.

Amendment No. 105 deals with the participation of Ministers and junior Ministers in the North-South Ministerial Council and British-Irish Council. It incorporates a number of important points that I know have exercised the minds of many Northern Ireland Members. It requires the First Minister and Deputy First Minister to ensure that participation in each of the councils is that which is required by the Belfast agreement, including, specifically, that participation be on a cross-community basis, as set out in paragraph 30 of strand 1. That is an important safeguard in ensuring that the interests of all the people of Northern Ireland are taken into account when business is conducted in the councils.

Throughout consideration of the clauses, an important dimension has been the authority and accountability of Ministers participating in the North-South Ministerial Council. Before we went into recess, I told the House, and I repeat, that as a Minister I understand the importance of accountability—of the authority of decision making resting ultimately with the House of Commons and, in Northern Ireland's case, with the Assembly. Therefore, we have responded to a number of concerns that were expressed by hon. Members and by parties.

10.15 pm

The new clause makes it clear that Ministers and junior Ministers must act in accordance with relevant decisions of the Assembly and Executive Committee. It also requires openness and transparency in the operation of the council—an important aspect of accountability. The Assembly will be given advance notice of the date, agenda and nominations for each meeting, and Ministers will be required by law to report back afterwards.

Furthermore, the new clause makes it clear that Ministers in the North-South Ministerial Council must act in accordance with paragraphs 5 and 6 of strand 2 of the agreement. Paragraph 5 sets out the various levels at which Ministers will participate in the council, and paragraph 6 outlines the authority for such participation. It states that each side is to be in a position to take decisions within the defined authority of those attending, and that each side remains accountable to the Assembly and Oireachtas respectively, whose approval would be required for decisions going beyond Ministers' defined authority. The clause puts it beyond any doubt that Ministers have authority to participate in the North-South Ministerial Council only to the extent that such participation is in accordance with paragraphs 5 and 6 of strand 2.

Amendment No. 106 ensures that the Assembly has power to legislate in respect of agreements or arrangements made in the North-South Ministerial Council and British-Irish Council. Under that part of the Bill, Ministers will be able not only to consult the Irish Government but, in relation to devolved matters, to conclude agreements and arrangements within the framework of the councils. The clauses do not confer the power to conclude treaties, or other agreements binding in international law. Where it is necessary for matters to be provided for in a treaty, that would be concluded by the British Government.

Amendment No. 106 also contains provision in relation to the accountability of the North-South Ministerial Council by making it clear that no agreement to establish a new implementation body shall come into operation without the specific approval of the Assembly, in line with paragraph 12 of strand 2.

Amendment No. 107 deals with the British-Irish intergovernmental conference and requires the First Minister and Deputy First Minister to ensure such cross-community attendance by Ministers and junior Ministers as is required by the agreement at meetings where excepted or reserved Northern Ireland matters are to be discussed.

It was a cause of some frustration that there was no involvement of the elected representatives of Northern Ireland when the British and Irish Governments previously came together in the Anglo-Irish intergovernmental conference. That is now being remedied in the new British-Irish intergovernmental conference.

Amendment No. 108 provides for the Secretary of State to make orders in respect of the initial north-south implementation bodies. The clause, as amended, applies only to the initial, agreed implementation bodies. Those bodies are to be agreed by representatives of the Northern Ireland Administration and the Irish Government, and established formally by international treaties concluded between the British and Irish Governments. They will then need to be given any requisite capacities and functions in domestic legislation in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. That is the purpose of the Secretary of State's power to make orders under the clause.

If further implementation bodies are agreed, it will be for the Northern Ireland Assembly to make the necessary legislation.

I believe that the new institutions have the potential to develop positive relationships and practical co-operation in the island of Ireland, and in these islands, in a way that will deliver real benefits to all the people. I commend them to the House.

Mr. Robert McCartney: As the Minister will know, one of the great fears of the pro-Union community in Northern Ireland relates to the subject matter of these provisions, especially given that the Government of the Republic of Ireland hold, in their present constitution, that it is a constitutional imperative to act under paragraphs 2 and 3 of that constitution to create a united Ireland to include the territory of Northern Ireland.

The Minister will also know that it has been the policy of successive British Governments to stand by the declaration of disinterest made in the joint declaration of 15 December 1993, in which the then British Government declared that they had no strategic, economic or selfish reason for remaining in Northern Ireland.

The Minister will be aware that the majority—pro-Union—community in Northern Ireland fear that the arrangements are intended to effect, in accordance with the policies that I have mentioned, a factually and functionally united Ireland, and that the implementation bodies currently being put in place are but the forerunners, or the thin edge of the wedge, intended to ease Northern Ireland out of the United Kingdom as part of a transitional phase, recognised as such by one of the main participants in the agreement. I refer to Sinn Fein-IRA, which has repeatedly said that it views the agreement and the Bill as nothing more than a phase for the purpose of ensuring a transition to the ultimate objective of a united Irish socialist republic.

I do not have a copy of the Belfast agreement with me, but the Minister mentioned that under the terms of paragraph 6 each Minister would have power to make decisions within the limits of his authority. Under paragraph 6, would a Sinn Fein Minister appointed under the d'Hondt system with responsibility for, say, education, and acting according to a broad Government programme for the year, be entitled to enter into arrangements with his counterpart from the Dail and bind the Assembly, if he had made a decision within the limits of his authority? Or is the Minister saying that the provisions will ensure that, ultimately, the Assembly will have to give authority and approval to any decision made by the relevant Minister?

I am particularly concerned about subsection (3) of the new clause that would be inserted if Lords amendment No. 105 were agreed to. It states:

"Without prejudice to the operation of section 19, such a Minister or junior Minister shall act in accordance with any decisions of the Assembly or the Executive Committee which are relevant to his participation in the Council concerned."

As the Minister will know, there is quite a distinction between a decision of the Assembly and a decision of the Executive Committee, but the proposed new clause suggests that either may give authority.

It is extremely important that the people of Northern Ireland should know whether the Assembly or the Executive will give ultimate approval, and if it is the latter, exactly what constitutes that "Executive"? Is it a Minister acting within the limits of his authority as part of the Executive? Is it a combined number of Ministers—the entire Executive, including the First Minister and Deputy First Minister? What exactly is meant by "the Executive" in those circumstances?

Mr. Peter Robinson: This group of amendments constitutes not so much a group of amendments as a completely new Bill. The Minister is proposing to leave out the original clause 43 and to insert substantial new clauses, thereby demonstrating that the Bill is being entirely re-written. He could therefore assist the House by providing more details on this group of amendments than he has provided on previous groups.

Specifically, the wording of the amendments make it clear that the participants in both the North-South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council will be cross-community participants. I expect that the Minister will be able to confirm that that is to ensure that we do not have a Sinn Fein Minister going down on his or her own and taking decisions on his or her own. However, I have not read anything in the Bill saying that Northern Ireland Ministers must be unanimous in decisions on whether to agree provisions formulated with their counterparts in the Irish Republic.

The First Minister and Deputy First Minister—to take the example given by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney)—might take along with them an Education Minister who might well be from Sinn Fein, so that two nationalists and one Unionist would be attending. Will a majority be sufficient to make a decision—or is that matter yet to be played for, in the Assembly's standing orders or in other provisions regulating Ministers' behaviour at those meetings? It is important—it is essential—that the matter be clarified.

Mr. Öpik: Is not the matter resolved by subsection (4) in Lords amendment No. 106, which states:

"No agreement or arrangement to which this section applies entered into for the establishment after the appointed day of an implementation body shall come into operation without the approval of the Assembly."?

Does not that mean that the Assembly will have to approve all the matters about which the hon. Gentleman is concerned?

Mr. Robinson: I was dealing not with implementation bodies but with the North-South Ministerial Council. They are quite separate structures. I hope that I shall be able shortly to deal with implementation bodies.

[Mr. Robinson]

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Down mentioned his concerns about subsection (3) of Lords amendment No. 105, which can be read in many different ways. I can see nowhere within the provision a requirement that the Assembly's agreement be given beforehand or its approval be given afterwards.

The provision certainly allows for such approval to be given, and certainly requires Ministers to act if agreements have been reached. However, nowhere does it say that a Minister cannot act in reaching agreements in the north-south body unless the Assembly has reached a decision on such agreements. Neither does it say that a Minister must come back and seek the Assembly's approval. If there is to be accountability to the Assembly, there must be such requirements. Will the Minister explain his views on where accountability lies in the new clause?

I am mindful of the fact that, in the Ulster Unionist party manifesto, the party leader expressly stated that he and his party would secure two specific elements in an agreement on north-south councils. One was that north-south bodies would be accountable. The second was that they would be consultative, not executive. If they have implementation roles, they are executive, not merely consultative. To that extent, the leader of the Ulster Unionist party has broken his election commitment.

I want to find out whether the other election commitment on accountability has also been broken. The issue is not that accountability should be allowed under certain circumstances, but that there should be accountability under all circumstances in the Assembly.

10.30 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley: I should like the Minister to look again at the new clause in amendment No. 105, which says:

"Without prejudice to the operation of section 19, such a Minister or junior Minister shall act in accordance with any decisions of the Assembly or the Executive Committee which are relevant to his participation in the Council concerned."

The hon. and learned Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney) has rightly pointed out that there is a difference between a decision made in the Assembly and a decision made in the Executive Committee. Not all Members of the Assembly would necessarily know of a decision made in the Executive Committee. Will a Minister have the power to act unilaterally with his colleague in the Dublin Government on a matter that has been agreed with the Northern Ireland Executive Committee rather than with the Assembly?

The new clause also says:

"A Minister or junior Minister who participates in a meeting of either Council by reason of a nomination under this section shall, as soon as reasonably practicable after the meeting, make a report".

There is a great difference between making a report and asking the Assembly to approve what has been done.

The new clause also says that the report will be made orally—not even in writing. There is no requirement for it to be agreed by the Assembly. There is a great difference between reporting something that has taken place and that matter taking place solely under the authority that the Assembly has ratified. That causes us grave concern. I should like the Minister to tell us what he understands about those two issues.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): I shall be very brief. I am conscious of the fact that the time for the debate is limited, and we are dealing with very complicated matters. The hon. and learned Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney) will remember that, on one occasion earlier in the proceedings, he quoted me, did not give way to me, said that he would give way later in his speech, forgot and then kindly came up to apologise to me. I am claiming the injury time that derives from that moment.

On this occasion, I am wholly on the side of the hon. and learned Member for North Down and the hon. Members for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) and for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley). I recognise the sensitivity of the issues that we are discussing. I noticed the Minister wince and look at the clock when he was asked for a fuller explanation. The time that we have to debate the amendments is wholly the fault of the Government. Unlike the three previous speakers, who oppose the agreement, I support it. I should be greatly in the Minister's debt if he gave a fuller account than has been given so far.

Mr. Paul Murphy: Any wincing or looking at clocks was entirely due to tiredness on my part, rather than any discourtesy intended to any hon. Members.

Some interesting points were made in Committee, on Report and during consultation. The issue is of considerable importance, particularly to the Unionist community. I shall do my best to address the concerns.

The part of the Bill that deals with such matters is now much bigger than it was before the summer; that is a direct consequence of consultation. I believe that the various points that I mentioned earlier go a long way towards addressing hon. Members' concerns.

Let me briefly reiterate some of those in general terms. Northern Ireland participation must be on a cross-community basis. That is vital, and it is written into strand 2 of the agreement. It means that, in any participation, a Unionist and a nationalist must take part, and there must be agreement between them before any decisions are reached.

Let us look at what we mean by decisions. Members asked about the role of the Executive Committee vis-a-vis the Assembly. We put into the Bill a specific reference to the various paragraphs of the agreement, such as paragraphs 5 and 6 of strand 2. Paragraph 6 is especially significant, because it refers to "defined authority" and "the arrangements in place for co-ordination of executive functions within each jurisdiction".

Clearly that is a reference to the Executive Committee.

Hon. Members will know that decisions that require any money, for example, must go back to the Assembly, because it is the Assembly that votes the money. Decisions that require any legislative action must also go back to the Assembly, because it is the Assembly that passes the laws and must therefore decide.

Hon. Members will also know that any new implementation body—that is a possibility, of course—has to be approved by the Assembly. Is it not also true that any Minister worth his or her salt knows that, if he or she cannot carry the Assembly—on a cross-community basis, Unionists and nationalists—ultimately there will be no support for the proposal?

The north-south bodies and the implementation bodies that go with them—

Mr. Peter Robinson: Is the Minister saying that the extent of accountability depends on the grace and favour of a Minister and whether he or she is, in the Minister's words, "worth his or her salt"? If the requirement is not legislative and if there is already money in the Minister's budget, there is no requirement for the Minister to go back and obtain the approval of the Assembly.

Mr. Murphy: There are other ways in which the Assembly itself can determine the methods by which Ministers will report back to it. For example, it is open to the Assembly, through its Standing Orders Committee, to authorise Ministers to report to the Executive Committee and the Assembly in writing. That is the purpose of Standing Orders. We do not put everything in the Bill—

Mr. Robinson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Murphy: No, I shall not, for a moment. I shall finish my point first; then, by all means, the hon. Gentleman may intervene again.

Of course the Assembly, as it develops its own way of working, will ensure that those things happen and, that there is accountability. I also think—

Rev. Ian Paisley rose—

Mr. Murphy: The hon. Gentleman's hon. Friend has already asked to intervene. Who wants to speak first? I give way to the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson).

Mr. Robinson: The Minister well knows the issue at stake. If a Minister has to be accountable to the Assembly, the Minister will have to bring his or her proposal there and gain cross-community support for it. That requires any proposal to be one that will enjoy the support of both Unionists and nationalists. If, on the other hand, it is up to the Assembly to pull the Minister into line, a Unionist, for instance, would have to get nationalist support to stop a nationalist Minister doing something pro-nationalist.

Mr. Murphy: There is a limit to how far we can build into legislation the way in which Ministers will operate. However, the new arrangements that we have made refer specifically to the agreement, which, after all, was voted on by the people in Northern Ireland. We also have a reference to the fact that laws cannot be passed or money spent without approval, and ultimately the Assembly, through its Standing Orders arrangements, can work out how best to set up the report-back procedures. The notice to be given to the Assembly is there, too. It is clear that people must act in accordance with the wishes of the Assembly. That is there in black and white in the Bill.

We were talking about outer space earlier, and anyone who came down from outer space to look at the provisions in the Bill and asked, "Does that mean that Ministers can go out and do what they like, willy-nilly?" would realise that the answer was no, of course it does not. Ministers are properly accountable to the Assembly, but they must also take into account the cross-community aspect in terms of the North-South Ministerial Council and the Assembly.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Robert McCartney: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Perhaps I could adjudicate on who the Minister is giving way to. I call the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley).

Rev. Ian Paisley: The Minister has made a point about the Standing Orders. If the Minister, under such circumstances, makes an arrangement, must he get the approval of the Assembly? Will that be in the Standing Orders?

Mr. Murphy: The Assembly itself will decide its own Standing Orders after devolution. The hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley), the hon. and learned Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney) and the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) are all Members of the Assembly. They will have an important role to play when the Standing Orders are approved by the full Assembly—or, indeed, when the Committee dealing with Standing Orders devises ways in which such matters can be expressed in detail.

We have made various changes to the Bill to ensure that the Minister acts in accordance with the Assembly or the Executive Committee, and acts in accordance in respect of finance and law making. In addition, the fact that a Unionist and nationalist Minister must attend such councils will provide plenty of opportunity to ensure that there is compromise and understanding between both sides, and accountability.

Mr. Robert McCartney: Will the Minister crystallise the issue? Let us say that a Minister from the Northern Ireland Assembly goes down and meets his opposite number from the Dail—in whatever circumstances—and takes a decision that, under paragraph 6 of the Belfast agreement, he is entitled to do within the limit of his authority or remit. Having taken that decision and returned to Northern Ireland, is the Minister required to obtain the ratification of the Assembly for that decision, or does he merely have to report it and leave it to one or other of the two community parties to seek cross-community objection or support for it? Will the Assembly have the last word on a decision taken by a Minister within the limit of his authority, as prescribed by paragraph 6 of the Belfast agreement?

Mr. Murphy: Everything is in accordance with the Belfast agreement, and that is why paragraph 6 was so carefully worded. It states:

> "Each side to be in a position to take decisions in the Council within the defined authority of those attending, through the arrangements in place for co-ordination of executive functions within each jurisdiction. Each side to remain accountable".

First, he or she is not necessarily going down—they could be coming up in the North-South Ministerial Council. [Interruption.] That is a significant point. All this business about "going down" ignores the fact that this will be a proper North-South Ministerial Council, reflecting interest north and south of the border—and, I hope, of benefit to people north and south of the border.

Similarly, meetings—wherever they are held—will be held on a cross-community basis. We are not talking about a single person. We are talking about people going together. It is clear to me—as, I am sure, it is to hon. Members—that, if people are going together, things will not be decided in contradistinction to one side or other of the Assembly. In addition, major—and not so major—decisions will require the finance that must be voted on by the Assembly. It could mean that the Assembly would have to vote on a law, or the decisions could be relatively minor and a law would not be necessary, but decisions could nevertheless be made within that defined authority. Ultimately, Ministers will have to report their actions to the Assembly and, if any Member decides to question that report within the rules that the Standing Orders of the Assembly lay down, it can debate the issues, as we can in the House.

10.45 pm

Mr. McGrady: On that point, will the Minister confirm that paragraph (1) of amendment No. 106 states:

"This section applies to any agreement or arrangement entered into by a Minister or junior Minister participating, by reason of a nomination under section (North-South Ministerial Council and British-Irish Council)"?

Paragraph (4) of the amendment clearly states:

"No agreement or arrangement to which this section applies entered into for the establishment after the appointed day of an implementation body shall come into operation without the approval of the Assembly."

Is that not a self-evident requirement for the Assembly to approve any such actions?

Mr. Murphy: That certainly reinforces my arguments—[Interruption.] I am not sure whether we will ever persuade Ulster Democratic Unionist party Members that accountability is theirs. They have got it into their heads that it is not, and they will not be persuaded. We are doing all that we can to ensure that such accountability is provided for in the Bill, as far as it is congruent with the agreement. In addition, the Assembly has the matter in its own hands. By virtue of its Standing Orders and debates, it can ensure that such accountability is present. I see no problems with it.

The hon. and learned Member for North Down said that the provision will lead to a united Ireland and that it is all a slippery slope. Undoubtedly, a number of people in the Unionist community in Northern Ireland fear that. I think that they are misguided, because the whole basis of the agreement, for which people voted by a large majority, is consent. It is the consent of the people of Northern Ireland, within Northern Ireland, that will determine whether there is any such movement, not the provision under discussion. It will be decided not by the implementation bodies, or the North-South Ministerial Council, but by a vote of the people in Northern Ireland to decide what they want to do. That is the very bedrock of the agreement and that is why people in Northern Ireland, whether Unionist or nationalist, need not fear anything from the agreement or the Bill.

New clause

Lords amendment: No. 109, after clause 43, to insert the following new clause—Civic Forum—

".—(1) The First Minister and the deputy First Minister acting jointly shall make arrangements for obtaining from the Forum its views on social, economic and cultural matters.

(2) The arrangements so made shall not take effect until after they have been approved by the Assembly.

(3) The expenses of the Forum shall be defrayed as expenses of the Department of Finance and Personnel.

(4) In this section "the Forum" means the consultative Civic Forum established in pursuance of paragraph 34 of Strand One of the Belfast Agreement by the First Minister and the deputy First Minister acting jointly."

Mr. Paul Murphy: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 157 and 380.

Mr. Murphy: Amendment No. 157 would delete the provisions on the civic forum from their current position in the Bill and amendment No. 109 amends them, moving them to a more prominent position.

The main differences with the new provisions are that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister will now have a clear duty to establish the forum. The financial provisions have been tidied up and references to the forum representing the views of the community have been removed.

Amendment No. 380 is technical and would provide for any establishment of the civic forum during the shadow phase to carry forward after devolution.

Dr. Godman: I promise that I will be brief. I made an exceedingly brief speech earlier—I think that it lasted 60 seconds. I have spoken to representatives of voluntary organisations and trade unions, who believe that amendment No. 109 is a first-class initiative. I make the plea—I know that I do not have the support of the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley)—that the forum be given adequate resources. My hon. Friend the Minister mentioned financial provisions, but I believe that anything less than £500,000 could mean that the forum was nothing more than a talking shop.

Mr. Robert McCartney: The hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) would be unwise to think that only those who oppose the agreement have expressed doubts about the civic forum. Throughout Northern Ireland—I speak also for those beyond the Unionist community—there are grave reservations about it. It is thought that the forum may exercise the prerogative of the harlot—power without responsibility—and constitute itself as an upper chamber.

Given recent events, the powers of upper chambers may have some reverberations in this Chamber this evening, but the good government of Northern Ireland will not be served by the establishment of a civic forum that comprises a group of self-confessed lobbyists who have nothing to do other than to do dream up schemes—many of them far removed from reality—with which to carry out a process of self-publicity for various purposes.

There is room for a body that would draw up reports or take advice from a wide spectrum of society—even from members of the self-appointed G7, which includes the Confederation of British Industry, the Institute of Directors in Northern Ireland, some elements of the trade unions and one or two others. The Assembly could usefully consult such a body.

However, it would be totally inimical to the future good government of Northern Ireland if members of the forum were led to believe that they were constituted as an upper chamber, that they inhabited the environs of Stormont, that they were the touchy-feely conscience of the Assembly or that they were a moral mirror for the elected Members.

At some point, people have to govern. In a democracy, the people who govern are those who were elected; they are not some collection of polyglot do-gooders. I fear that, unless the civic forum is given a specific remit and unless the parameters of its activities are defined, it will turn itself into not an aid to the Assembly but a body that will generate irritation without forwarding the good government of the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Peter Robinson: It is important that we should know why the Bill contains provisions for a civic forum. During the negotiations, the participants were happily working and weaving the various levels of government into the proposed arrangements. They set up the Assembly, the ministerial structures and the committees.

After that, some parties froze—they went rigid. They went rigid because they—principally the Women's Coalition and the Ulster Democratic party—realised that there was a possibility that they might not have their day in the sun, so they devised this little initiative: a mechanism whereby political rejects could get in on the act.

To quote the Minister, any politician worth his or her salt should be in touch with all the interest groups in the day-to-day discharge of his or her duties. It is politicians' job to know what their constituency feels about the economy, culture or any other issue affecting the day-to-day life of the Assembly. The purpose of the civic forum was simply to provide jobs for the boys and, in this case, especially the girls.

The forum is no more than a talking shop: it has no executive function, and no function at all beyond giving an extremely limited range of people the chance to whisper in Assembly Members' ears their views on a limited range of issues. There is a clause that allows the forum to be expanded if the Assembly so wishes, but it is clear who the Government want to be in the forum. The groups that the Minister has outlined would certainly not be representative of the community as a whole. It would be vital for a body specifically charged with expressing views on a range of issues to be representative, but, unless there is a significant change, that will not be the case.

Wherever the forum meets, it should not do so in parliamentary buildings. It is vital that it should never be perceived as a second chamber of the Assembly. That was never intended to be its role, but, if it were to be housed in the Parliament buildings—in the Senate Chamber, for instance—there is absolutely no doubt how it would see itself and how others would see it. It must be kept as a body to be consulted on issues about which the Assembly specifically asks it for its views, and it should not generate its own agenda.

Rev. Ian Paisley: We discussed this at some length at earlier stages of the Bill. When the Minister met us, he was in no doubt about the position that those associated with me in the Assembly took. I know that others spoke to him who differ with me about the agreement but share my views on the civic forum. They agree that it should not be a colossal quango, priding itself on being the House of Lords in the new Assembly, keeping everybody right.

One of the leading proponents of the forum says that adequate money must be set aside to allow it to journey from place to place and meet in venues throughout the country. The forum will not be an elected body, because those who want to be on it are unelectable. They have tried and failed: some of them have changed parties and flown various flags of convenience, but they have still been rejected.

To my amazement, I read in the newspaper the other day that a candidate who was defeated in the Assembly elections demanded that a place be made for him because his contribution was so valuable that Northern Ireland could not succeed without him. The people did not think so—he put himself up to be elected, and the people defeated him. We are also told that the chairman of the new civic form is to be a person of great power, equal to the Speaker of the Assembly.

The time has come when the people should be told about the forum, whose membership is to be nominated by the First Minister and his deputy. I am glad that the Bill has retained the provision that the membership also has to be approved by the Assembly, because it means that the nominees will have to get the Assembly's vote. In addition, I believe that the Assembly will have some power, through the proposed commission to look after the property of Stormont, to prevent the forum from meeting in the Parliament buildings. I understand that the forum has said that the old forum building must be put at its disposal, but it might not be big enough for its members' offices.

We should be perfectly clear: if the people want the forum and if the Government want it, as they evidently do, its lines of operation should be clearly marked. It should not be allowed to damage the Assembly, or hinder the Assembly in the work that it was elected to do.

11 pm

Mr. Paul Murphy: The agreement referred to a consultative civic forum, and that is what it is. It is not an elected body, nor is it a rival to the Assembly, nor a second chamber. It is a civic forum, comprising, I should hope, people of a wide range of views, backgrounds and experiences in Northern Ireland. Some of those sectors—trade unionism, business and the voluntary sector—have been mentioned in the agreement, but other sectors may be included, as agreed by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and approved by the Assembly.

[Mr. Paul Murphy]

I believe that nothing but good can come of the forum. It is similar to the Economic and Social Council of the European Union. We have had inquiries from other parts of the country, including Wales, about how the forum might operate, but that is a matter for the First Minister, the Deputy First Minister and the Members of the Assembly to determine. I am quite convinced that they will come up with the best ideas about how to form the body and what it should do. It will enhance, not replace, democracy in Northern Ireland.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Clause 44

CONSOLIDATED FUND OF NORTHERN IRELAND

Lords amendment: No. 110, in page 23, line 15, after ("to") insert ("section 46 and to")

Mr. Paul Murphy: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 111 to 122 and 381.

Mr. Murphy: The amendments relate to the financial provisions contained in the Bill, and several reflect the undertaking I gave the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis), the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, to consider his proposals for expanding and improving the audit controls. I am indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for his thoughtful proposals, the bulk of which are now reflected in the Bill.

Amendments Nos. 110 to 117 are chiefly technical and drafting amendments, which clarify how the default provision will work. We introduced the provision to safeguard public services in the event of the Assembly's being unable to agree a budget or pass appropriation measures. Amendment No. 110 makes it clear that the default mechanism will begin to operate if the Assembly cannot agree on expenditure for the forthcoming financial year by three working days before the end of the current financial year. Amendments Nos. 114 and 116 clarify the upper limits on expenditure once the default mechanism has come into play: 75 per cent. of the previous year's total for expenditure on account, and 95 per cent. of the previous year's expenditure for a whole year in default of an appropriation measure.

The principal changes to the audit arrangements are in amendment No. 118, which sets out the basic audit provisions that all future Northern Ireland legislation is required to continue in operation. It is not possible for practical reasons to entrench existing audit legislation: the Assembly must be able to amend it from time to time because, for instance, Treasury requirements may change. In addition, it has been a transferred matter since 1921, and there is no justification for going against the Belfast agreement and reserving it now.

Nevertheless, the Assembly will be responsible for large amounts of public money, for which it must be fully and publicly accountable. It should not be free to abolish audit controls or so to dilute them that they become ineffective. I have to say that I have no fear at present that the Assembly will do any such thing, but the Scotland Bill constrains the Scottish Parliament from abolishing its controls, and a similar provision is justified for this Bill.

Amendment No. 118 will require future Northern Ireland legislation to provide, among other things, for proper accounts to be prepared in respect of payments in and out of the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund, for accounting officers to be designated in Northern Ireland Departments, and for accounts to be audited, certified, published and laid before the Assembly. It will also require the Assembly to establish the equivalent of the Public Accounts Committee in the House of Commons, with similar duties, and it will establish the independence of anyone other than the Comptroller and Auditor-General who is charged with the audit function, because a proportion of audit work is put out to private firms.

Amendment No. 119 will buttress the independence of the Comptroller and Auditor-General himself, and will prevent the Assembly from making a recommendation to the Queen for his removal from office, unless there is a vote in favour of so doing supported by two thirds of the total number of Assembly Members entitled to vote. Amendment No. 121 will ensure that the Assembly cannot manipulate him by reducing his salary. Amendment No. 122 will protect the independence of the Northern Ireland Audit Office by the establishment of a special Assembly Committee to examine its expenses, as the Public Accounts Commission does for the National Audit Office here.

Taken together, this package will ensure the integrity of the audit controls over public expenditure in Northern Ireland in the years to come. I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden for drawing to my attention the desirability of replicating the Scotland Bill model as far as possible, and I commend the amendments to the House.

Lords amendments Nos. 111 to 122 agreed to.

Clause 54

THE COMMISSION'S FUNCTIONS

Lords amendment: No. 123, in page 26, line 3, at end insert—

("( ) The Commission shall, before the end of the period of two years beginning with the commencement of this section, make to the Secretary of State such recommendations as it thinks fit for improving—

(a) its effectiveness;

(b) the adequacy and effectiveness of the functions conferred on it by this Part; and

(c) the adequacy and effectiveness of the provisions of this Part relating to it.")

Mr. Paul Murphy: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 124 and 125, amendment (a) thereto and Lords amendments Nos. 126 to 136 and 277 to 280.

I must inform the House that Lords amendments Nos. 277 and 278 involve privilege.

Mr. Murphy: The Government received extensive representations on the Floor of the House and during the summer months on the human rights issue, and we received many amendments to the Bill on that subject. We have introduced amendments of our own which meet many of the concerns that have been expressed.

A powerful case was made for an extension of the Human Rights Commission's functions and powers beyond what is currently provided for in the Bill. We have not closed our minds on that, and we therefore introduced amendment No. 123 to require the commission, no later than two years after its establishment, to review the adequacy of its powers.

Amendments Nos. 124 and 132 go together. Amendment No. 124 makes clear on the face of the Bill the ability of the Human Rights Commission to bring proceedings involving law or practice relating to the protection of human rights, but amendment No. 132 ensures that this provision does not override the need for a "victim" under the Human Rights Act 1998. In exercising its various functions as laid down in the clause, we would expect that a normal part of the way the commission operates will be to carry out investigations. Amendment No. 125 provides for that.

As my colleague Lord Williams of Mostyn explained in the other place, the Government will co-operate fully with any investigation undertaken by the commission. We shall provide it with any information and documents necessary to such an investigation, subject only to adequate arrangements being made to protect information where confidentiality is required, and to safeguard national security, public safety and public order.

Amendment No. 126 widens the ambit of clause 55 so that the commission will be able to assist persons in any proceedings which, in the view of the commission, involve either the law or practice relating to protection of human rights. Amendments Nos. 127 to 131 are technical improvements, which ensure that the Bill will allow the commission to assist "persons" rather than individuals, and that will allow the commission to assist incorporated bodies as well as individual people.

I have already mentioned amendment No. 132. Amendments Nos. 133 to 135 are technical amendments, which ensure that the Human Rights Commission can bring proceedings in cases involving non-European convention on human rights issues. Amendment No. 136 provides that the Advocate-General for Scotland is exempt from restrictions, as well as the other Law Officers listed.

There are four amendments to schedule 8. Amendments Nos. 277 and 278 are technical, and will make it possible for employment by the commission to fall within the terms of a superannuation scheme under the Superannuation Act 1972. Amendments Nos. 279 and 280 are simple drafting amendments that improve the consistency and comprehensiveness of the schedule.

There are also some issues relating to the Human Rights Commission on which we did not introduce amendments, but on which we believe that we should take the opportunity to clarify our position. We have been asked about the role of the commission as amicus curiae. Courts will be free to ask the commission to provide assistance as amicus under the normal rules that apply. However, that is not a matter for the Bill, but for the court in individual cases.

There has also been considerable debate on the commission's role in scrutinising draft legislation. Under clause 11, all Bills introduced in the Assembly will be sent to the commission as soon as is reasonably practicable after their introduction. That does not prevent the sponsors of legislation from involving the commission earlier, before a first draft of a Bill appears. Certainly the Government would expect to consult the commission at an early stage on any proposal for Westminster legislation that touched on human rights issues in Northern Ireland.

We have no reason to doubt that sponsors of Bills in the Assembly will do the same. Before draft legislation is introduced, its referral to the commission is not a matter for the Assembly, and the Bill clearly cannot regulate what the Assembly should do. I hope that that explanation answers most of the outstanding issues.

Mr. McNamara: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for much of what he has just said, and for his clarification of several issues. He has put the Government's intentions into Hansard, and the courts will therefore have to pay attention to them. However, I am concerned about several points.

First, the amendments will considerably extend the role and purpose of the commission. Will it have sufficient funds to carry out its functions? We have heard figures bandied about of less than £1 million, a sum that would not be sufficient to achieve a proper inquiry in some cases. What will be the financial restraints? Will the money come from the Treasury, or from the Northern Ireland grant, on which there are other pressures?

Secondly, I want to be sure that I correctly understood my hon. Friend's final point on Westminster legislation. The Belfast agreement said that the new Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission would have "an extended and enhanced role beyond that currently exercised by the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights, to include keeping under review the adequacy and effectiveness of laws and practices, making recommendations to Government as necessary".

My hon. Friend the Minister said that any proposed legislation affecting human rights and concerning Northern Ireland that passed through this House would go to the Human Rights Commission.

11.15 pm

I hope that I have understood that correctly, because, if that is the case, it would overcome some of the difficulties that have arisen in the statement of my noble Friend Lord Williams of Mostyn. He said of the proposal that Westminster legislation should go to the Human Rights Commission:

"We do not think that that is necessary because Westminster Bills will be subject to the regime proposed in the Human Rights Bill to ensure that Ministers consider their compatibility with the European Convention on Human Rights."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 21 October 1998; Vol. 594, c. 1536.]

Of course, it is possible that legislation emanating from Westminster and affecting Northern Ireland may be within the European convention on human rights, but not within human rights and other legislation as it is concerned with Northern Ireland and its Human Rights Commission.

I turn briefly to the amendment that has caused most concern, a matter on which I have the support of the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady), my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) and, in particular, my hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott), who sadly is now in St. Thomas's hospital. I am sure that all my colleagues send him their good wishes, and hope that he will have a speedy recovery. Had he been here, he would have been vociferous on this amendment because of his concern for human rights in Northern Ireland and the amendment arising from the Tinnelly case, which, as he was quick to point out, had many of the aspects of exclusion orders.

The thrust of the amendment in my name to Lords amendment No. 125 seeks to strengthen the role of the Human Rights Commission. It provides that, when initiating an investigation, the commission can subpoena witnesses and demand the production of documents.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State failed to deal with that main issue. In correspondence with me, he said that the matter was not dealt with completely in the agreement. In fact, in the section entitled "Rights, Safeguards and Equality of Opportunity", in paragraph 4, the agreement says:

"The new Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission . . . will be invited to consult and advise on the scope for defining, in Westminster legislation, rights supplemental to those in the European Convention on Human Rights, to reflect the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland"— that is the first point, which my hon. Friend has dealt with—

"drawing as appropriate on international instruments and experience."

The basic documents on international rights and experience are the Paris principles.

My hon. Friend will probably be aware of a letter sent on 18 June by the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, which he kindly placed in the Library. The High Commissioner, who one would think would have broad knowledge of these matters, says:

"While this responsibility does not generally require the relevant institutions"— that is, human rights commissions—

"to make binding decisions (which for constitutional reasons are generally reserved to the courts) it is common practice to accord these Commissions powers to conduct investigations effectively by compelling the production of documents and the attendance of witnesses, if necessary. Such powers would, in my view, clearly be appropriate for the new institutions envisaged by the Multi-Party Agreement."

My hon. Friend and the parties to the agreement say that they will look for international standards. The minimum international standards are laid down in the Paris principles. The United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights has written to the Prime Minister stating that the powers are minimum requirements, and that she would expect to see them in the agreement. My hon. Friend the Minister of State says that we cannot depart from the agreement, as there does not seem to be much agreement on the matter, but all the parties agreed on the minimum international standards, and the United Nations High Commissioner says that these are the minimum international standards.

We have been let down. I know that my hon. Friend said that, in two years, the Human Rights Commission can examine the situation, and may recommend those powers. I believe that provision for the powers is contained in the agreement as a minimum international standard. The High Commissioner agrees.

My hon. Friend states in correspondence with me that there is not sufficient consensus among the parties to the agreement. However, all the parties agreed to what was in the agreement. That is the first point. Secondly, which people have not come out in favour of it?

Sadly—perhaps because we are dealing with human rights—there are no hon. Members present from the Ulster Unionist party, the Democratic Unionist party or the United Kingdom Unionist party. I regret that. They should be present to answer these points. The Ulster Unionist party is the only party to the agreement that has not come out explicitly in favour of the commission having those powers, despite what is in the agreement. Even if the UUP is the only party to the agreement that is not involved, surely sufficient consensus does exist. Does that mean that the party has a veto on the issue?

The second point that I invite my hon. Friend to answer is why the Government took the position that the sufficient consensus rule applied when effective enforcement powers are required by the UN Paris principles, which they know were the minimum standards. I do not understand the Government's position. I welcome most of what my hon. Friend said about the improvement of the clauses, but the right of the Human Rights Commission to hold inquiries is fundamental.

I know that the Government will co-operate in every way, as they have said, subject to national security and so on. They will produce the documents and provide the information. If cases arise and the commission is involved under the rules of procedure, it can compel the discovery of documents and subpoena witnesses. I understand that as well.

However, with respect to the commission's power to hold inquiries, it is starting off in the knowledge that it cannot oblige people to attend and give evidence, or enforce the discovery of documents. It will be hampered from the outset, and people will be able to cock a snook at it. If, in two years, the commission begins an inquiry and decides that it needs the powers, the Government will say that legislation is necessary.

I can see no powers to make statutory orders to change the authority of the Human Rights Commission. If that is the case, we will be fighting for places on the statute book—unless the Assembly decides to introduce such provisions. However, that same negative force, the Ulster Unionist party, could prevent their introduction through Assembly legislation. That is why we have ring-fenced human rights legislation within Westminster: the Assembly will be at the beck and call of particular pressure groups not to get legislation on the statute book.

I urge my hon. Friend, even at this late stage, to consider carefully the contents of the Belfast agreement and Mary Robinson's letter, and to decide whether we want to hobble the Human Rights Commission in this way.

Mr. McGrady: I support the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara). He has presented his detailed case with great clarity, and left nothing out of the argument on behalf of his amendment.

The establishment of the Human Rights Commission is extremely welcome and significant because it places human rights issues centre stage. That subject has been the cause of much conflict in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. To his credit, I confess that the Minister has entered into much consultation about the Lords amendments, and has addressed many human rights issues that were raised in a debate in this place in the last few weeks of July.

Therefore, I shall confine myself to asking the Minister several questions to which I hope he will respond this evening. First, does the Minister accept that, by not granting the commission the power of discovery of documents and the power to compel witness attendance—as my hon. Friend pointed out—it will have fewer powers than are recommended in the United Nations Paris principles, which outline the good practice for national human rights institutions?

Secondly, does the Minister accept that the proposed powers are less than those granted to the health and safety bodies, for example, that are already extant in the north of Ireland? That is the situation under the legislation. Thirdly, does the Minister agree that it is desirable that the commission should enjoy the powers of discovery and compulsion in due course? If the commission requests those powers in the two-year review, will the Government respond positively?

Mr. Paul Murphy: My hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) raised several points. He referred to the funding of the Human Rights Commission. We have in mind an indicative figure of £750,000 for the commission's annual budget. That figure will remain under review, and I assure my hon. Friend that the Government will ensure that the commission is properly funded to carry out its functions under the Bill, within the normal constraints of public expenditure control—to which we are all subject. I confirm that my hon. Friend's comments about Westminster legislation were accurate.

The main issue that both he and my hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) raised related to the proposal to give the Human Rights Commission the power to compel the attendance of witnesses and the power of discovery of documents. That significant issue was discussed, not just in the House, but during the recess in several meetings with Members of Parliament, the Northern Ireland political parties, various interest groups and the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights. Many people and institutions were involved in discussions about the matter.

We concluded, however, that, because that issue was not specifically referred to in the agreement, and because it was a significant issue in itself, we were not in a position to accede to including it in the Bill. There was not sufficient consensus as a result of the consultation processes to which I have referred.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Nevertheless, does the Minister agree that the arrangements, the provisions and the legislation to protect human rights in Northern Ireland are, at present, much better than the provisions for any other region of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Murphy: I am sure they are, and I sincerely hope that, as a consequence of the Bill, they will be even more so. I am convinced that the people who drew up the agreement, those of us who were in the talks and the people who voted on the agreement believe that the human rights provisions are an important aspect of it, as are the equality provisions.

Mr. McNamara: Can my hon. Friend say where we have drawn, as appropriate, on international instruments and experience, and what his reaction is to what the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights described as necessary attributes to the Bill?

Mr. Murphy: I do not for one second underestimate the significance of the contributions made by international institutions on these matters. All I am saying is that, where the agreement is silent, it is incumbent on us to consult with all the political parties and Governments who were involved in the talks process, and to come to a conclusion about whether such a proposal would have achieved sufficient consensus had the talks continued. I cannot give an assurance to the House, however, because no such consensus emerged.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) quoted from the agreement referring specifically to paragraph 4 at page 17. That is clearly concerned with the commission's consideration of a future Bill of rights. I am absolutely clear that there is a great deal of merit in what my hon. Friend says, and in the representations that have been made to us. That is why the Government have not closed their mind to a review, after two years, if the Human Rights Commission tells us that it cannot do its work without those powers, or that it could do its work much more effectively if those powers were granted to it.

We do not know what the Human Rights Commission is likely to say in two years, any more than I know what the Government will say in response to the commission. All I am saying is that the opportunity exists, the door is not closed and the points have been well made.

Although we cannot incorporate a review into the Bill because there was insufficient consensus, I believe that much in the Bill that refers to human rights puts Northern Ireland on a much higher plane than all other parts of the United Kingdom and many other countries in Europe and the world. As a consequence, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North will not seek to move his amendment to amendment No. 125. We shall await developments.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 124 to 136 agreed to.

Clause 58

THE EQUALITY COMMISSION FOR NORTHERN IRELAND

Lords amendment: No. 137, in page 28, line 9, leave out ("members") and insert ("Commissioners").

Mr. Paul Murphy: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 138 to 143 and 281 to 323.

Mr. Murphy: This large group of amendments deals with equality. Like human rights, that is an important feature of the Belfast agreement, and has given rise to intensive debate and scrutiny at all stages of the Bill in the Commons and in the Lords. The amendments make the Bill more effective, and bring it more clearly into line with the agreement.

When the Bill was under discussion in this House, much attention was paid to the provisions that sought to create a new equality commission and a statutory obligation on the public sector to have due regard to the need to promote equality of opportunity. Since the summer, I have discussed those issues with hon. Members on both sides of the House and with all political parties that are represented in the Assembly. In addition, I have held discussions with SACHR, the chairs of existing equality bodies and, on several occasions, delegations from other bodies and trade unions.

Those discussions have been most productive. They have led to many Government amendments in the other place, which we now have to consider. The Government have shown themselves to be flexible in responding to constructive suggestions. We believe that the amendments greatly improve the equality of opportunity provisions, and we are grateful to all who have contributed to the consultative process.

Amendments to clauses 58 and schedule 10 amend the powers and procedures of the new unified equality commission. They also give persons serving on the commission the titles of chief commissioner, deputy chief commissioner and commissioner.

Amendments Nos. 291 and 292 will require a copy of the commission's annual report to be laid before Parliament as well as the Assembly. In addition, the report will have to give details of steps taken during the year by the commission and by other public authorities to promote equality of opportunity. The Government expect other public authorities to co-operate fully with the equality commission in the preparation of that aspect of the annual report, providing the necessary information on their compliance with the new statutory obligation.

I turn to the group of amendments on clause 60 and schedule 10, which deal with the equality of opportunity obligation. Although the principle of a statutory obligation was endorsed by the Good Friday agreement and has been widely accepted by non-governmental organisations, trade unions and others in Northern Ireland, there has been considerable debate about the detail of the proposal; it was the subject of much discussion in Committee. I gave undertakings to consider a number of issues that had been raised and particularly to see whether the Bill could take on board the substantive points of the two new clauses that had been tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North and other hon. Members.

There has been much consultation on those matters during recent months. The amendments to clause 60 and schedule 10 that were passed by the other place reflect the outcome of that consultation, providing for much more detail in equality schemes about arrangements for assessing and consulting on the impact of policies. In making decisions on policies, such assessments and consultation must be taken into account. Five-yearly reviews of equality schemes will be required. These amendments integrate the substance of the Committee stage new clauses 4 and 5 that we considered earlier in the year.

Amendments Nos. 141 to 143 to clause 60 substitute a new definition of "public authority" for purposes of the clause. They make it clear that the statutory obligation is not confined to Northern Ireland public authorities, but can also include UK Departments such as the Northern Ireland Office, and UK-wide public authorities that carry out functions relating to Northern Ireland.

Amendments Nos. 305 and 306 directly impose a requirement on public authorities, whether they exist now or come into being in the future, to prepare equality schemes. In Committee, it had been argued that the initial request from the commission to prepare a scheme was not fully consistent with the agreement. That issue has now been addressed.

Apart from equality schemes, the other main aspect of schedule 10 is the arrangement whereby the commission can challenge a public authority's equality scheme and investigate complaints. Amendments Nos. 316, 318 and 322 require the Assembly to be notified at relevant stages of that process. Amendment No. 323 creates a special procedure for dealing with problematic schemes and complaints where they concern the Northern Ireland Office and other UK Government Departments. That is to avoid a situation where the Secretary of State must reach a decision or issue a direction in a case involving her Department or that of a Cabinet colleague.

Those are the significant amendments relating to clause 60 and schedule 10. We believe they have greatly improved the Bill and will impose significant obligations on the public sector in Northern Ireland, with real change in the culture of administration.

Mr. McNamara: I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for the progress that has been made. He has gone as far as possible towards meeting the points that we made in Committee, and those made in another place. However, I should like him to confirm a couple of small points.

Where the commission still has power to make exemptions in regard to schemes, will the exemptions apply only when the body that is expected to produce a scheme is part of, or a subsidiary of, a larger body that will produce a scheme covering the subsidiary? I am thinking of, for example, a local authority and a committee, or sub-committee, of that authority. Will the only other exemption—in terms of public authorities—relate to notional circumstances in which a United Kingdom Department would be active in Northern Ireland, but the range and scope of its activity would be so small as to be negligible? Are those the only exemptions that my hon. Friend envisages?

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley): I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for his courtesy in listening to what we have said about the amendments that we tabled in Committee, and for the consultation in which he has engaged. I feel that the amendments bring the Bill into line with the Belfast agreement.

For the record, may I ask my hon. Friend to confirm what was said by Lord Dubs in another place? Lord Dubs said:

"To clarify the position, it is the Government's intention that impact assessments"

under schedule 10

"should relate to the whole range of a public authority's policy", not just to

"policies aimed at promoting equality of opportunity."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 11 November 1998; Vol. 594, c. 810.]

Lord Dubs also said that, in the Government's view, nothing in the Bill

"renders unlawful what would be lawful affirmative action under the existing fair employment, equal opportunities and race relations law . . . The justification for affirmative actions is that they are necessary to correct existing disadvantage or imbalance in equality of opportunity."

Lord Dubs added that the Government were confident that the clauses did not hinder affirmative actions when they were

"properly directed at promoting equality of opportunity."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 10 November 1998; Vol. 594, c. 713.]

It would be helpful to have that on the record.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire): It is welcome that, during the recess, the Minister was prepared to meet and consult many bodies that are involved in the equality issue. Will he tell us, however, whether all the bodies that will be dissolved under the legislation—the Fair Employment Commission for Northern Ireland, the Equal Opportunities Commission for Northern Ireland, the Commission for Racial Equality for Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Disability Council—are content with the proposals in the Lords amendments? Have all, or some, of those bodies some reservations? Do they feel that the Government's proposals will not achieve their ends?

Will the Minister confirm that working groups will be involved? If so, it would be helpful to know when those groups are expected to report to the Government, and whether the Minister envisages further change as a result of their activities.

Mr. Paul Murphy: My hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) referred to questions that he had raised about the exemption of public authorities from the requirement to prepare schemes. We intend the exemption to be used only in rare circumstances—for instance, when public authorities' activities in Northern Ireland are minimal, and the effort involved in preparing the scheme involved, and having it validated by the commission, would be disproportionate. In other circumstances, it might make sense to exempt a public authority. For instance, all sub-committees of district councils are defined as public authorities. Provided that their activities were fully covered by district councils' own equality schemes, an exemption could avoid each sub-committee having to draw up its own scheme.

My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber) mentioned affirmative action. Clause 60 in no way calls into question the ability of public authorities to take affirmative action in appropriate cases to correct disadvantage. Affirmative action in appropriate circumstances is an important method of combating inequality, and it is our firm intention that that should remain so. The clause does not call that into question, and does not render unlawful what would be lawful affirmative action under current anti-discrimination legislation.

Furthermore, clause 60 means that public authorities are bound to have regard to the need for affirmative action when considering their duty under the clause. An exemption for affirmative action is therefore unnecessary.

The hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) mentioned the current status of the equality commission. As he knows, the four separate commissions in Northern Ireland—dealing with disability, fair employment, gender and race—have expressed various concerns about the future nature of the structures. Nevertheless—to be fair—the fair employment commission believed that the proposals provide the best option.

We received many representations from the bodies, and on a number of occasions I have met the chairs of all four commissions. The chairs, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have agreed that an independent chair—Dr. Stringer, from Edinburgh—should be appointed. In the next couple of months, Dr. Stringer will go and work with the four commission chairs, examine the structures that we have to deal with and devise the best possible structure—which will be one that is accepted by all the commissions and by the wider community in Northern Ireland. The proposal seems now to be generally accepted by the commissions. I look forward to the report, which I hope will be available fairly speedily.

Clause 61

DISCRIMINATION BY PUBLIC AUTHORITIES

Lords amendment: No. 144, in page 29, line 27, leave out ("discharging") and insert ("carrying out")

Mr. Paul Murphy: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 145 to 156 and 385.

Mr. Murphy: Lords amendments Nos. 144 to 149 relate to clause 61, which prevents discrimination by public authorities on the grounds of religious belief or political opinion. They are all technical amendments that improve the comprehensiveness and consistency of the clause's provisions.

The group of six amendments—Lords amendments Nos. 150 to 155—all relate to clause 62, which prevents organisations from requiring individuals to make certain oaths and declarations. They, too, are all simple, technical and drafting amendments.

Lords amendment No. 156 relates to clause 63, and slightly increases the circumstances in which restrictions or investigations into complaints should not apply. The restrictions will, as a consequence of the amendment, not apply to investigations into the aiding and inciting of discrimination and will not apply to investigations into discrimination itself.

Lords amendment No. 385 is a technical amendment to schedule 14.

In moving the Lords amendments, I should like to commend the organisations and parties that have in the past few months been consulted by the Government and had many discussions and negotiations with me and my ministerial colleagues. They have very positively helped to strengthen the Bill.

New clause

Lords amendment: No. 161, after clause 68, to insert the following new clause—Legislative power to remedy ultra vires acts—

".—(1) The Secretary of State may by order make such provision as he considers necessary or expedient in consequence of—

(a) any provision of an Act of the Assembly which is not, or may not be, within the legislative competence of the Assembly; or

(b) any purported exercise by a Minister or Northern Ireland department of his or its functions which is not, or may not be, a valid exercise of those functions.

(2) An order under this section may—

(a) make provision having retrospective effect;

(b) make consequential or supplementary provision, including provision amending or repealing any Northern Ireland legislation, or any instrument made under such legislation;

(c) make transitional or saving provision."

Mr. Ingram: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 167 to 177 and 201 to 204.

Mr. Ingram: The amendments concern delegated powers. Most of them are technical. However, amendment No. 171 deals with a provision that has caused some concern and considerable debate. The issue has been raised in earlier debates.

Old clause 71, drawing on the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973, permitted orders in council to make provision about any reserved matter. We have re-examined the issue, taking into account the views expressed by various parties, and come to the conclusion that there is still a need to retain some of those powers. However, we have taken into account the views expressed and have cut back the matters that can be covered and introduced a consultation mechanism by which the views of the Assembly can also be taken into account. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Öpik: Amendment No. 169 refers to deleting the phrase "United Kingdom". That is not a great problem, but there is still an inconsistency in some places about how Ireland is referred to. That has caused problems in the past. In one notorious legal case—Ellis v. O'Dea—papers demanding the extradition of an Irish suspect to the UK were turned down on appeal in the Dublin courthouse because they referred to the Republic of Ireland rather than Ireland. We must be meticulous in ensuring that the phrases that we use are consistent.

Mr. McNamara: Will my hon. Friend give an undertaking that orders in council that might be forthcoming on fair employment will not be implemented until the Assembly has had an opportunity to look at them?

Mr. Ingram: There is no inconsistency on the point made by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik). We refer to the Government of Ireland, except when the word "Republic" is required for clarity. The parliamentary draftsmen have been precise, and are conscious of the problem.

Any matters that remain to be dealt with before the Assembly comes into place will need to be proceeded with. The Government still have important issues to deal with. We have to proceed as best we can on the present basis before the full Assembly is up and running. The Government intend to legislate on fair employment before devolution is fully in place.

Clause 69

POWERS OF COURTS OR TRIBUNALS TO VARY RETROSPECTIVE DECISIONS

Lords amendment: No. 162, in page 33, line 32, leave out from second ("to") to end of line 36 and insert—

("(a) the Attorney General for Northern Ireland; and

(b) where the decision mentioned in subsection (1) relates to a devolution issue (within the meaning of Schedule 11), the appropriate authority, unless the person to whom the notice would be given is a party to the proceedings.

(5) A person to whom notice is given under subsection (4) or, where such notice is given to the First Minister and the deputy First Minister, those Ministers acting jointly")

Mr. Ingram: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 163 to 166, 324 to 347 and 383. I must inform the House that Lords amendment No. 347 involves privilege.

Mr. Ingram: The amendments relate to judicial proceedings. We have provided rights for the devolved authorities to be represented on devolution issues under schedule 11, in consideration of the powers of the courts to vary retrospective decisions under clause 69. We have also added to the list of devolution issues so that all questions appropriate for this special procedure are covered. There is a clause to guide the courts in the interpretation of Assembly Bills. I commend the amendments to the House.

Lords amendment: No. 178, in page 36, line 24, leave out

Mr. Ingram: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 179 to 192, 196 to 200, 205 to 221, 349 to 363, 365 to 372, 378, 379, 384 and 386 to 417.

Mr. Ingram: I do not intend to deal specifically with all the amendments, but the group features many miscellaneous provisions, several consequential on changes of substance earlier in the Bill. They include further provision to permit proper co-ordination between the social security systems in Great Britain and Northern Ireland, several additions to the list of provisions to commence on the passing of the Bill, further guidance on interpretation, and a range of consequential changes to existing legislation, resulting from the Bill's main provisions. I commend all the amendments to the House.

New clause

Lords amendment: No. 193, after clause 74, to insert the following new clause—("Discrimination: certificates by Secretary of State—

.—(1) This section applies where in any proceedings—

(a) a person claims that an act discriminated against him in contravention of section 19 or 61; and

(b) the person against whom the claim is made proposes to rely on a certificate purporting to be signed by or on behalf of the Secretary of State and certifying—

(i) that an act specified in the certificate was done for the purpose of safeguarding national security or protecting public safety or public order; and

(ii) that the doing of the act was justified by that purpose.

(2) The claimant may, in accordance with rules made by the Lord Chancellor, appeal against the certificate to the Tribunal, that is to say, the tribunal established under section (The Tribunal)").

(3) If on an appeal under subsection (2) the Tribunal determines—

(a) that the act specified in the certificate was done for the certified purpose; and

(b) that the doing of the act was justified by that purpose, the Tribunal shall uphold the certificate; in any other case, the Tribunal shall quash the certificate.

(4) If—

(a) the claimant does not appeal against the certificate; or

(b) the certificate is upheld on appeal, the certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the matters certified by it.

(5) In this section "act" does not include the making, confirmation or approval of a provision of subordinate legislation.")

Mr. Ingram: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 194, amendment (a) thereto and Lords amendments Nos. 195, 348 and 382. Lords amendments Nos. 194 and 348 involve privilege.

Mr. Ingram: The amendments establish a new tribunal to which an individual can appeal if the Secretary of State issues a national security, public safety or public order certificate. The provisions were introduced during the Lords stages, so I hope that hon. Members will not mind if I spend a little time explaining their background and purpose. That will also set the context for dealing with the views likely to be expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) about the amendment that he has tabled to amendment. No. 194.

The tribunal originates from the European Court of Human Rights ruling this summer in the Tinnelly and McElduff cases. In that ruling, the United Kingdom was found to be in breach of article 6 of the convention because no right of appeal exists against certificates issued under the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland Act) 1976.

The Government recognised that the certification powers in the Bill, which restate the long-standing powers in section 23 of the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973, were deficient in the light of that ruling. The new tribunal is intended to ensure compliance with the European Court of Human Rights, and to fulfil the agreement commitment to review the national security certification powers. We also gave a commitment on Second Reading, in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North, to consider these powers in the light of the ECHR ruling.

The tribunal established by amendments Nos. 193 and 194 represents a major step forward in providing a mechanism through which an individual can challenge a certificate. Amendment No. 193 introduces a new test: not only will the tribunal consider whether an act was undertaken for the reasons stated in the certificate, it will also consider whether the act was justified. Those are important new safeguards for the individual.

Other considerations also apply, however, and must be given due weight. Safeguarding national security is a primary function of all Governments, and we continue to believe that it is essential to protect the intelligence information that gave rise to the original act and, ultimately, to the certificate.

At the same time, we fully accept the need to provide a mechanism through which an individual can challenge a certificate. That remains, and will continue to be, a question of balance. It is a difficult one, but I believe that we have got it right. Indeed, the Court noted in its ruling: "it should be possible to modify judicial procedures in such a way as to safeguard national security concerns about the nature and sources of intelligence information and yet accord the individual a substantial degree of procedural justice."

The Government believe that we have achieved precisely that balance in establishing the new tribunal. Amendment No. 348 specifically provides that the tribunal will be chaired by an individual holding high judicial office.

The key to achieving the balance appears in proposed subsection (7) in amendment 194, which enables the Attorney-General to appoint a special advocate to represent the interests of the appellant. That will ensure that the appellant will be represented fully by a suitably qualified person. However, we cannot provide the appellant with access to what might be extremely sensitive intelligence information or to any part of the proceedings under examination by the tribunal. We were not required to do so by the European Court of Human Rights ruling.

The Government fully recognise that the special advocate provisions are unusual, in that they modify the arrangements one would normally expect to see in appeals proceedings. However, these arrangements will play an important role in safeguarding national security and they do have a precedent—they are based directly on the Special Immigration Appeals Commission, similarly established following a European Court of Human Rights ruling and approved by this House in 1997.

12 midnight

My hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North has tabled an amendment to remove the provision that, while the special advocate will represent the appellant, he will not be responsible to him. That provision is also based directly on the SIAC, and it might be helpful if I explained briefly why it is necessary.

The special advocate will not be able to take instructions from the appellant in the normal way, because he will have access to information which he cannot share or discuss. It would be wrong, therefore, to impose on the advocate the normal responsibilities one would find in a client-lawyer relationship. The provision reflects the relationship between the advocate and the appellant, but does so in the context that the advocate is required to represent him. I have no doubt that the appellant's case will be argued to the full.

This important provision follows logically from the special advocate arrangements, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North will give further consideration to the point. I am sure that we will debate the matter in the time available.

I trust that the House will welcome the establishment of the tribunal. I do know that some hon. Members were concerned about whether the provisions provided sufficient safeguards for individuals. However, I hope that the House will agree that special arrangements—which are based directly on existing statutory provisions—are essential to safeguard national security, and that the balance we have aimed for has been achieved in the amendments, which, again, I commend to the House.

Mr. McNamara: I shall be very quick, because others want to get in. Does the House think that it is fair that a tribunal can take place without the applicant who has suffered a wrong having knowledge of the evidence which is being used against him; that part of it may be held in secret without him or his lawyer being present; that the tribunal, at best, need give him only a summary of what has been said; and that the proceedings may be held in his absence?

What does the House think of a prosecutor, the Attorney-General, appointing a barrister to represent the accused—who is called the appellant or respondent in this case—who has no responsibility to that person at all; who will argue a case in the absence of the accused; who will not be able to make any judgment whatever about the way in which the case has been handled; and who is chosen from a panel picked by his accusers? That cannot be right and fair in any way.

My amendment relates to the part of the Lords amendment No. 194 which says that a person appointed to represent the appellant

"shall be a member of the Bar of Northern Ireland . . . shall not be responsible to the party whose interests he represents."

Therefore, I want to know what reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State sent to the chairman of the Bar Council, because this issue is important to its members. In his letter, the chairman said:

"We have just become aware of the proposed procedure in the Government amendments to the Northern Ireland Bill—National Security Certificates whereby the Attorney General for Northern Ireland may appoint a person to represent the interests of a party to proceedings before the Tribunal in any proceedings from which he and any legal representative of his are excluded. It is proposed that the person appointed shall be a member of the Bar of Northern Ireland and shall not"— not is underlined—

"be responsible to the party whose interests he represents."

He continues:

"It is our preliminary view that such a procedure may put the barrister appointed in an impossible situation. By virtue of our Code of Conduct a barrister has certain obligations with which he must comply and we believe it may be impossible for him to discharge some under the above-mentioned procedure.

Accordingly we consider it important that we have the opportunity to discuss and respond to the proposal and we ask you to note our said interest. We await hearing from you as soon as possible."

I tabled a question asking what reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State sent, but have not yet received a reply. I did not know about the original letter until last Thursday or Friday.

We are talking about a case in which one does not know the evidence against one, one cannot be told it and one cannot be fully represented. One could lose one's livelihood. What is more, one's character is besmirched. In principle, that is as bad as the old exclusion order. It is dressed up and jazzed up, but at the end of the day one just does not know. However, we do know of the malicious way in which those orders have been used in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Ingram: The hon. and learned Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney) seemed to be rising, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I assumed that he wanted to speak.

Mr. Robert McCartney rose—

Mr. Ingram: However, I will not give way, because I have not yet said anything. I was trying to be gracious to the hon. and learned Gentleman in the time available. My hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) raised a number of issues, with which I shall try to deal. No doubt the hon. and learned Member for North Down may get a chance to intervene.

On the rights of the individual relative to the rights of the rest of society, we are setting up the tribunal to protect the rights of the individual. However, sensitive intelligence information is gathered by brave men and women who put their lives on the line daily and who are unseen, unheard and in many ways unapplauded because of the nature of their jobs—trying to ensure that those who carry out extreme, or potentially extreme, actions against the state are made known to the authorities. Therefore, when sensitive information is involved, it must be protected, because, by exposing it, we may be exposing the people who have gathered it on behalf of the rest of us.

We have taken account of the ruling of the European Court of Human Rights and put in place precisely our interpretation of it. We have also put in place mechanisms to defend the interests of the individual. So the individual's rights are indeed protected, and I entirely refute the way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North presented his arguments.

We have dealt with the matter in the right way—right in the interests of the whole of society. We have also achieved the best protection of the rights of the individual that was possible. My hon. Friend also referred to the Bar Council of Northern Ireland. He may not be aware of this, but discussions have been taking place between the council and the Attorney-General. This evening, the Bar Council met and formed a sub-committee to look into the matter in greater detail. It has been charged with reporting to the council within one week. Clearly, we are at the final point—we are moving towards the passage of this legislation. We shall take account of the sub-committee's report to the Government, as members of the Bar will be asked to represent the interests of the individuals concerned.

Mr. Robert McCartney: The point that the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) is making is that a balance must be struck between the conflicting interests of the state and the individual. I appreciate that the Minister has gone some way towards meeting European human rights criteria by appointing a barrister to look after the individual's rights and make representations. Presumably the barrister will see the reasons for granting the certificate, but why should he, without revealing the contents of the certificate, be prevented from taking detailed instructions from his client so that he can fully represent that client's interests? I do not believe that the barrister can fully represent his client unless he knows both the client's case and the contents of the certificate.

Mr. Ingram: Unlike the hon. and learned Gentleman, I am not a lawyer. As I understand the client-lawyer relationship, it would restrict the lawyer if we were to proceed as the hon. and learned Gentleman suggests—the lawyer would be in receipt of information that he could not impart to the client or appellant.

The Bar Council in England has also had to consider those matters, although in relation to the Special Immigration Appeals Commission. I understand that a SIAC case in which the issue will be tested is pending. We shall clearly have to consider whether the measure is robust and strikes a balance between the interests of appellants and of national security.

I take note of what the hon. and learned Gentleman has said and I am sure that the Bar Council of Northern Ireland, in which he takes an interest, will make its representations known through its sub-committee—its concerns will then be subject to further discussion and consultation with the Attorney-General. We are conscious of the difficulties, but we must protect both the national interest and the interest of the appellant.

Registration of Political Parties Bill

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): I have to acquaint the House with a message that has been received from the Lords, as follows. The Lords have agreed to the Registration of Political Parties Bill with amendments, to which they desire the agreement of the House. The text of the Lords amendments is available in the Vote Office, as is a separate paper containing the grouping to be proposed by the Member in charge of the Bill.

Ordered,

That the Lords amendments to the Registration of Political Parties Bill be considered forthwith.—[Mr. Betts.]

Lords amendments accordingly considered.

Clause 5

EMBLEMS

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 2, line 18, leave out ("an emblem" and insert ("up to three emblems").

12.15 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 7.

Mr. Howarth: The principal purpose of the registration scheme for political parties is to facilitate the running of the new systems for election to the Scottish Parliament, the National Assembly for Wales and, we hope, the European Parliament.

The Bill also addresses the problem of misleading candidates' descriptions. That is in part achieved by the introduction of party emblems on the ballot paper. When introduced, the Bill provided that a party could register one emblem, reflecting what we believed to be the position at that time: that all the main political parties used only one emblem. During consideration of the Bill in the other place, the Conservative Party realised, first, that the party in Scotland had a separate emblem and, a few days later, that the party in Wales also had its own emblem.

The amendments address that problem by providing that a party may register up to three emblems. It will be up to each party to determine whether it wants to register an emblem and, if so, whether it registers one, two or three. A candidate from a party that has more than one emblem registered may, however, use only one of them against his or her name on a ballot paper. This modest change will afford some welcome flexibility not only to the Conservative party but to all registered parties. I therefore commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): After a five-hour interlude, we are back to electoral matters. This is likely to be the final debate in this long Session, but the nature and subject of the amendments is typical of so much that has gone before. We are being asked to examine and approve details of the Government's constitutional reforms that were clearly overlooked in the original drafting, involving amendments made only this afternoon in another place and an amendment to an amendment passed only on 12 November. There has been no opportunity for anyone to study the Hansard report of the arguments. How could anyone have been aware that we were to consider the Bill tonight, when it was not even on the Order Paper?

The Minister knows that I am charitable, and I do not hold him personally responsible—we have enjoyed working together over the past 18 months on many pieces of legislation, and Conservative Members are grateful for the amendments, which we support—but he will also know that we did not approve of having emblems on ballot papers. Why include emblems when we have managed so long without them? It is becoming increasingly clear that, under the Labour Government, voting for a party is more important than voting for a candidate.

It is clear, as it should have been clear to the Government, that the need for a Bill to register political parties has been prompted by the fact that people will vote for parties in elections for the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh Assembly; therefore it ought to have been obvious that there would be a requirement for more than three emblems. We objected to emblems and would prefer that no emblems were used, but if the Government want emblems, there ought to be more than three. I am surprised that it was not thought of earlier.

We agree with the amendment and are grateful to the Minister and to Lord Williams of Mostyn for the courtesy that they have shown. We feel that sufficient damage has been done to the Government's credibility as regards electoral reform proposals for one day to enable us to accept the amendment, even at this late hour.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): I shall not delay the House by entering into a debate about who should or should not determine the electoral systems that face the people of this country, but it is important that I register the Liberal Democrats' support for the amendment, which is one that we proposed at various stages during the Bill's passage. It is welcome, because it will allow parties in the constituent parts of Great Britain to register their own emblems in their own right, as Scottish, Welsh or English parties. On that basis, we fully support the Government, who have listened to the representations that were made. Having offered our support and registered it in the Official Report, I shall not detain the House any longer.

Intermediate Health Care (North Norfolk)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Betts.]

12.22 am

Mr. David Prior (North Norfolk): I am pleased to have secured this vital debate on the future of intermediate care in north Norfolk. The issues raised will resonate in many other rural areas. I shall focus especially on the services provided by our community and cottage hospitals, which include rehabilitation. The debate builds on my Rural and Community Hospitals Bill, which I presented to the House last May, but which fell because of lack of parliamentary time.

In July 1998, the East Norfolk health authority produced for consultation a draft strategy document on intermediate services. The consultation period finished in October and the final decisions are promised next week, on 25 November. I want to use the debate to highlight my great concern about the effects of the health authority's proposed strategy on my constituency. The strategy implies the closure of several hospitals and I hope to elicit the Government's support in preventing any such closures. I think that the views I express are cross-party views in Norfolk, and I am delighted to see the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) present in the Chamber at such a late hour, although I sadly note the absence of any Liberal Democrat Members.

There are four community hospitals in North Norfolk, covered by the shadow primary care group North Norfolk Health. They are Benjamin Court in Cromer, Cranmer House in Fakenham, Kelling hospital outside Holt and the Wells cottage hospital. In total, they provide 95 community beds, but the health authority proposes a staggering reduction in that number, to between 16 and 21 beds—a reduction of 80 per cent. Most incredibly, Benjamin Court is to be reduced from 36 beds to none. Benjamin Court, I should add, is almost brand new. That reduction, if implemented, would undermine the viability of Wells, Cranmer House and Benjamin Court. The most likely survivor is Kelling, for which the health authority suggest a much reduced requirement for 12 to 15 beds. That is ironic, because only two years ago Kelling was the hospital that the health authority was most determined to close. So much for consistency.

Are the health authority's forecasts for bed requirements right? Let us consider in contrast the views of North Norfolk Health, the primary care group. North Norfolk Health comprises 34 general practitioners in eight practices, covering 62,000 patients. Its assessment is that it needs not 16 to 21 beds, as the health authority suggests, but 65 to 75 beds. It believes that the health authority should do all it can to keep the cottage hospitals open in North Norfolk. North Norfolk Health's assessment calls for nearly five times the number of beds proposed by the health authority. In the case of Benjamin Court, North Norfolk Health see a minimum need of at least 23 beds, but the health authority see a demand for none.

Those discrepancies are massive and raise grave questions about the health authority's strategy. It is not good enough for the health authority to state:

"Further analysis work will be undertaken with local primary care groups at the implementation stage."

It will be too late by then.

Because of the discrepancies, the health authority, in October, belatedly and after the end of the consultation exercise, felt obliged to have an independent review of bed requirements by a consultancy firm called RKW. One might feel that that was rather late in the day, rather rushed and somewhat less than satisfactory. Personally, I am wholly underwhelmed by the review, not least because it provided no figures for north Norfolk, only for Norfolk as a whole; yet north Norfolk is a special case and different, because it has more existing community hospitals, more elderly people and, because it is so rural, suffers from public transport problems.

RKW came up with a range of community bed requirements for Norfolk of between 176 and 234. The higher end of the range is some 50 beds more than proposed by the health authority. When RKW announced its findings, it was accompanied by a great flash of intellectual brilliance when a spokesman for the company said, with no obvious irony:

"We are not able to predict what will happen in the future."

Quite. No one knows how many community beds will be needed in the future, and we do not need an expert to tell us that. It would be absurd to make any decisions based on the figures so far presented. If any of those figures are reliable, I would put my money on those from North Norfolk Health, because it is closer to the patients and their clinical requirements.

The shambles over community bed numbers is matched by that over rehabilitation bed numbers. The health authority proposes 124 rehabilitation beds for Norfolk, excluding Great Yarmouth. By contrast, the department for medicine for the elderly based at the Norfolk and Norwich hospital believes that 180 beds will be needed—some 56 more. Moreover, RKW has produced another set of numbers which is nearly 50 per cent. higher than the health authority's number, and much closer to the number suggested by the department of medicine for the elderly. The same uncertainty that surrounds community beds also surrounds rehabilitation beds. Which figures are right? Evidently, no real science is involved.

RKW believes that, overall for Norfolk, as many as 416 community and rehabilitation beds may be needed, whereas the health authority thinks that only 316 beds are needed. Decisions about the future of our hospitals must not be taken on the basis of such uncertainty, not least because such decisions are irreversible.

Moreover, a number of other hugely significant factors, some of which are peculiar to Norfolk, also militate against taking any major decision on the basis of the health authority's strategy. First, North Norfolk Health will cease to be a shadow primary care group on 1 April next year when it will come into real existence with real powers. As stated in the Government's 1997 White Paper, the primary care groups

"understand patient needs and they deliver local services. That is why they will be in the driving seat in shaping local services."

North Norfolk Health has made it clear that it wants to retain the community hospitals, and to use their beds. It cannot be right that the health authority should, only four months before the PCG starts, pre-empt that view on such a critical issue.

[Mr. David Prior]

Secondly, the Minister will be aware that a new hospital is currently under construction to replace the Norfolk and Norwich hospital and the West Norwich hospital. The number of beds in the acute hospital will reduce from 1,037 to 809, a reduction of 228. There is already much local concern about that reduction, and it is aggravated by the suspicion that there is already pressure on the Norfolk and Norwich to discharge patients early to cut waiting lists. Many general practitioners in Norfolk talk openly about a revolving door syndrome, by which, to reduce waiting lists, patients are discharged from the acute Norfolk and Norwich hospital too early, only to be readmitted later.

With fewer beds in the new hospital, there will be added dangers of bed blocking and of rising waiting lists if there are too few community and rehabilitation beds. That concern has been highlighted both by Dr. Coni, a retired geriatrician from Addenbrooke's hospital, who has conducted independent clinical research on the health authority's behalf, and by the department of medicine for the elderly. In its submission to the health authority, that department said:

"The proposed reduction in rehab and community beds will lead to a large number of patients waiting in the acute hospital for intermediate care, which will in turn seriously affect the acute hospital's ability to meet its waiting list targets for elective surgery . . . Without adequate intermediate services the ability of the acute hospital to function effectively will be seriously compromised . . . Quite clearly the access to intermediate services in community hospitals is of crucial importance to the acute hospital."

Too great a reduction in community hospital beds could undermine the effectiveness of the new hospital and increase waiting lists. That risk cannot be worth taking. We must have some insurance in the system.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): Will the hon. Gentleman say something about alternative suggestions, and about the report into travel times from his constituency to the new facilities? Will there be a major problem with the travel facilities? Will he comment on the conditions in the new facilities?

Mr. Prior: Perhaps I can return to those points a little later.

The third factor I want to mention is the direct relationship between intermediate care and social services. Despite the eligibility criteria, it is right for patients to stay longer in hospital if there are no proper and adequate social services back-ups in the community. This year, Norfolk county council has had to reduce social service spending by more than £4 million, and a similar saving has been identified for next year. Until the Government are prepared to recognise the extra costs of delivering social services in rural areas and to an elderly population, the squeeze will continue.

The independent RKW research assumes that increased social service provision will reduce the need for 21 beds in Norfolk, and that a further 58 beds could be dispensed with because the length of stay in a bed will decrease. Both assumptions are highly suspect. My gut feeling is that, far from there being a reduction in the demand for beds, we may need to increase their number simply to compensate for fewer resources being available from social services.

The fourth factor is that the Secretary of State announced on 30 September a national inquiry into hospital beds because, as he said:

"It became clear last winter that in some parts of the country the scale of closures had gone too far."

That inquiry is due to report next spring. It may produce useful methodology, guidelines, evidence and ideas. It should not be pre-empted.

Finally, in 1999, the royal commission on the long-term care of the elderly will report. It will have something to say about the eligibility criteria for NHS beds and about the overlap between the NHS and the private sector. It may even suggest ways—I hope it does—of attracting private money into supporting community hospitals. The royal commission's terms of reference specifically include considering the options for funding long-term care for elderly people in their own homes and other settings. That review, which will have taken two years of exhaustive research, also should not be pre-empted.

The confusion and uncertainty over bed numbers, the impossibility of seeing clearly into the future and the particular uncertainties facing Norfolk at this time argue strongly for no precipitate, radical change now; yet the health authority's strategy reveals that its goal is clearly revolutionary change. I shall quote a few extracts from that document, which will give a flavour of it. It says:

"This is a plan for change. It is a far-reaching plan . . . Change is needed . . . Older style community hospitals will close."

The most hackneyed and meaningless soundbite of all says:

"We need to make some fundamental changes if we are to develop health services fit for the next millennium."

That is cool Britannia-speak, not a cool, clinical assessment.

A further, overpowering reason against radical change is the public's overwhelming support for our community hospitals. Their support is based on their personal experience of the quality of care received by patients, relatives and friends and the fact that it is delivered locally, and it is manifested by massive voluntary financial support and a huge number of volunteer visitors.

The community hospitals are part of our local fabric in North Norfolk. We are not starting with a clean piece of paper, however much the health authority would like that. We are starting with a number of institutions that have attracted a great deal of good will over generations, perform a vital public service and have a committed, dedicated and professional staff. As Dr. Coni from Addenbrookes has said:

"Now is not the time to pull down the edifice; it is time to build on what is there."

Dr. Coni is the clinician appointed by the health authority to give his clinical views after a lifetime in geriatrics.

That is also the view of the North Norfolk GPs and the department for medicine for the elderly at the Norfolk and Norwich hospital. There is no clinical case to support the closure of the community hospitals, quite the reverse. Now is absolutely the worst time to try to make any such decision. It would be a travesty if any such plans were approved.

Dr. Gibson: Did not Dr. Coni also say that the do-nothing option was not on?

Mr. Prior: I am not for one minute saying that we should do nothing—far from it. There is a strong case for specialist rehabilitation centres. I am particularly in favour of the rehabilitation centre at Cromer, and all the traffic analysis by the university of East Anglia, to which the hon. Gentleman referred earlier, suggests that Cromer is the right location. We should not rule out options for the future and we should not decide now to close community hospitals when the facts do not support those decisions. If the health authority comes to any such decision, I would ask the Secretary of State to review the decision and take evidence from the clinical experts, including the GPs, the experts in geriatrics at the Norfolk and Norwich, and Dr. Coni, and to give weight to the common sense of all those who use, work for and support our community hospitals. The health authority's plans for intermediate care in North Norfolk are not acceptable.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Hutton): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Mr. Prior) on securing time for this important debate. The hon. Gentleman has, quite properly, expressed his concerns about the future of intermediate health services in Norfolk. I shall respond to the specific issues that he has raised, but first I shall set out the current position.

East Norfolk health authority, as the hon. Gentleman said, is in the process of preparing its intermediate care strategy. There has been extensive consultation, but no decision will be made until 25 November, when the health authority meets in public. The final strategy will then be decided.

The first stage of the consultation finished on 13 October, and the health authority is now considering its outcome. There will need to be a further period of full consultation if there is to be any significant variation in services which might be necessary to implement the agreed strategy. No decision can or will be taken behind closed doors. The health authority has been particularly open in its debate on the draft strategy "Facing the Future". Indeed, I am aware that the hon. Gentleman congratulated the health authority on its open approach.

Already the health authority has received more than 1,400 responses, and about 3,000 people have attended the 12 public meetings to discuss the strategy. I understand that three public meetings were held in the hon. Gentleman's constituency at Cromer, Fakenham and Holt. Although he was unable to attend any of them, I am well aware of his concerns and his desire to protect the community hospitals in his constituency.

Community hospitals are an established part of the local health service and rightly enjoy a great deal of local support. I join the hon. Gentleman in paying tribute to all the staff in the community hospitals that he mentioned.

Intermediate care is a new way of organising those services that do not require the resources of a general hospital but are beyond the scope of the traditional primary care team. Intermediate care is a flexible concept, and the content of any intermediate care strategy will vary according to local need. It is about better ways of working and providing a seamless service for patients.

One of the factors that we need to consider is the role of intermediate care and other new models of care such as telemedicine in a modern NHS. There is a clear need to explore and evaluate those models of care and to share good practice right across the NHS. In recent years, we have made funds available through the continuing care challenge fund and winter pressures moneys to pilot this type of innovation within the service.

In the work that has been done in east Norfolk, intermediate care is defined as NHS community beds, rehabilitation and day treatment. The health authority's draft strategy for intermediate care identified an approach to determine the equitable provision of intermediate services in the future, and then it identified possible locations where services needed to be provided in order to respond to demand. It has also estimated the number of beds needed in each area.

The hon. Gentleman referred repeatedly to his concerns about those estimates. I know that others have expressed concern about the proposed number of beds. As he said, the health authority has commissioned independent research into that subject. The health authority strategy is now being reviewed in the light of the independent research, and a decision will be taken next week.

As has happened in other parts of the country, services have developed piecemeal over the years. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would be the first to acknowledge that. The health authority is of the view that the current service provided does not reflect population changes and the immense progress in medicine, which has resulted in shorter stays in hospital. In its view, the present provision does not give fair access to community beds across the county.

As the hon. Gentleman said, there are seven community hospitals in East Norfolk—Kelling, St. Michael's in Aylsham, Wells, North Walsham, Dereham, Wayland in Attleborough and Northgate in Great Yarmouth, which deliver a range of NHS services. Four of those are in north Norfolk—Kelling, North Walsham, Wells and St. Michael's. The health authority considers that that current layout of community hospitals is not equitable and that many people have to travel outside their area for in-patient NHS treatment. My understanding is that the health authority strategy aims to provide a much fairer pattern of NHS community beds across the whole of east Norfolk. Of the 458 beds covered by the review, 207 are in north Norfolk.

Mr. Prior: I am not an expert on hospitals or medicine. I can only repeat the views of the clinicians who have worked in north Norfolk, the general practitioners who will form the new primary care group, the experts in geriatrics at Norfolk and Norwich hospital, and now the independent firm of research consultants. They have come up with requirement levels for north Norfolk that are vastly different from those of the health authority.

Mr. Hutton: I shall come to that issue in a moment. My understanding is that the health authority, having commissioned that independent research, is now reviewing its strategy in the light of it. It would be premature to speculate and try to predict the results of that reconsideration ahead of the meeting on 25 November.

As I have said, I understand that 458 beds are covered by the review. Some 207 are in north Norfolk, 173 are in south Norfolk, 48 are in the Great Yarmouth area, but only 30 are in Norwich—the largest centre of population in the county. Only 27 out of 86 GP practices in east Norfolk have direct access to GP beds. I understand that no Norwich-based GP can refer direct to a community bed. That need to provide an equitable, quality service is the driving force behind the health authority's strategy.

The draft strategy will consider a number of new facilities, including an NHS centre with community beds in Norwich, new rehabilitation units for Norwich and Cromer—to which the hon. Gentleman referred—and day treatment and therapy centres for Norwich, Cromer, Great Yarmouth and Diss or Thetford. In considering the future of the community hospitals, occupancy levels were also considered as part of the strategy review. In north Norfolk, they have not been high. Until recently, figures showed that, of those 458 beds, an average of only about 340 were occupied at any one time.

As I am sure the hon. Gentleman is aware, the Government are committed to providing the first-class national health service that the nation needs for the next millennium, which will provide the best possible balance and range of services for local people. We set out our plans for modernising the national health service in our White Paper last autumn. It is clear that hospitals will need to develop and evolve to meet the changing needs and expectations of the public and clinical advances. In some cases, that will mean building new hospitals; in others, it may mean closing old ones, changing their use, or using hospital facilities in new and different ways.

Hospitals and trusts will need to work more closely together and replace competition with co-operation and a renewed emphasis on improving quality, including national standards and clinical audit. As part of that modernisation programme, the Government have already approved 31 major hospital developments, worth almost £2.4 billion. That is the biggest renewal and modernisation programme in the history of the national health service. As the hon. Gentleman is no doubt aware, the largest private finance initiative health project yet agreed is the £214 million new hospital on the outskirts of Norwich that will serve much of north Norfolk and the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I am sure that he will want to welcome that major investment in the national health service in Norfolk.

The Government do not intend that hospital services will develop and evolve in a vacuum. New national service frameworks will provide a clear structure within which local hospital services should develop. In addition, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health announced recently, we have set up a national beds inquiry to review the needs and best usage of hospital facilities—particularly beds—to provide clear and strategic direction for the NHS locally in planning and developing services.

The Government are committed to the NHS, and have pledged large sums of money, which shows that commitment. Only this week, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Health announced £180 million of capital investment for the new Eastern region next year. Last week, we announced a cash increase of £22.9 million for East Norfolk in its allocation for next year—a real-terms increase of nearly 4 per cent.

I am surprised that the hon. Member for North Norfolk failed to refer to that, but he did mention what he thought were pressures on social services budgets. It may be of interest to him that, under the terms of the comprehensive spending review, we were also able to announce significant increases for social services over the next three years, amounting to £3 billion. In addition to all that extra cash, for this year £3.2 million has been pledged to help East Norfolk to tackle waiting lists and winter pressures.

On the role of community hospitals, our White Paper recognised that community hospitals have been sidelined too often in the past. Our aim is to provide a service which offers swift advice and treatment, as close to where people live as possible. Community hospitals will be an important part of delivering such services and may, in many cases, provide an appropriate setting for intermediate care services. They will, however, have to fit into plans for the wider health and social care systems—and meet the same quality standards and fairness and efficiency tests—as other parts of the health care system.

There is no single national blueprint which will suit different localities. That is why it is the job of health authorities to ensure that local services are matched to local needs. There is no doubt that community hospitals, in some form, will have a key role to play—where they are appropriate and can provide a safe, clinically effective and efficient service for their locality. It is right that the future of community hospitals in Norfolk, as elsewhere, should be decided on that basis.

Under our White Paper proposals, primary care groups and trusts will be a focus for better integrating primary and community care services. Clearly, they will have a role in delivering intermediate care services, but the health authority has a strategic role in examining the overall pattern and range of services.

We must take into account whether any change in local health services will improve care for patients, and that applies to community hospitals just as much as to any other part of health service provision. No part of health care stands alone: it is an interconnected system—between primary, community and acute services. How that is delivered will differ from one area to another.

Ministers can become involved only if a local community health council objects to any of the proposals. Until such time, we must remain objective and impartial. In its draft strategy, the health authority states that the quality of patient care matters most. It is also a matter of equity. Those are both tenets to which the Government clearly subscribe, and the Anglia and Oxford regional office—and, subsequently, the Eastern regional office—will be monitoring the situation to ensure that those considerations prevail.

If the matter is to come before Ministers—

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Special Needs

1. Mr. Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green): If he will make a statement on the Government's plans for special needs education. [59102]

6. Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): What proposals he plans to bring forward following the consultation on the Green Paper on special educational needs, "Excellence for all Children". [59107]

The Minister for School Standards (Ms Estelle Morris): Following consultation on our Green Paper, "Excellence for all children: meeting special educational needs", and in the light of advice from the National Advisory Group on Special Educational Needs, we published earlier this month "Meeting Special Educational Needs: A Programme of Action", stating the practical steps that we shall take to support and promote developments in SEN. The action programme will be supported by funding of almost £60 million in 1999–2000.

Mr. McCabe: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. She will be familiar with the excellent work of the Dame Ellen Pinsent school in my constituency. At a recent meeting with parents at the school, I was struck by the number of them who feared that an inclusion policy might result in the school's closure. Will my hon. Friend assure those parents—all parents—of children with special needs that the Government will play no part in forcing the closure of good special schools, or in forcing children with special needs into mainstream schools? Will she assure those parents that any inclusion policy will ensure that they are totally involved in and fully consulted on that policy?

Ms Morris: I am delighted to give those assurances. Both my hon. Friend and I have children in our constituencies who attend the Dame Ellen Pinsent school, and I should like to add my warm words about its work. The thrust of the Green Paper on inclusion is to give parents a genuine choice. Many parents currently do not feel that they have the choice of educating their children in a mainstream school because that school is not able to cope with their children. However, not one word in reply to the Green Paper should cause any special school to feel under threat. Parents will retain their right to express a preference for a special school.

I should say also that there is at Dame Ellen Pinsent and other schools so much expertise in their teachers. We want to ensure that that expertise is used not only in special schools but in mainstream schools, to support a wider range of students. Special schools are safe if they are good schools and parents wish to send their children to them, but like all schools, special schools must accept the need to change and to offer high standards for our children.

Mr. Pike: I recognise what the Minister has just said, but will she make it absolutely clear that special schools that are meeting both parents' needs and the established criteria have a future in the all-inclusive education system, and that the two will work side by side when appropriate?

Ms Morris: Exactly. Our motivation is to give choice to parents and students and a good quality of education to every child with special educational needs. I am delighted to have this opportunity to say that not one word that I or other Ministers have said should lead any special school to fear that its future is in doubt. If parents wish to send their children to special schools, they will retain the right to do so. Any change to any school, regardless of whether it is a special school, is subject to local decisions, and it will be even more so in the new framework. I am happy to give those assurances, and am pleased that I have had the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): I was interested to hear the Minister's reply. In Gloucestershire, there is pressure to close a very good school, Alderman Knight school, which provides an excellent service for children with special educational needs. As the Minister will be aware, many of those children also suffer physical disadvantages. Will she make it clear to all local education authorities that the policy she has just stated to the House is the Government's policy? There is much doubt in LEAs about what that policy is.

Ms Morris: There can be no doubt about it on the part of anyone who has read either the original document or the action plan that we have launched subsequently. I shall say again something that I have said many times before: no local authority, no school and no governing body should be quoting anything from either our documents or our words to imply that special schools should close on a point of principle. I do not know the circumstances to which the hon. Gentleman refers, and I cannot be expected to know them. However, there are bound to be changes in the pattern of provision of education in local authority areas as times change and as parents express different preferences.

Of course, there may be occasions when the pattern of provision for children with special educational needs is such that a reorganisation of special needs provision is the best thing. Nothing that I have said suggests that special needs provision should be set in stone, but we are not sending a message that special schools do not have a future. They do have a future because they meet the needs of some parents and pupils, and many of their staff have great expertise that we want to use across the school system.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): What assessment has the Minister made of the advocacy services, which are very often provided by the voluntary and charitable sector, to support parents through the statementing process when they are, for example, lodging an appeal? She will know that the service is patchy in parts of the country. Although the Department issues very good written advice about parents' rights, what plans does she have to make sure that there is uniform support and provision for parents going through what, for them, is often a very distressing process?

Ms Morris: My judgment is that the advocacy services often provided by voluntaries bodies are excellent and that they support parents at a very difficult time. I am delighted to be able to tell the hon. Lady that, as part of our action plan, we have made funds available for a parent partnership in every local authority area. We have restored a provision that was cut by the previous Government.

The financial resources that we have provided have ensured that that facility will be made available to parents. I have made it clear that I want and expect every local authority to develop parent partnerships to support parents in the way that the hon. Lady described. If, in due course, that has not happened, we shall look for legislative time to give the provision statutory force.

New Deal (Young People)

2. Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): If he will make a statement on progress in securing employer involvement in the new deal for the young unemployed. [59103]

The Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities (Mr. Andrew Smith): The new deal is making good progress in securing employer involvement, with now nearly 33,000 employers signed up—254 of them in the Swindon district—and with firms of all sizes actively involved in the planning, promotion and delivery of the new deal.

Ms Drown: I thank my right hon. Friend for that helpful reply. My constituency has low unemployment, but some young people, and others eligible for the new deal, have real difficulties in returning to work, even with the support of the new deal. For example, they may have communication difficulties or lack some social skills. What advice does my right hon. Friend have for employers so that they might help into work some of the people who are not yet job-ready?

Mr. Smith: There are a number of ways in which employers can offer extra assistance—for example, through involvement in the design and delivery of the gateway, by encouraging employees to act as mentors, and by offering mock interviews—to help especially disadvantaged young people to get jobs. I am pleased to say that many employers are already doing just that, which is greatly to their credit. Indeed, I know of some in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Will the Minister confirm that nearly 80 per cent. of the companies that have signed up to the new deal have so far failed to recruit a single young new deal participant? In light of that, is it any surprise that employers are losing faith as the Government's elaborate flagship becomes just the latest in a long string of expensive failures?

Mr. Smith: No, I will confirm no such thing. The 33,000 employers who have signed up to the new deal are testimony to their confidence in it. As the hon. Gentleman is talking about the progress of the new deal, he might like to take account of the fact that, in 18 months, we have reduced youth unemployment to a level lower than it was at any time during the 18 years of the previous Government. What is more, in the six months the new deal has been up and running nationally, youth unemployment has fallen at nearly twice the rate it did in the six months before the general election.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Minister bear in mind that in some parts of Britain there are still pockets of very high unemployment, especially in coalfield areas where the Tories closed the pits? Will he pay special attention to that and ensure that special training centres are set up to mop up the unemployment? If he has time, will he also bear it in mind that towards the end of the year a new deal for jobs will be required for the unemployed hereditary peers? May I suggest that they be found tasks cleaning out the sewers?

Mr. Smith: I have taken serious note of what my hon. Friend said about hereditary peers and, more importantly, the needs of the coalfield communities. We are looking at the adequacy of the training provision and carefully monitoring the progress of young unemployed people into jobs or, through the other new-deal options, in gaining the skills that they need genuinely to enhance their employability. That is every bit as, if not more, important in coalfield areas, inner cities and estates that were blighted by high unemployment under the Conservatives but which this Government are taking action to help.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): Does the Minister agree that one of the most difficult sectors of youth unemployment to place in work is that from the ethnic minorities? Is he aware that 20 per cent. fewer people from ethnic minorities find subsidised employment through the new deal? For example, in Lambeth where half the people on options are from ethnic minorities, only one in four finds subsidised employment. Is it not time the Department started keeping records so that the anomalies can be understood and rectified?

Mr. Smith: It is because we started keeping records that the hon. Gentleman can ask the question. Under the new deal, we have introduced ethnic monitoring for the first time. In the spirit of co-operation on the part of the hon. Gentleman's party, he might like to refer to the glass as half full rather than half empty. The good news from the early figures is that, so far, ethnic minorities have been moving into unsubsidised jobs at the same rate as the rest of the population.

As for the options, a higher proportion of ethnic minorities are involved in the full-time education and training option and the voluntary sector option and a lower proportion in the employment option and the environmental task force. Of course we are closely monitoring that and looking into the reasons for it; and we shall make any necessary adjustments to the programme to provide full and fair opportunities for ethnic minorities.

College for Educational Leadership

3. Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands): If he will make a statement on the College for Educational Leadership. [59104]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Charles Clarke): My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced our plans to establish a new national college for school leadership at a conference for new head teachers on 20 October. The proposals for the college will form part of the major programme for modernisation of the teaching profession to be set out in a Green Paper to be published before the end of the year. The college is intended to provide heads with the cutting-edge leadership skills they need to drive up standards in schools. We intend to publish a prospectus for the college early next year and the college will be established in 2000.

Charlotte Atkins: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. In the light of the Select Committee's report on the role of head teachers, does he recognise that if we are to overcome the recruitment difficulties, we must make the profession more attractive and respected? Obviously, higher training and a better system of training are one solution, but another would be to provide more systematic mentoring and support from local education authorities and outside bodies.

Mr. Clarke: I pay tribute to the Select Committee report, a task in which my hon. Friend played a major part. It is a very valuable report. As she well knows, it recommends that the Government consider how the college might focus on raising the profile of school leadership, bring cohesion to the training and development of heads and build on existing best practice. One very important element of existing best practice is mentoring, which exists in some schools and is very effective. I very much agree with my hon. Friend that one of the college's objectives will be to find ways of developing the relationship between schools and the wider community, through mentoring and other means.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): The college may want to focus on schools that are coasting, particularly in educating 14 to 16-year-olds, so will the Minister repeat the Government's commitment to introducing a progress index that shows the performance of all schools in educating 14 to 16-year-olds—or will there be a climb down? Will the Government publish information only on schools in grades A and B? Would not such a U-turn be evidence of how far the Government are out of touch with the views of secondary teachers around the country?

Mr. Clarke: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is making a statement on that later this afternoon. We have been clear throughout—in the face of Conservative opposition—about the need to develop effective value-added data on the basis of which parents can make accurate judgments about the schools that they are considering. We have a pilot project going through that in great detail, and it is our strong intention to develop the value-added data in a way that will assist parents to make the informed judgments that they wish to make.

Mr. Willetts: During oral questions on education and employment, Madam Speaker, it is unacceptable for the Minister to tell the House that there will be a statement on the matter later today. If the Government are going to abandon their previous stated policy of publishing an index of the performance of all secondary schools, the House should be told so now.

Mr. Clarke: I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the main question is about a college for educational leadership and headship training, which is not what he has asked about. My right hon. Friend is making a statement on the matter later. It will speak for itself.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Willetts: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I cannot take points of order in the middle of questions.

University Tuition Fees

4. Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): How many representations he has received in respect of the introduction of tuition fees for students attending university; and how many have been (a) favourable and (b) unfavourable to the policy. [59105]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. George Mudie): Since the announcement of our initial response to the Dearing report in July 1997, we have received nearly 10,000 letters on the new funding arrangements, in largely three tranches. The correspondence has covered many aspects of the issue, and because of its range has not been classified in the way requested.

Mr. Wareing: Does my hon. Friend understand that, in future years, when there may be an increase in the number of higher education places available, the sons and daughters of the working class or of middle-class people of moderate means will not be able to avail themselves of them because of tuition fees and the abolition of maintenance grants? Will he carry out an urgent consultation with the university authorities and the National Union of Students with a view to reviewing the entire situation, in the light of Labour's traditional policy of free education for all?

Mr. Mudie: We introduced fees to increase and widen participation, which my hon. Friend should agree with. We have also spent considerable additional sums. I am sure that my hon. Friend shares our objectives, particularly as we have built in safeguards to ensure that individuals from lower-income families do not have to pay fees. I am sure that when my hon. Friend goes back to his constituency, he will be at pains to get across to working class families the fact that they will not be paying fees, so that should not be a consideration. We want them to encourage their children to go where they should be—to our universities.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): Will the Minister share with the House the reason why the Prime Minister cancelled the meeting that was arranged with students at the university of Strathclyde to discuss tuition fees? And why did the BBC fail, for the first time ever, to carry the story of a demonstration against the Prime Minister on tuition fees?

Mr. Mudie: If the hon. Lady wants to ask the Prime Minister, Wednesday is the right day, not Thursday. The House will be aware that the Prime Minister has many calls on his time, being the particularly accessible Prime Minister that he is. I am sure that the hon. Lady understands.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): How many representations have been submitted by or on behalf of adult students? Many adult students do not enter higher education in order to be able to earn more. They may earn the same amount following such education as they did beforehand, but will have sacrificed three years' earnings. Will not they face particular difficulties due to the fee arrangements?

Mr. Mudie: As my hon. Friend is aware, repayments relate to income—unlike under the previous scheme. Any loans to be repaid depend on the individual being in work, and start only when the individual begins earning more than £10,000 a year.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): May I express my regret that the Minister could not find time to join me and many others on the platform at the National Union of Students rally last week, where students of all political persuasions condemned the Government for their multiple attacks on student finances? Will he confirm that, significantly, applications from mature students—who know something about debt—were 10 per cent. down this year? Will he explain, not just to me but to many of his hon. Friends, why he did not follow Lord Dearing's advice to keep the maintenance grant in order to increase access to higher education, rather than damage it, as the Government have done?

Mr. Mudie: I find it humorous, to say the least, to be invited to share with the hon. Gentleman the platform of an organisation which the Conservative party at one stage wanted to abolish. We have taken steps this year on the issue of mature students; additional steps will be taken next year. We are alive to difficulties and opportunities.

Mr. Bill Rammell (Harlow): Was not the introduction of tuition fees a necessary step to restore university funding? Does my hon. Friend agree that the supposed decrease in applications, which many who opposed tuition fees predicted did not materialise? Will he reassure the House that he will not be following the advice of the recent Fabian Society pamphlet, which was to introduce differential top-up fees so that some institutions can charge higher fees? Is not that the fundamental difference between those of us on the Government Benches and the Conservative party?

Mr. Mudie: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. It is worth recalling that, when the Conservative party left government, university numbers had risen by 40 per cent., but income per unit had fallen by 25 per cent., leaving the universities in a desperate financial situation.

National Literacy Hour

5. Jackie Ballard (Taunton): If he will make a statement on implementation of the national literacy hour. [59106]

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): The literacy hour came into being in September. Three hundred thousand framework documents have been issued, and training for co-ordinators in every school and training materials for every teacher have been provided. We are delighted that the response in schools up and down the country has been tremendous. As with the literacy pilot schemes, there have been great improvements in literacy, phonics and the grammar of children who have been undertaking the literacy hour.

Jackie Ballard: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply. Recently, the chief inspector of schools, Chris Woodhead, offered to intervene on behalf of schools that do not want to implement aspects of the national literacy strategy, including the literacy hour, providing that they can prove to him that their results are good enough. Will the Secretary of State clarify who is in charge of implementation of the literacy hour—the national literacy centre or the chief inspector of schools?

Mr. Blunkett: The chief inspector has a very clear role in assessing, through inspection, whether schools are providing the quality and meeting the standards that we have stipulated. His job, therefore, is to assess whether teaching methods are appropriate. If the literacy hour is adapted, so that it allows a school to meet a pupil's particular needs and reach the targets that it, the education authority and the Government are establishing, there is no problem whatever.

The approach is not prescriptive but proactive, ensuring that schools meet the best and that all children, whichever school they attend, will be able to read and write by the time they reach secondary level.

Mrs. Sylvia Heal (Halesowen and Rowley Regis): Does my right hon. Friend share my view that it is extraordinary that Conservative Members oppose the literacy hour? Does that not reveal their wish to avoid teaching most children in primary schools the basics of phonics, grammar and spelling?

Mr. Blunkett: My hon. Friend raises an important point, because the shadow Secretary of State for Education and Employment—for want of a better term—has written about his disagreement with the literacy hour in The Times Educational Supplement.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): It is too rigid.

Mr. Blunkett: What is rigid about it is that people are being asked to teach phonics, grammar and spelling.

We need the Conservatives to tell us now, in public, whether they have abandoned any wish for children in our state schools to have the same opportunities as they buy for their own children in private education.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): I assure the Secretary of State that the Conservatives are, of course, committed to improving literacy standards. The issue is whether the Government's literacy hour will achieve that. In Birmingham last month, members of the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers told Professor Barber, the head of the Government's standards and effectiveness unit, that the literacy strategy is pushing teachers to breaking point.

Recent research by Warwick university has suggested that the literacy hour is too long—[Laughter.] Yes it is. Last month the Secretary of State for Scotland supported the launch of an alternative literacy strategy based on research that showed that of a number of literacy programmes, those advocated for the literacy hour gave the worst results. Will the Secretary of State now listen to the voices of academics and teachers, and to his right hon. Friend, and think again?

Mr. Blunkett: When is an hour not an hour? When it is only 59 minutes? What a silly comment. We are building the literacy strategy entirely on the experience of the national literacy centres. In a spirit of co-operation, just in case the hon. Lady has forgotten, I remind her that it was her own damn Government that set up the national literacy centres in the first place. We have drawn on the evidence of the centres that her party set up, we have established programmes across the country, and we have learnt that in two years the national literacy framework improved the reading age of children by eight to 12 months.

The programme is working, as is demonstrated by a 10-point increase in the English and literacy standards of those 11-year-olds over the past two years, and it will work in every town and city in the country. As one teacher in Birmingham put it:

"I was determined to be critical of it, but I find I can't be".

Such reservations, of course, have never stopped Conservative Members.

Parental Support

7. Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): What measures his Department is taking to support parents of young children in disadvantaged areas. [59108]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Ms Margaret Hodge): The Government's early education and child care policies are intended for all families with young children. However, support for family literacy and learning, homestart, and much of the funding for the national child care strategy, recognise social need. That, coupled with the sure start programme, provides a strategy for tackling the legacy of multiple deprivation.

Mr. Coaker: Does the Minister agree that we need to ensure that our anti-poverty strategies stretch across all our cities and communities, so that areas sometimes missed out of anti-poverty work benefit as well?

Will she join me in paying tribute to the work of the Greater Nottingham partnership and Gedling borough council on their parenting initiative in one of the poorest areas of my borough—namely, Netherfield?

Ms Hodge: I agree with my hon. Friend that we must address deprivation and poverty wherever they exist, and particularly pockets of deprivation in otherwise relatively affluent areas. Therefore, I am particularly pleased that we have embarked on the sure start programme. It will be an area-focused programme, but within pram-pushing distance of families, and therefore closer to the pockets of deprivation. Initiatives such as the working families tax credit and the child care tax credit will ensure an individual approach. I am happy to join my hon. Friend in congratulating the Greater Nottingham partnership and Gedling borough council on their anti-poverty strategy and parenting initiative.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): I understand that one way in which the Government seek to support children in disadvantaged areas is through their education action zones. Is every private sector company involved in education action zones going ahead with the bids which have been accepted, or are some of those who indicated their support at the outset now saying that, because of the Government's ambivalence over the involvement of private sector and profit-making organisations in our education system, they may not go ahead with their support?

Ms Hodge: That is simply not true. Every education action zone has private sector involvement, and that is going from strength to strength in each education action zone. I was at lunch with the leader of one of those education action zones, who was applauding the involvement of the private sector. The Government are also grateful for that growing involvement.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North): The consultation paper on family policy talked about the important role that health visitors play, and could play in the future, in supporting all parents with very young children. Given that many parents need advice between the birth of a child, when the health service is involved, and the time when a child starts school, when the education system takes over, will my hon. Friend have talks with her colleagues in the Department of Health with a view to enabling health visitors to play that vital role in future?

Ms Hodge: I congratulate my hon. Friend on becoming the Chairman of the Select Committee on Education and Employment. I share his view that it is important that we have a co-ordinated approach, across all the professions, to children in their early years. Health visitors have a critical role to play in that regard. That is why we see them playing a crucial role in the sure start project which we will establish in 250 areas across the country. I am involved in discussions with colleagues, such as my right hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health, to ensure that health visitors are incorporated—as are other professionals—in the work that we are doing with young children.

Local Education Authority Expenditure

8. Mr. Andrew George (St. Ives): If he will make a statement on (a) the administrative expenditure of and (b) peripatetic support provided by, local education authorities. [59109]

The Minister for School Standards (Ms Estelle Morris): The Government's plans for the further development of financial delegation to schools will require local education authorities to keep their administrative expenditure under strict control while at the same time enabling them to maintain essential support services for their schools. A draft of the regulations giving effect to our proposals will be laid before Parliament shortly.

Mr. George: I am grateful to the Minister for that helpful reply. Bearing in mind the fact that in dispersed and rural areas, such as Cornwall, the cost can be great, will the Minister assure the House that the cost of providing education services peripatetically—such as services for visually impaired or hearing-impaired pupils—are fully reflected in the allocation formula for local education authorities across the country?

Ms Morris: I am aware of the position in the hon. Gentleman's county, where a large number of children have special educational needs statements and there is a strong peripatetic service. I can assure him that local authorities will be able to retain funding for low-incidence SEN disabilities, and that nothing we have decided on so far should disturb the arrangements to which he referred.

Mr. [illegible] Gardiner (Brent, North): I am sure that my hon. Friend will be delighted to know that in my constituency, the central retention budget, at about £139 per head, is one of the lowest in the country. However, having such a low centrally retained budget creates certain problems for a local authority—for instance, when bidding for the private finance initiative for schools. Will my hon. Friend look into the problems that local authorities may experience when the centrally retained budget does not allow for enough in-house legal and design service expertise to produce a bid, which may disadvantage them? Will she study ways in which other money might be made available to such authorities?

Ms Morris: It is for Brent to decide how it conducts its business, but I have not noticed a lack of interest, enthusiasm or activity on the part of local education authorities in proposing PFIs to the Department. Those are coming in in great numbers and we welcome that. Of course, Brent can buy expertise from elsewhere to prepare its PFI bid if it has not retained sufficient staff to do so itself. I will be happy to discuss that matter further with my hon. Friend outside the Chamber, if that would be helpful.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): When the Minister studies local authority expenditure on education, will she take careful account of the answer given by the Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge) to the previous question, in which she recognised that otherwise affluent areas contain pockets of deprivation. At a school such as Watchetts county primary in my constituency, which is a pioneer in, for example, after-school clubs, 60 per cent. of pupils are statemented or have special educational needs. Will she take account of that and lobby her ministerial colleagues in the Treasury and the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions to ensure that no further cuts are made in provision for shire counties? The only effect of such cuts would be further damage to schools. While the Minister is on her feet, will she say how she can possibly justify the discourtesy that we were shown in an earlier answer, when it was announced that the Secretary of State would not make a statement to the House but would once again bypass it and make one elsewhere?

Ms Morris: The hon. Gentleman has a cheek, as a Conservative Member, talking about reductions in education funding. Having said that, I entirely accept that there are constituencies in shire and city areas which contain pockets of deprivation, but they are small pockets compared with some other local authorities, or indeed, constituencies within them. Of course, when we allocate money to local authorities we take into account the needs of all children in all constituencies and local authorities. The way in which local authorities allocate that money to schools is their decision. From my experience I know that the right thing for local Members of Parliament to do is to campaign and lobby at local authority level to ensure that the needs of their constituency are met. The greatest advantage under this Government is that there is a larger pot of money to go at.

Surplus Places

9. Jacqui Smith (Redditch): What support he provides for areas undertaking school reorganisation to remove surplus places. [59110]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Charles Clarke): We make capital allocations to support cost-effective projects to remove surplus places. We have allocated £40 million for surplus place removal projects due to begin in the current financial year.

Jacqui Smith: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. He will be aware that Redditch schools are being reviewed with the aim of removing 2,000 surplus places. While I support that aim, it is causing considerable local concern as at least 20 schools will be directly affected and the knock-on effects will cover the whole town. Will he assure me that if the reorganisation plans end up on his desk, he will undertake to get the views of parents, schools and governors throughout the town? Furthermore, as he has recognised the capital implications of such reorganisations, will he assure me that areas such as Redditch will get priority for capital allocation?

Mr. Clarke: I am aware that my hon. Friend's local education authority is still consulting on options for Redditch. That is properly a matter for the authority. If it decides to publish proposals, local people will have an opportunity to object and make their points clear in whatever way they think fit. A decision on any such proposals must be made on the merits of the case, taking account of education, economic factors and the views of local people. I will be happy to listen to and consider carefully all representations that my hon. Friend and her constituents make.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): Will the Minister give a simple pledge that no school will close as a result of any reorganisation that may follow a ballot leading to the abolition of grammar schools?

Mr. Clarke: First, as the hon. Gentleman knows, grammar schools are not being abolished. Secondly, grammar schools have nothing to do with school reorganisation to remove surplus places. Thirdly, I will not give a pledge that no school will close as a result of reorganisation to remove surplus places. As he well knows, that is a matter for local education authorities, which will decide how properly to deal with it. I am confident and pleased that LEAs are dealing with the issue in a responsible and forward-looking way, without making party political points as he takes great pleasure in doing.

New Deal

10. Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): If he will report progress on the new deal initiative. [59111]

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): The new deal has taken on board 160,000 young people across the country—50,000 have entered options, 30,000 of whom have entered jobs. In Chipping Barnet, I am glad to say, there have been nearly 2,000 gateway interviews, giving young people hope for the future.

Sir Sydney Chapman: Obviously, I welcome any progress in the reduction of youth unemployment, but is the right hon. Gentleman concerned that the drop-out rate seems to be about 40 to 45 per cent.? Is he inquiring why young people are dropping out and where they are going? Is he in his heart satisfied that this very expensive initiative is the most cost-effective way in which to move people from the dole into gainful employment?

Mr. Blunkett: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman welcomes anything that gets young people off the dole, as the shadow Secretary of State is on record saying that the scheme is a monumental irrelevance. It is certainly not an irrelevance to those 50,000 young people who have found an option. The drop-out rate is not 45 per cent.; cumulatively, it is 19 per cent, which is 6 per cent. lower than for any equivalent programme that was run by the previous Government. If he had been courteous and committed enough to turn up to the meetings in his area to which he was invited, to discuss the new deal and help us to implement it, he might have been a little better informed.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley): Having examined evidence from the new deal pathfinder areas and from the new deal for lone parents, the Education and Employment Committee, of which I am a member, has highlighted the importance of personal advisers in targeting advice and assistance that is tailored to the individual's needs. We have been heartened by that, particularly in the light of the earlier scepticism about the ability of the Employment Service to undertake that job. Will my right hon. Friend assure us that continuing attention will be given both to the training needs of people in the Employment Service, so that they can undertake that important job, and to the case load, so that the role of personal advisers will continue to be a critical feature of the programme?

Mr. Blunkett: I can give that assurance. Indeed, next year, we will be allocating more money to the Employment Service for training to conduct similar gateway interviews for adult unemployed men and women, so that we can extend the advisory service, which has been so successful. The advisory service provides the gateway and ensures that young people are prepared educationally and socially to take jobs—that is why it sometimes takes longer to place the young person in a vacancy. In Australia, a similar system failed precisely because it was used to reduce the dole queue and not to prepare young people for the world of work of tomorrow and to ensure that they had the training and qualifications to do the job.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): Does the Secretary of State accept that he will need accurate data if he is to give a progress report on the new deal? Will he confirm that his Department does not monitor even the number of starts on the employment option by employer? When I asked the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities for data on the new deal, I was supplied with information from an incorrect source and an incorrect date—the figures were inaccurate by nearly 350 per cent. Will the Secretary of State confirm that, when I requested information on what people in the full-time education and training option were doing, the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities asked his officials to collect those data only the day before he replied to me?

Mr. Blunkett: I am completely convinced that that last point is simply not true. With further education colleges taking on full-time trainees across the board on a rolling programme—not at the beginning of each term—it is not surprising that data are difficult to come by, but I take on board entirely what the hon. Gentleman says about statistical data and monitoring. We inherited a completely hopeless system of monitoring and evaluation of what was taking place in the service. We are updating it, and EDS has taken on a new contract and is making capital investment. I am determined that we will get the monitoring and statistics right. If any inaccuracies are drawn to our attention, we will deal with them immediately.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow): The new deal is making progress, and I can see that in my constituency, but does my right hon. Friend agree that, if we are to continue that process, we need to ensure that the employers who have become involved are kept involved? There have been some problems with delays in paying money due to employers from the Employment Service. Will he ensure that money is paid when it is due, because otherwise we are likely to lose some employers from the scheme?

Mr. Blunkett: I can give my hon. Friend an absolute assurance. There is no excuse for non-payment and we want to give a lead by preventing the liquidity of small companies from being undermined, as it has so often been, by the failure of larger companies to pay on time. I seem to remember that the previous Deputy Prime Minister was going to do something about that, but never did. We will do something about it, and if my hon. Friend draws it to my personal attention and to that of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities, we will act immediately.

Temporary Classrooms (Colchester)

11. Mr. Bob Russell (Colchester): How many of the temporary classrooms in the Colchester constituency he expects will be replaced with permanent accommodation by 2002. [59112]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Charles Clarke): I understand that there are 112 temporary classrooms in 47 maintained schools in Colchester. It is for the local education authority and, until April 1999, the Funding Agency for Schools, to decide in consultation with schools what priority to give to replacing temporary classrooms.

Mr. Russell: I accept that the previous Government left the legacy of all those temporary classrooms, but if the Government want to reduce class sizes, how will the youngsters be accommodated? What priority do the Government give to replacing temporary classrooms? Does the Minister agree that such classrooms are a substandard way of providing accommodation and that the Government are failing a whole generation?

Mr. Clarke: Obviously, I cannot and do not accept that for a moment. I agree that there is a legacy of capital underspending over the past 18 years, which we are setting about repairing. It is for the local education authority to decide how to address the problem and we are encouraging authorities to produce asset management plans to enable them to focus on the best way of lifting the quality of provision in their area. That is the job of Essex LEA, as it is of all other LEAs, and the position on temporary classrooms takes its place within that overall capital strategy that we want to encourage.

State and Private Schools

12. Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase): If he will make a statement on relations between the state and private school sectors. [59114]

The Minister for School Standards (Ms Estelle Morris): We welcome closer collaboration between independent and maintained schools in raising standards. To promote partnership, we are supporting 47 projects with £600,000 this year, and a further £1 million from April 1999. We established an advisory group to monitor partnerships and build bridges and we accepted all the recommendations in its recent report.

Dr. Wright: Does my hon. Friend remember the historic occasion last month when she addressed the headmasters and headmistresses conference jamboree and received a standing ovation? Does she think that she received that ovation because the teachers think that we have invented a system of noblesse oblige, subsidised by the state and sanctified with the language of partnership? When more than 50 per cent. of the applicants accepted at Oxford and Cambridge still come from the 7 per cent. of private schools, might it be that an attack on educational inequality needs another dimension, even if ovations become somewhat more muted?

Ms Morris: I remember well my visits to independent sector conferences for different reasons, and I was heartened by the response I received from the Headmasters Conference in Jersey. My hon. Friend gave his explanation for that good reception, but I am clear that the conference was pleased to have a Government who wanted to work with it in partnership on a common agenda to raise standards. The conference was heartened by the initiatives that we have set in train for the two sectors to work together and it was pleased that we have committed ourselves to a further £1 million over two years to enhance that work.

The best way to end the disadvantage that some children face in our school system is not to attack others but to ensure that we raise standards in all schools. We are doing that through our literacy and numeracy strategies and through continued investment in the maintained sector. I look forward to continuing the good start we have made in maintaining relationships with the independent sector.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): The bottom line of the Government's approach to the private sector in schools is that they have closed the doors of many ancient institutions of learning to the children of those parents who cannot afford to pay the fees. Is not the difference between the two parties that we gave those children a seat at the table, whereas the Minister thinks that they should be content with the crumbs that fall from the table?

Ms Morris: If that had been the case, I would not have received a good reception from the HMC when I visited it in Jersey. Under this Government, no school will get the crumbs from somebody else's table. We care about giving every child a chance and the solution is not to give some a ladder into the independent sector, but to be deadly serious about making every school a good one. It is inexcusable that under the right hon. Gentleman's Government, the message given to children from disadvantaged areas was that they should escape from the maintained sector because the Government did not exercise their responsibility for it properly. That will not happen under this Government. Parents can be assured that their children will receive a good quality education without having to leave the maintained sector.

University Places (Take-Up)

13. Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): If he will make a statement on the take-up of university places in the current academic year. [59115]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. George Mudie): Overall the total number of accepted home applicants has already exceeded the final 1996 figure and is running at just 4,000 below the comparable 1997 figure of nearly 300,000.

Dr. Jones: What does my hon. Friend's analysis of the take-up of university places this year tell him of the prospects for the Government achieving their aim of increasing the proportion of people from lower-income backgrounds obtaining higher educational qualifications?

Mr. Mudie: Without being complacent, we are clear that the increase we projected of 500,000 additional students in further and higher education by 2002 will be achieved. My hon. Friend knows how keen my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is to widen participation and it is clear from an analysis of this year's figures that fears that working-class youngsters would be put off applying to university by the fees have not been realised. The figures have stayed at the same level and we are confident that we will achieve a wider participation.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): Does the Minister agree that it is alarming that the number of applications from mature students has slumped for next year? Many such students want the second chance offered by a return to learning, and many have family responsibilities. Will he commit the Government to monitoring the impact of charges imposed to see whether they are having a particular effect either by sector or by type of student? That would allow us to see whether Dearing was right and the Government wrong, as I strongly suspect is the case.

Mr. Mudie: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has ended on such a sour note. We agree that the figures should be carefully analysed. The number of youngsters applying for next year has gone up, and there are several reasons for the drop in the number of mature students. Mature students had the flexibility to move their applications forward to 1997, which was not available to younger students. Other factors are demography—that cohort was 3 per cent. down—greater participation in higher education by some groups, and a stronger labour market. Those factors may explain the numbers, but I agree that analysis is necessary, and I share the hon. Gentleman's ambition to increase the number of mature students.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I have your guidance on the extraordinary answer that I received earlier from the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke)? I asked about the Government's U-turn in abandoning plans to publish a merit table for all schools covering 14 to 16-year-olds, and the Minister said that there would be a statement on the matter later today. Will you remind Ministers, Madam Speaker, of the importance of ensuring that statements of such consequence are made first to the House?

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. We will publish full performance tables in a day or two. There will be no statement to the House today, but I shall issue a press release about a minor change to performance tables. That does not affect our commitment to value-added tables, or to ensuring that information is available on GCSEs and the points system.

Madam Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I hope that you may clear up some confusion that has arisen. I refer to the House of Lords of yesterday, when a Minister, Lord Williams of Mostyn, said:

"This is the end of our road. Prorogation is upon us. If the Government are again defeated tonight, the Bill will fall. The Government will therefore have failed to secure safe passage for a manifesto commitment."

Just a few minutes later, another Minister, Baroness Jay, said:

"My Lords, this Bill has now been lost for the Session. However, it will be introduced in the next Session under the procedures of the Parliament Acts."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 18 November 1998; Vol. 594, c. 1354-60.]

I ask, therefore, whether you, Madam Speaker, will delay Prorogation in order to allow a Minister to come to the House—helpfully, the Leader of the House is already here—to explain what is going on. Contradictory statements have been made by Ministers in the other place.

Madam Speaker: As the right hon. Gentleman and the whole House know, I am not responsible for Government statements. Nor am I prepared to suspend Prorogation. I shall, however, suspend the House until 3.50 pm.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners:

The House went;—and, having returned:

Royal Assent

4.19 pm

Madam Speaker: I have to acquaint the House that the House has been to the House of Peers, where a Commission under the Great Seal was read, authorising the Royal Assent to the following Acts:

Statute Law Repeals Act 1998

Waste Minimisation Act 1998

Regional Development Agencies Act 1998

Scotland Act 1998

Northern Ireland Act 1998

Registration of Political Parties Act 1998

Prorogation

Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech

Madam Speaker: I have further to acquaint the House that the Lord High Chancellor, one of the Lord Commissioners, delivered Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech to both Houses of Parliament, in pursuance of Her Majesty's Command. For greater accuracy, I have obtained a copy and also directed that the terms of the speech be printed in the Journal of the House. Copies are being made available in the Vote Office.

The Gracious Speech was as follows:

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

The Duke of Edinburgh and I were pleased to receive the State Visits of his Excellency the President of Brazil in December 1997 and of Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress of Japan in May this year. We remember with great pleasure our visit to Canada in June and our State Visits to Pakistan and India in October 1997 and to Brunei and Malaysia in September of this year. Likewise I remember my visit to France and Belgium on 11 November.

My Government promised to govern for the benefit of the whole nation.

In Northern Ireland, my Government have continued to work towards peace, stability and reconciliation. Their efforts to promote a comprehensive political settlement contributed to the Agreement reached in the multi-party talks. They have moved speedily to implement that Agreement, which was overwhelmingly endorsed by the people of Northern Ireland in a referendum. They have continued to foster the improvement of economic and social conditions through inward investment and other means. New measures for tackling terrorism have been introduced following the Omagh bombing.

The education of young people has been my Government's top priority. Legislation has been enacted to help raise standards in schools and phase out the assisted places scheme. The money saved has been used to cut class sizes. An Act has also been passed to reform teacher training, create a General Teaching Council and introduce new student support arrangements. Green Papers have been published setting out plans to help those with special educational needs and promote lifelong learning.

The process of modernising the National Health Service has begun. The largest ever capital programme is under way following the passage of the NHS (Private Finance) Act. My Government have appointed the first ever Minister for Public Health and outlined their strategy for reducing inequalities in health. Steps have also been taken to ensure that Health and Local Authorities work together effectively, particularly to improve the services for children in care.

My Government have pursued economic policies aimed at delivering stable levels of economic growth, employment and opportunities for all.

To that end, measures have been taken to put the economy firmly on course for steady growth with low inflation. Legislation has been enacted to give the Bank of England operational responsibility for setting interest rates, in order to deliver price stability and support the Government's overall economic policy within a framework of enhanced accountability.

Tough fiscal rules have been introduced and firm action taken to meet them, by reducing public borrowing. The new fiscal policy framework including a Code for Fiscal Stability, underpinned by legislation, will ensure that decisions on the public finances promote Britain's long-term economic goals.

My Government promised to attack youth and long term unemployment. They have already begun to expand employment opportunities and to make work pay. Reform of the tax and benefit systems to ensure that people are better off in work has begun, and the New Deal programmes are already extending new work opportunities to people who had been excluded from the labour market.

An Act has been passed which begins the process of modernising the Social Security system, particularly in the areas of decision making appeals and National Insurance contributions. And proposals for further welfare reform have been presented to Parliament to promote work for those who are able to work and security for those who cannot.

My Government have worked with business to promote sustainable growth. A wide range of measures have been introduced to encourage investment in industry, skills and new technologies and to increase productivity. To encourage entrepreneurship and to help create successful and profitable businesses, an Act to reform the framework for competition for business and industry has been enacted, and the structure of corporation taxes has been reformed.

My Government are committed to fairness at work. Legislation has been passed which will lead to the introduction of a National Minimum Wage.

My Government have completed a comprehensive review of public expenditure, reallocating spending to match priorities and eliminate waste and inefficiency. Within firm three year limits, additional resources have been provided for education, health and transport; and the new Investing in Britain Fund will double net public investment over the Parliament, providing for the renewal, reform and modernisation of Britain's infrastructure.

A White Paper has been published setting out plans for an integrated transport policy in England and Wales, aimed at providing better transport services, and reducing congestion and pollution from transport.

Legislation was enacted to strengthen the local authority capital finance system.

Measures have been put forward to combat crime. Legislation has been passed to provide for radical reform of the youth justice system, local partnerships to cut crime and disorder and measures to reduce offending. Legislation had also been enacted to prohibit the private possession of all handguns.

To ensure that as many people as possible have access to the benefits of the National Lottery, an Act has been passed to extend the scope of Lottery distribution to encompass health, education and the environment. It also included measures to improve regulation.

Decentralisation is essential to my Government's vision of a modern nation. An Act has been passed to enable people in Scotland and Wales to vote on proposals for a devolved Scottish Parliament and the establishment of the National Assembly for Wales. These have been approved in Referendums in Scotland and Wales and Acts have been passed to implement them. My Government have also taken a first step towards decentralising decision-taking to the English regions.

A White Paper has been published setting out a 10 year programme for the reform and renewal of local governance in England and an Act has been passed which enabled the people of London to vote in a referendum on my Government's proposals for an elected Mayor and Assembly for London. These proposals were approved in a referendum on 7 May, and a Bill is to be introduced to implement them.

An Act has been passed to establish Regional Development Agencies in England to bring a regional focus to the economic development and regeneration of the English Regions.

My Government are committed to open and transparent Government. Legislation has been passed to strengthen the data protection controls over the use of personal information about individuals and an Act has been passed to give full effect in the United Kingdom law to the rights and freedoms guaranteed under the European Convention on Human Rights.

Members of the House of Commons

I thank you for the provision you have made for the work and dignity of the Crown and for the public service.

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

My Government have taken a leading role in the European Union. They negotiated and signed the Treaty of Amsterdam which included provisions enabling the UK to opt into the social chapter. The United Kingdom has now ratified the Treaty. They took part in initial negotiations on the European Commission's Agenda 2000 proposals which included reform of the Common Agricultural Policy.

During the United Kingdom's Presidency of the European Union, efforts were made to promote employment and to improve competitiveness. Negotiations on enlargement were opened and good progress was made on key Presidency priorities for co-operation in the European Union, including the fight against drugs and crime, an effective external policy, economic reform and an agreement to a code of conduct on arms export. My Government oversaw the historic decision confirming that eleven Member States met the conditions for joining the single currency, as well as the establishment of the European Central Bank.

My Government have allocated additional resources to tackle global poverty and to promote sustainable development They are implementing the policies set out in the White Paper on International Development.

In May this year, the G8 Summit in Birmingham agreed measures to promote employability at home and the development of poorer countries abroad, help the environment and tackle international crime. They also successfully hosted an Asia-Europe meeting in April 1998 and the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Edinburgh in October 1997.

Vigorous action has been taken to protect the environment, and against terrorism, drugs, money laundering and organised crime. My Government played a leading part in securing agreement at the Kyoto Conference on Climate Change to commitments to binding reduction targets for greenhouse gas emissions.

The United Kingdom played a full part in the negotiations which led to the agreement in July to establish the International Criminal Court.

My Government put human rights at the centre of foreign policy and published the first Annual Report on Human Rights. They ratified the two Additional Protocols to the Geneva convention on the Protections of Victims of War, adopted an abolitionist stance on the death penalty, and took steps to prevent the export of torture equipment. They hosted a conference on Nazi Gold, and helped set up a relief fund for victims of Nazi persecution.

As evidence of their commitment to international peace and security, my Government passed legislation enabling the United Kingdom to ratify the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty and the Ottawa Convention banning anti-personnel landmines. They will continue to urge all those who have not done so to adhere to these treaties.

Progress has also been made to reform and strengthen the United Nations.

My Government have worked to modernise our defence capability so that it matches the changing strategic setting. The Strategic Defence Review—the most far reaching reform of our armed forces since the war—reassessed our security interests and defence needs and provided the Armed Forces and all those who work in defence with a clear long-term vision. Arrangements for strong and modern defence based on the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation have been maintained and my Government played a major role in the decisions taken at NATO's Madrid Summit and in the steps taken to strengthen NATO's relationship with Russia, and they have notified the UK acceptance of the accession to the Alliance of the Czech Republic, Hungary and Poland.

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

I pray that the blessing of Almighty God may attend you.

A Commission was also read for proroguing this present Parliament, and the Lord Chancellor said:

"My Lords and Members of the House of Commons: by virtue of Her Majesty's Commission which has now been read, we do, in Her Majesty's name, and in obedience to Her Majesty's Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Tuesday the twenty-fourth day of this instant November, to be then here holden, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Tuesday the twenty-fourth day of this instant November."

End of the First Session (opened on 7 May 1997) of the Fifty-Second Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, in the Forty-Seventh Year of the Reign of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 9 November 1998

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Service Provision

Mr. Dennis Turner: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, what steps the Commission is taking to improve the machinery for the provision of services to hon. Members and the House. [58776]

Mr. Kirkwood: The House of Commons Commission has decided to set up a review of the present system of management of the House and its facilities.

It has appointed Mr. Michael Braithwaite, a management consultant, who will be supported by a team of officials to review

"the system of management and decision-making responsibilities for services to the House which was set up following the inquiry in 1990 by Sir Robin Ibbs".

Members and staff will be consulted in the course of the review.

The Commission will, in due course, put the findings of the review before the House.

House Stationery

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if she will make a statement on the decision not to offer hon. Members the option of using bespoke House stationery printed on recycled paper. [58849]

Mrs. Roe: The Committee's decision to introduce a standard House of Commons paper was made against the following background; (a) the maintenance of quality and standards; (b) the provision of extra security by the insertion of a unique Portcullis watermark licensed to the House of Commons; (c) a reduction in cost and range of bespoke products; and (d) environmental concerns.

The hon. Lady will wish to note that the new paper is recycled from pre-consumer waste, typically using off cuts and reel ends from a previous manufacturing process.

New Parliamentary Building

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee if he will report progress on the New Parliamentary Building. [58682]

Sir Sydney Chapman: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer of 10 December 1997, Official Report, column 578, in which I reported that it is planned that the House will be able to occupy the building from the beginning of 2001. That remains so and the estimated cost is also unchanged.

The contractor who is erecting the frame of the building has experienced delays, including the supply of concrete below the specified strength, which subsequently had to be cut out and replaced. As a consequence, some contingent time has been absorbed, but an analysis of the programme has identified ways of saving time if this should become necessary to secure the planned occupation date.

Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards

Mrs. Roe: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, what progress has been made by the House of Commons Commission in selecting a candidate for the post of Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards. [59404]

Mr. Kirkwood: A report recommending to the House Elizabeth Filkin, at present Adjudicator for the Inland Revenue and for Customs and Excise and the DSS Contributions Agency, is being published at 3.30 pm today as HC 1143. Copies are available from the Vote Office.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Afghanistan

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what representations she has made to the European Commission about assistance to Afghanistan; and if she will make a statement. [58344]

Clare Short: We have had frequent discussions in recent months with the European Commission about assistance to Afghanistan. We and they are extremely concerned about the security of expatriate personnel in Afghanistan, and about the constraints which the actions of the Taliban and other factions have imposed on assistance activities. Our common objective is to secure an improvement in conditions in Afghanistan which will allow for the principled and effective delivery of much needed humanitarian assistance.

CABINET OFFICE

Civil Servants (Holidays)

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office (1) how much holiday entitlement civil servants have been allowed to carry forward to their next holiday year; [59026]

(2) on what date a civil servant's year starts for holiday purposes; and what the normal holiday entitlement is for new starters; [59025]

(3) what changes have been made to holiday entitlement rules for civil servants because of the Working Time Regulations 1998. [59027]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Responsibility for determining holiday entitlement for staff was delegated to departments and agencies on 1 April 1996, except for the amount of annual leave in the Senior Civil Service. In general, holiday entitlement within the Civil Service meets or exceeds the limits set by the Working Time Regulations; it is expected that most civil servants will be unaffected by the Regulations. Responsibility for decisions on whether any changes are required to comply with the Regulations lies with departments and agencies.

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list those compliance cost assessments published during the latest six month period. [59094]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: The Government are committed to ensuring that regulations are necessary, give effective protection, balance cost and risk, are fair and command public confidence. In accordance with this, we require Departments to produce and publish CCAs for all regulatory proposals likely to have an impact on business.

I have presented to Parliament today a Command Paper listing 119 CCAs and regulatory appraisals incorporating CCAs published between 1 January 1998 and 30 June 1998. Also listed are 2 Regulatory Impact Assessments prepared in anticipation of the new guidance published on 10 August 1998. Copies of those listed have been placed in the libraries of the House. This is the ninth such Command Paper.

Civil Servants (Pensions)

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many people have been affected by the exclusion of Crown Service prior to 1975 in the calculation of their Civil Service pension; and what plans he has to introduce retrospective legislation. [58106]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Information on the numbers so affected, particularly given the lapse in time, is not available.

The Armed Forces pension scheme introduced arrangements, operative from 1 April 1975, which enable a transfer value representing accrued pension rights to be paid to another pension scheme. As with most improvements in pension arrangements, the change was not applied retrospectively. The Government have no plans for backdated changes to the Armed Forces (or other Crown service) pension arrangements.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Child Prostitution

Helen Jones: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to ensure that judicial and magistrates' training programmes include training in awareness of the pressures on young people not to give evidence in cases involving child prostitution. [58328]

Mr. Hoon: Judicial training is the responsibility of the Judicial Studies Board (JSB) which is an advisory non-departmental public body. The JSB also sets the syllabuses for, and monitors and evaluates the training of, lay magistrates.

No training is currently given specifically on awareness of the pressures on young people not to give evidence in cases involving child prostitution. The JSB, however, runs regular induction and continuation courses for both full-and part-time judges in the Crown Court as well as seminars on serious sexual offences. These courses include training on children as witnesses. All lay magistrates receive training on disadvantaged witnesses, including children, and those who sit in the Youth Court receive additional training in evaluating young people as witnesses.

Since January 1998 the JSB's Equal Treatment Advisory Committee has had the responsibility of advising the Board on all aspects of equal treatment training, including training on the needs of children. The Committee keeps the content of all JSB courses under review and is currently revising the guidance provided to all judges on equal treatment issues.

Internet Publishing

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make it his policy to require all task forces and equivalent bodies sponsored by his Department to publish their working papers and minutes on the Internet. [58774]

Mr. Hoon: Information will be published on the Internet wherever practical and appropriate. Many documents published by the Department already appear on the LCD website at www.open.gov.uk/lcd.

Libra

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department when he expects the Libra service to be fully operational in magistrates' courts (a) in Gloucestershire and (b) nationally. [57889]

Mr. Hoon: Subject to award of contract, I anticipate the Libra service will be implemented at the first Magistrates' Courts Committee towards the end of 2001. It will be for Gloucestershire Magistrates' Courts Committee, in consultation with the Department, to agree with the Libra supplier when the service should be implemented in Gloucestershire.

Defamation Act 1996

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his answer of 1 June 1998, Official Report, column 71, if he will list the dates when those parts of the Defamation Act 1996 not yet in force are to come into force; and when the attendant rules of court will become effective. [58153]

Mr. Hoon: I am not yet able to provide a list of dates but the remaining provisions will be brought into force as soon as reasonably practicable.

Civil Enforcement Agents

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the cost to his Department of the review of the organisation and management of civil enforcement agents from its inception until the publication of his Department's considered response; and what plans he has (a) to conduct further reviews and (b) to introduce revised policies with regard to civil enforcement agents. [58154]

Mr. Hoon: The Review was established in February 1992 and was concluded in April 1996. The work was undertaken by salaried officials and the cost was met from the Department's general running costs.

(a) On 25 March 1998, Official Report, columns 141–42, I announced the terms of reference and timetable for the Review of the Enforcement of Civil Court Judgments. This will include a review of the law governing the activities of bailiffs; and its second phase, commencing in July 2000, will include consideration of the type of agent or form of agency which should be responsible for carrying out enforcement.

(b) Changes to the Distress for Rent Rules 1988 governing the bailiff certification procedure are due to come into force next Spring.

The transfer of responsibilities for the enforcement of warrants from the police to the Magistrates' Courts Committees will take place when a suitable legislative opportunity arises. The Committees will be empowered to authorise companies and firms which will in turn issue employees with written authority to execute warrants.

Gloucestershire Magistrates Court

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what is his estimate of (a) the percentage of serious criminal cases being dealt with in Gloucestershire magistrates' courts within the 56 day performance indicator for each of the past five years and (b) the average delay in respect of collection of fines imposed by Gloucestershire magistrates' courts for each of the past five years. [57890]

Mr. Hoon: The information available is shown in the table.

	1993	1994	1995	1996	1997
Percentage of serious criminal cases dealt with within 56 days in Gloucestershire[1]	60	56	60	61	64
Average delay in respect of collection of fines imposed by magistrates in Gloucestershire[2] (days)	275	264	242	272	297

[1] The figures given in the table are the percentage of defendants in Indictable/Triable Either Way cases. The interval quoted is First Listing to Completion.

[2] Average Debtor Days is the average time taken to enforce the collection of money owed to the court, including fines, fees, compensation awards and contributions to legal aid, not taking into account the delay between imposition and start of enforcement actions, known as 'time to pay'. The 1993–96 indicator values are artificially low because a proportion of the fines etc. which were imposed by magistrates would have been transferred out to other courts to collect, but were still included in the figures locally. The 1997 indicator shows a more accurate figure.

Conveyancing

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department when he plans to bring forward measures to reform the law affecting house purchase. [57751]

Mr. Hoon: My Department, together with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and Department of Trade and Industry, will be issuing a consultation paper shortly that will canvass a range of proposals for changes to the conveyancing process. It would be inappropriate to make a statement about reforms until the Government have had an opportunity to consider the results of that conclusion.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

China

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the President of the Council what representations the Government have made to the People's Republic of China regarding that country's maternal and infant health care law in respect of compulsory premarital check-ups. [57882]

Clare Short: I have been asked to reply.

None. The health and development agencies of the United Nations—the World Health Organisation, the United Nations Population Fund and the United Nations Children's Fund—are working in China to secure respect for international standards of maternal and child health. The UK contributes to these programmes.

Civil Servants (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Council (1) if she will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in her private office, as at 1 October 1997; [56789]

(2) if she will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in her Department, by grade, as at 1 October 1997. [56787]

Mrs. Beckett: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to him by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 5 November 1998, Official Report, columns 666–70.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Incinerator Emissions

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish a breakdown of the content of unauthorised emissions from United Kingdom incinerators since January 1996. [56746]

Mr. Meale: The table sets out the content of unauthorised releases into the environment since 1 January 1996 from the incinerators in England and Wales regulated by the Environment Agency under the Integrated Pollution Control regime.

Parameter	Number of unauthorised releases
Hydrogen Chloride	370
Particulate Matter	47
Oxides of Nitrogen	33
Carbon Monoxide	27
Sulphur Dioxide	9
Metals	7
Hydrogen Fluoride	4
Iodine	2

Estimates of the mass release, causes and likely environmental impact of each unauthorised release have been reported to the Environment Agency under the terms of the operator's authorisations. Copies of the notifications will have been placed on the relevant Agency and local authority public registers, unless they are subject to commercial confidentiality arrangements provided for by the legislation.

No central record is kept of unauthorised releases from the smaller incinerators regulated by local authorities in England and Wales under the Local Air Pollution Control regime. However, details of any such releases will have been entered on the relevant local authority public register.

For details of unauthorised releases from incinerators in Scotland and Northern Ireland, I refer the hon. Gentlemen to my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland respectively.

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish a breakdown of emissions from (a) the Edmonton and (b) the Lewisham incinerators since January 1996. [56748]

Mr. Meale: Data on emissions from the Edmonton (London Waste Ltd.) and Lewisham (SELCHP) incinerators have already been published and are regularly updated. The data are available on public registers; either the Environment Agency's public register, Kings Meadow House, Kings Meadow Road, Reading or the local authority registers at Enfield and Lewisham Borough Council respectively.

Information is also held centrally by the Agency on its Chemical Releases Inventory and the following table gives details of annual emissions from these two sites for 1996 and 1997. Details of the monitoring results on which these annual returns are based can be found on the public registers.

Mr. Meale: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office, on 5 November 1998, Official Report, columns 666–70.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on the safety of the packaging and containerisation of raw intermediate level waste for storage since March 1997. [57098]

Mr. Meale: None. The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) regulates the safety of Intermediate Level Waste (ILW) storage on sites licensed under the Nuclear Installations Act 1965 (as amended). HSE policy is that raw ILW should be conditioned into a passively safe form as soon as it is reasonably practicable to do so. The HSE required that the research necessary to support the safety of the licensees' operations, which includes the storage of raw, packaged and containerised intermediate level wastes, is carried out by or on behalf of its licensees. The HSE has not commissioned or evaluated any research into the packaging and containerisation of raw ILW for storage since March 1997.

Mr. Caborn: Paul Hackett is a Fellow of Cranfield University School of Management and Director of the Cranfield Partnership Research Institute. These posts are a matter for the Cranfield University School of Management.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the carbon modelling consortium research showing potential absorption of carbon dioxide by carbon sink young trees; and if he will make a statement. [57878]

Mr. Meale: A preliminary assessment by the Hadley Centre of recently published research by the carbon modelling consortium suggests that the uptake of carbon by forests in North America may have been overestimated in this study. The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change is currently producing a special report on land use change and forestry issues to be published in 2000, and a full review of all relevant research on the global uptake of carbon by vegetation will be published by the Panel in its Third Assessment Report in early 2001.

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his policy on the inclusion of absorption of carbon dioxide by carbon sink young trees in the Kyoto emission reduction negotiations between the European Union and the United States of America. [57879]

Mr. Meale: The Kyoto Protocol allows the uptake in the commitment period, 2008 to 2012, of carbon by trees planted since 1990 to be taken into account in meeting commitments to limit and reduce greenhouse gas emissions. The text of the Protocol makes it clear that the natural regrowth of trees cannot be counted against commitments. Our policy is to ensure that the detailed rules on implementation of the Protocol reflect the fundamental principles agreed in Kyoto.

Countryside Access

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he intends to publish his Department's analysis of the responses to the consultation paper, Access to the Open Countryside in England and Wales. [57858]

Mr. Meacher: The Government expect to publish their analysis of responses to the consultation paper shortly.

A14

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what have been the recorded levels of traffic on the A14 (A1-M1 link road) from the opening of the road to date. [58082]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Recorded average annual daily (24 hour) traffic flows on the A14 (M1-A1 Link Road) from the opening of the last section on 15 July 1994 (between M1/M6 and A6) to date indicate the following:

	1995	1996	1997
M1/M6 to A6 at Rothwell	31,000	[1]—	36,000
Kettering Southern Bypass	45,000	[1]—	52,000
Thrapston to A1	29,300	29,900	33,000

[1] Traffic counters were not available during part of the year—hence no accurate figures are available

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what were the projected traffic flows on the A14 (A1-M1 link road) at the time of the construction of the road. [58083]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Projected average annual daily (24 hour) traffic flows on the A14 (M1-A1) Link Road, forecast during the planning stages of the road, were:

	On opening	By 2007
M1/M6 to A6 Rothwell	24,000	33,000
Kettering Southern Bypass	27,000	44,000
Thrapston to A1	21,000	35,000

Rothwell/Desborough Bypass

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to announce the start date for the construction of the Rothwell/Desborough bypass. [58085]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We are currently considering the construction programme for the schemes included in our Targeted Programme of Improvements listed in A New Deal for Trunk Roads in England.

A43, Geddington

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to de-trunk the A43 through Geddington, Northamptonshire. [58080]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The proposal to de-trunk the A43 through Geddington is subject to consultation with the local highway authority (Northamptonshire County Council). No timetable has been set for the process but we hope to begin negotiations shortly.

Cyclists

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps will be taken to curb the number of accidents arising from cyclists using the pavement. [58197]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Government intend to extend the scope of the Fixed Penalty Notice regime to cover the offence of cycling on the footway. This measure will help streamline enforcement procedures, and act as a deterrent to illegal behaviour by cyclists.

We are encouraging all local highway authorities to improve conditions on the road for cycling. Better provision for cyclists should help reduce the incidence of cycling on the pavement. We are updating our advice to local authorities on the design and layout of facilities, such as cycle tracks, shared by cyclists and pedestrians.

Jubilee Line

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what guarantees Bechtel has provided in respect of the completion of the Jubilee Line extension on time; and what are the penalty provisions. [58203]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Responsibility for completing the Jubilee Line Extension on time remains with London Transport, as has been the case since the start of the project. The contract with Bechtel contains incentives for earlier completion of the Extension and penalty provisions for lateness. Details of these arrangements are commercially confidential.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what tender process was carried out to appoint a project manager following the conclusion of the feasibility study into the Jubilee Line extension that the original management team would not be able to complete the project on time. [58201]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Bechtel's study recommended that a fresh approach be taken for the commissioning stage of the project, to enhance confidence that the line would open in good time for the Millennium Exhibition. Following consideration of the study's findings, London Transport appointed the company to provide resources to strengthen and refocus the project management team accordingly. This was done with regard to European Union procurement rules allowing derogation, where urgency in the procurement process can be demonstrated.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much was paid to Bechtel to carry out their feasibility study into whether the construction of the Jubilee Line extension could be completed to deadline. [58200]

Ms Glenda Jackson: London Transport invited two companies to make proposals for a feasibility study and, having seen the proposals, selected Bechtel. The level of fee is commercially confidential.

Air Traffic Control, Prestwick

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the contract for the development of the new air traffic control system at Prestwick will be signed before all major software flaws are rectified in the Swanwick system. [58216]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 3 November 1998]: NATS have assured the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee that no binding agreement with Sky Solutions would be signed until it was sure that the software at NERC could be made to work. Since then, the system has passed its acceptance tests, and preliminary findings by the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) have concluded that there is no substantive reason to doubt that it will work.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the contractual dependencies between the contracts for the Swanwick and Prestwick developments. [58218]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 3 November 1998]: There are no contractual dependencies between the Swanwick and Prestwick contracts.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the contract with Lockheed-Martin for the development of the new air traffic control system at Prestwick will be signed. [58215]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 3 November 1998]: Negotiations between National Air Traffic Services Ltd. (NATS) and Sky Solutions, the preferred bidder for the New Scottish air traffic control centre (NSC) at Prestwick, are nearing completion. NATS will then approach the Government for approval of the contract before it can be signed.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if there is a deadline by which the contract for the development of the new air traffic control system at Prestwick has to have been signed. [58217]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 3 November 1998]: No deadline has been set, but the Government are keen to see the development of the NSC in good time to avoid significant delays to air traffic over Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Swanwick

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact on Swanwick of entering into a public-private partnership agreement for NATS; and if he will put a copy of his Department's assessments in the Library. [58219]

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

Dr. Reid [holding answer 3 November 1998]: The Government are currently consulting on the details of the proposed public/private partnership for NATS. In consequence, no decision has been taken on the timing or details of any sale. NATS intends to bring the Swanwick centre into service at the earliest opportunity consistent with maintaining the safety of the system and meeting the requirements of its customers.

Railway Track (Wales)

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what sections of the railway track between (a) Carmarthen and Aberystwyth, (b) Pencader and Llandysul, (c) Carmarthen and Newcastle Emlyn and (d) Lampeter and Aberavon are no longer in public ownership; and what is the total mileage of those sections. [58436]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The British Rail Board has retained ownership of Pencader, Bryn Teify and Caradog Falls Tunnels since it is statutorily responsible for their maintenance. The collective lengths of these tunnels amount to less than one mile.

The remaining sections of track were sold several years ago, mainly to adjoining land owners including public bodies such as the Forestry Commission and local authorities.

More detailed information is not immediately available but I shall write to the hon. Member expanding on this in the near future.

Leasehold Valuation Tribunals

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to what extent the Leasehold Valuation Tribunals Service is understaffed; and how many staff have (a) left the Leasehold Valuation Tribunals Service, (b) been redeployed and (c) been made redundant in the last year. [58443]

Mr. Raynsford: The provision of Leasehold Valuation Tribunals is one of the functions of Rent Assessment Panels. The workload of a number of Panels has reduced over the last 12 months and adjustments have been made to staffing numbers as a result. The current staffing levels are considered sufficient to carry out the administration of the tribunals but we are keeping the position under review. The administrative staff are civil servants from my Department and, of the 21 staff who have left the Panels over the last 12 months, 7 have transferred to other posts in the Department, 3 have resigned, 10 have taken early retirement and 1 member of staff was dismissed. No staff have been made redundant and 17 new staff have been recruited to the Panel in the same 12 month period.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many appeals have been notified in respect of leasehold valuation tribunal decisions in the past year; what assessment he has made of the quality of the work of the tribunals; and if he will make a statement. [58442]

Mr. Raynsford: In the 12 months ending on 31 October, the Leasehold Valuation Tribunals (LVTs) have been asked for leave to appeal gainst 7 of their decisions in respect of service charge disputes. In total, 58 appeals against LVT decisions have been received by the Lands Tribunal during the same period—this latter figure includes both service charge cases and decisions on other matters for which leave to appeal is not required.

The Leasehold Valuation Tribunals have provided an effective means of resolving a variety of disputes relating to leasehold property without the risks of high and uncertain costs associated with court proceedings. They have recently been given a new role in hearing service charge disputes and applications for the appointment of a manager under which they have, as yet, decided only a few cases. We are commissioning research to examine the effectiveness of the new regime, both directly and indirectly, in dealing with service charge disputes and we will continue to monitor their operation closely.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the budget for the leasehold valuation tribunals in each financial year since 1995; and what it will be for the year 1999–2000. [58444]

Mr. Raynsford: The cost of leasehold valuation tribunals is not separately identifiable within the overall cost of Rent Assessment Panels. The cost of the Panels in 1997–98 was £5.5 million. The resources allocated to the Panels in 1998–99 and 1999–2000 have been increased to £11.1 million in both years in anticipation of an increase in the volume of applications to leasehold valuation tribunals arising from the provisions in the Housing Act 1996.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the average length of time before the cases of applicants to the Leasehold Valuation Tribunals were heard (a) in the present financial year to date, (b) in 1997–98 and (c) in 1996–97. [58437]

Mr. Raynsford: The average length of time before the cases of applicants to the Leasehold Valuation Tribunals were heard was as follows:

New jurisdiction cases (Service charges/Appointment of a manager/Insurance)

Panel	1996–97 [1]	1997–98 [1]	1998–99 (to date)
Wales	n/a	No cases received	No cases received
North Western	n/a	No cases heard	11 months
Chilterns, Thames and Eastern	n/a	No cases heard	No cases
London	n/a	No cases heard	8 months
Merseyside and Cheshire	n/a	No cases heard	No cases received
West Midland	n/a	4 months	6 months
North Eastern	n/a	No cases received	4 months
East Midland	n/a	No cases heard	No cases heard
South Western	n/a	No cases heard	7.5 months
Southern and South Eastern	n/a	No cases heard	9 months

[1] An application to a leasehold valuation tribunal could be made only on or after 1 September 1997.

Old jurisdiction cases—(Enfranchisement/lease extensions)

Panel	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99 (to date)
Wales	7 months	7.5 months	9 months
North Western	None heard	10 months	12 months
Chilterns, Thames and Eastern	8 months	8 months	9 months
London	8 months	8 months	8 months
Merseyside and Cheshire	No cases received	No cases received	No cases received
West Midland	4 months	7 months	6 months
North Eastern	8.5 months	All cases withdrawn or no jurisdiction	No cases heard
East Midland	No cases received	No cases heard	No cases received
South Western	4.5 months	No cases heard	11 months
Southern and South Eastern	4 months	4 months	4.5 months

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will provide a breakdown of the backgrounds of the members of the leasehold valuation tribunals; what expertise is sought for appointments; and what training is given (a) on appointment and (b) subsequently. [58445]

Mr. Raynsford: Leasehold valuation tribunals comprise qualified lawyers and valuers, and lay people, all drawn from the members appointed to the 9 Rent Assessment Panels in England. I have arranged for a copy of the current list of Panel members, which includes details of their backgrounds, to be placed in the Library. My Department is looking to recruit more lay people and to attract members from a broader constituency. The qualities looked for in members include relevant professional expertise, intellectual grasp, sound judgment, analytical skills, ability to work as a team member and, in the case of a chairman of a tribunal, the ability to control proceedings. On appointment, new members are subject to an induction programme, which includes the provision of guidance on the legislation and procedures relevant to tribunal work, attendance at tribunal hearings as an observer, ad hoc meetings on specific subjects and attendance on suitable courses where appropriate. This is supplemented by regular seminars for all members and the supply of guidance notes on legal, technical and procedural issues as they arise.

Leasehold Reform

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the Green Paper on leasehold reform will address the question of social housing leaseholders. [58438]

Mr. Raynsford: Our consultation paper will seek views on a wide range of leasehold issues affecting social housing leaseholders and leaseholders generally.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations his Department has received on leasehold reform; and if he will make a statement. [58545]

Mr. Raynsford: We have received a large number of representations on leasehold reform. We are currently conducting a comprehensive review of the leasehold system and are committed to thoroughgoing reform.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when his Department proposes to publish the Green Paper on Leasehold Reform. [58544]

Mr. Raynsford: We hope to issue our consultation paper on leasehold reform shortly.

Driving Licence Sight Tests

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions under the proposed amendments to the Motor Vehicle (Driving Licences) Regulations 1996, what assumptions underlie the estimate of the savings if the work were undertaken by opticians. [58281]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The savings are based on the difference between the fees payable to doctors and specialists from April 1999 and an estimate on the costs provided by Opticians to undertake similar volumes of tests to an identical standard.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what fee is currently paid to the doctor or eye specialist when the Medical Adviser at the DVLA requests that a driver take a sight test to determine his fitness to drive. [58282]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The statutory eyesight standard for driving is the ability to read a car number plate at 20.5 metres. To establish if a driver's field of vision can meet the standard DVLA will pay a doctor or eye specialist a fee of £12.50 for a report from records or £56.25 if an examination is required.

Construction Industry (Fatal Accidents)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what has been the number of fatal accidents within the construction industry in England and Wales in each of the last three years. [58326]

Mr. Meale: The numbers of fatal accidents reported to the Health and Safety Executive and Local Authorities within the construction industry in England and Wales in each of the last three years are as follows:

Year	Number of fatal accidents
1995–96	68
1996–97	78
1997–98[1]	69

Alcohol (Air Passengers)

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the Government will introduce legislation to ban the consumption of passengers' own alcohol in flight. [58416]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 5 November 1998]: The Government have no plans to introduce such legislation.

The problem of drunken passengers is already dealt with in the Air Navigation (No 2) Order 1995. This makes it an offence to enter an aircraft while drunk, to be drunk on an aircraft and to endanger the safety of an aircraft or any person therein. This legislation applies to UK registered aircraft regardless of where in the world they are and to foreign aircraft in UK airspace or whose next landing is in the UK. In addition, the commander of an UK registered aircraft may require a passenger not to consume alcohol if it appears that he is likely to become drunk. Failure to comply with the lawful commands of the aircraft commander is an offence.

More generally, there are various actions which the airlines themselves can take to deal with the problem of potentially disruptive passengers and my right hon. Friend the Minister of Transport will be discussing these options with the airlines shortly.

Greater London Authority

Mr. John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of respondents to the consultation exercise on the proposed Greater London Authority supported the additional member system of electing the authority. [58482]

Mr. Raynsford: Our proposals to elect the Assembly by AMS were set out in the White Paper "A Mayor and Assembly for London" (Cm 3897). These proposals were endorsed by 72 per cent. of those who voted in the referendum on 7 May 1998.

We received a total of 1,289 responses to the consultation exercise on the Green Paper "New Leadership for London" (Cm 3724). Of these, 103 respondents favoured a system of proportional representation to elect the Assembly, as opposed to 33 who supported first past the post. Nine respondents specifically supported the additional member system (AMS).

Rail Services

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many routes the punctuality of rail services (a) improved and (b) deteriorated in the last period for which records are available. [58672]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The latest figures released by the Franchising Director cover the three rail industry periods from 28 June 1998 to 19 September 1998. Comparing the annual average at the end of the quarter with the average of the beginning of the quarter, 26 route groups have shown an improvement, 32 have deteriorated and six remained static. Comparing average punctuality for the year ending September 1998 with that for the previous year, 19 route groups have improved, 42 have declined and three have remained static.

M20

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many representations he has received about noise from the M20 through Ashford; and if he will make a statement. [58356]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 5 November 1998]: Since the Roads Review was announced in July 1998 we have received 65 representations and one petition containing over 50 signatures about traffic noise from the M20 within the District of Ashford (between Charing and Brabourne Lees).

We recognise that traffic noise is a major source of concern to people. This is why in "A New Deal for Trunk Road in England" we announced that low noise surfaces would be used when roads are built or, where appropriate in those areas where noise is a particular concern, when they undergo major maintenance. I understand the Highways Agency plan to carry out technical surveys between Junctions 9 and 11 on the M20 later this year, which should determine the condition of the road surface and establish whether it should be included in the Agency's programme of future maintenance work.

We also announced our intention, where re-surfacing cannot be justified on normal maintenance grounds, to establish a revised noise criteria and ring-fenced annual budget to enable the Highways Agency, over a reasonable period of time, to deal with some of the most serious and pressing cases.

North West Trains

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has had on the performance of North West Trains towards meeting the standards agreed on its franchise. [58692]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Since the General Election the Franchising Director and I have received 232 representations about the performance and service quality of North West Trains.

Civil Subsonic Jet Aircraft

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his policy towards the proposed EU directive on civil subsonic jet aircraft. [58582]

Ms Glenda Jackson: To gain the benefits of early implementation the measure has been transformed into a Regulation which the UK supported when it was agreed at the Transport Council on 1 October as reported in the Parliamentary Answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Transport on 20 October 1998, Official Report, columns 1099–101. It is essential to maintain progress in reducing aircraft noise at source. This measure will help to ensure that the environmental gains achieved by the phasing out of older, noisy Chapter 2 aircraft by 2002 are not lost.

Genetically Modified Organisms

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the dates on which research has been commissioned by his Department, or its predecessor, into contained genetically modified organisms and their possible impacts on the environment if released; and if he will place a copy of the findings of such research in the Library. [59029]

Mr. Meale: The Department has commissioned research into contained genetically modified organisms and their possible impacts on the environment as follows:

December 1994, The Centre for Applied Microbiology and Research, a study to review current large-scale activities with genetically modified microorganisms in the UK and the potential for any environmental risks arising from incidental discharge in waste streams.

October 1997, the Central Science Laboratory, to study the environmental risk of genetically modified plants in containment.

The reports of these studies will be published in due course and copies will be placed in the library.

Atmospheric Pollution

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many occasions in each month, or other period for which the information is available since 1 May 1997 WHO guidelines for atmospheric pollution levels have been exceeded. [59016]

Mr. Meale: Air pollution data from national monitoring sites, from 1 May 1997, for four pollutants (nitrogen dioxide, carbon monoxide, ozone and sulphur dioxide) for which WHO have set guidelines, is presented in the tables. It should be noted that data are provisional from 1 April 1998.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for each month or other period for which the information is available since 1 May 1997, the total quantity of (a) CO_2, (b) CO, (c) benzene, (d) sulphur, (e) NO_x and (f) particulates emitted by road traffic, broken down by (i) car, (ii) motorcycle, (iii) van and (iv) lorry. [59013]

Mr. Meale: National UK emissions data are published annually in my Department's "Digest of Environmental Statistics", copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House. UK emissions data are also available on the Department's air quality web site at http://www.environment.detr.gov.uk/airq/aqinfo.htm and in the annual research report "UK Emissions of Air Pollutants", produced by the National Environmental Technology Centre. Annual UK emissions data are not yet available for 1997. A table showing the latest available published UK annual road transport emissions for 1996 follows.

Internet Publishing

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make it his policy to require all task forces and equivalent bodies sponsored by his Department to publish their working papers and minutes on the Internet. [58769]

Mr. Meale: Given the wide range of subjects and sensitivities involved, it would not be appropriate to publish on the Internet the working papers and minutes of all task forces and equivalent bodies sponsored by my Department. However, in line with the Department's commitment to Open Government, Task Forces' reports will be made available on the Internet where appropriate, and any requests for additional information will be dealt with individually under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Development Rights

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what is his Department's policy towards permitted development rights on green belt land held by recently privatised companies, with particular reference to Railtrack; [58997]

(2) what is his Department's policy towards development in the green belt under permitted development rights. [59000]

Mr. Raynsford: Permitted development rights may be exercised in accordance with the various conditions and limitations set out in the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995. In exceptional circumstances, where there is a real and specific threat that permitted development is likely to take place which could damage an interest of acknowledged importance those rights can be withdrawn and the relevant development would then require a planning application. This would apply regardless of the type of developer. One reason for withdrawing permitted development rights might be that the purposes of Green Belt designation were threatened.

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what responsibilities for consultations Railtrack inherited from British Rail regarding use of permitted development rights. [58999]

Mr. Raynsford: British Rail had no specific responsibilities for consultations regarding the use of permitted development rights. However, guidance for non-statutory consultation with regard to the exercise of permitted development rights by statutory undertakers is set out in DOE Circular 9/95: General Development Order Consolidation 1995, and in DOE Circular 15/92: Publicity for Planning Applications. They make it clear that both the local planning authorities and the public should be informed of proposals for permitted development which are likely to affect them significantly, before the proposals are finalised.

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received about Railtrack's proposals to build a ballast storage depot at Hinkley Sidings under permitted development rights. [58994]

Mr. Raynsford: As of 5 November, the Government Office for the South East had received 30 representations from local people, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith).

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his Department's policy towards the payment of compensation by a planning authority to private companies when their permitted development rights are blocked by use of an Article 4 direction upheld by his Department. [59001]

Mr. Raynsford: The withdrawal of permitted development rights by a direction under Article 4 of the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995 may give rise to the local planning authority being liable to pay compensation under sections 107 and 108 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. Any person interested in the land, or in any minerals in or under the land, may seek compensation for abortive expenditure, or other loss or damage directly attributable to the withdrawal of the permitted development rights. In order to claim compensation a planning application must have been made and permission refused, or granted subject to conditions other than those previously imposed by the Permitted Development Order.

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what responsibilities for environmental protection and what requirements to have regard for greenbelt policies were inherited by Railtrack from British Rail with regard to permitted development rights. [58998]

Mr. Raynsford: There were no specific responsibilities of this kind. It is the responsibility of the local planning authority to decide whether to withdraw certain permitted development rights where permitted developments are likely to have significant effects on the environment. I would refer the hon. Member to my earlier answers to questions 58997 and 59000.

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to make a decision regarding the Article 4 direction from Oxfordshire County Council regarding the proposal to build a ballast depot at Hinkley Sidings. [58995]

Mr. Raynsford: A decision will be made as quickly as possible.

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when his Department received the Article 4 direction from Oxfordshire County Council relating to Hinkley sidings. [58996]

Mr. Raynsford: The request to confirm the Article 4 Direction was received from Oxfordshire County Council on 2 November.

Freight

Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to encourage the development of new rail routes for freight transport. [59223]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The freight grants scheme is designed to assist companies in moving goods from road to rail where payment is justified by the environmental benefits. We overhauled the grants scheme on coming to office; we doubled the grant spend in our first year to £30 million; we have increased the budget to £40 million for the current year, of which £32 million is already committed; and we will make still further money available over the next three years, if there is demand.

Road Schemes

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what weighting is given to the individual criteria and sub-criteria in the appraisal summary tables for road schemes published following the roads review. [58700]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Explicit weightings were not given to the criteria and sub-criteria in the Roads Review.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for each local authority in England the bids made in their TPP submission for expenditure in 1992–2000 for (a) major highway schemes (eligible for TSG), (b) major highway schemes (not eligible for TSG), (c) structural maintenance on carriageways, (d) strengthening and structural maintenance on bridges, (e) assessment programme on bridges, (f) major public transport packages, (g) minor works: packages, (h) minor works: non-packages and (i) minor works: local safety schemes. [58701]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I shall be glad to provide the hon. Member with this information. In view of its extent I will provide it by letter rather than including it in the Official Report. I will write to him shortly. A copy will be placed in the Library of the House.

Airports

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he intends to publish a policy document on airports. [58528]

Ms Glenda Jackson: In its White Paper "A New Deal for Transport", the Government said:

"We will prepare a UK airports policy looking some 30 years ahead. This will develop the application to UK airports of the policies set out in this White Paper—of sustainable development, integration with surface transport and contribution to regional growth. It will provide the framework within which those concerned can plan for the future with greater certainty. We will consult widely in preparing the new policy and will take account of the Inspector's report on the Heathrow Terminal 5 inquiry."

The Government are currently considering the precise scope, and the timing, of the policy statement and will announce their conclusions in due course. They will also consider what steps might be taken to develop thinking and focus the debate on the way forward.

Inland Waterways

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of freight facilities grant was applied to inland waterways in the period since 1 May 1997; and if he will make a statement. [58873]

Ms Glenda Jackson: 23 Freight Facilities Grants totalling some £19 million have been awarded since 1 May 1997. Two of the grants, worth about £240,000, were awarded to inland waterway applicants.

Interest in grant for inland waterway schemes has historically been low. However, recent publicity drives by my Department have resulted in an increased interest in moving freight by inland waterway.

We intend to consult on the details of a scheme to extend, the freight grants regime to coastal and short sea shipping.

Commission for Integrated Transport

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will announce the (a) membership of and (b) terms of reference for the Commission for Integrated Transport. [58697]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The remit for the Commission for Integrated Transport was set out in paragraph 4.4 of the White Paper 'A New Deal for Transport'. We expect to announce the appointments to the Commission early in the new year.

Unpaid Utility Charges (Warrington)

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what estimate he has made of the number of people resident in the Warrington, North constituency who received a court summons for unpaid water charges in each of the past five years; [58314]

(2) how many (a) gas, (b) electricity and (c) water disconnections took place in the Warrington, North constituency in each of the past five years. [58315]

Mr. Meale: Information is not available by constituency and my Department has made no estimated constituency breakdown of the information. Available figures provided by the utility regulators are as follows:

Year	Gas disconnections
1993	16,088
1994	16,393
1995	14,511
1996	8,820

1995–96	43,842	839
1996–97	43,716	410
1997–98	6,482	469

Note:
Figures, from OFWAT, are for North West Water; the figures for summonses are for household customers only.

Repair Work (Northern Line)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects repair work on the Northern Line escalator at Embankment Station to be completed; and if he will make a statement on the cause of delay. [58317]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Embankment Station escalator number 4, an up escalator from the Northern Line dating back to 1985, suffered a major component failure in September 1998. As the escalator type is now obsolete no replacement parts were readily available. At this time however a similar type of escalator was being replaced at Paddington and a decision was taken to attempt to cannibalise this machine and work was carried out between September to mid-October. Upon completion of work London Underground Limited's (LUL) Chief Engineer (Lifts and Escalators) examined the escalator. Unfortunately because the parts from the Paddington escalator were worn and could not comply with LUL's very strict standard, the machine could not return to service.

Since failing in September (and obviously during repair work) the escalator had been covered by hoarding. In a bid to assist passenger flow through the station the hoarding has been removed and the escalator is currently in use as a fixed stairway.

Work is well underway to replace the failed escalator. A contract, worth approximately £1 million has been placed with the lift and escalator manufacturer Otis, which will commence work on installing a brand new escalator in January 1999. (The lead-in time for major components is between 12 and 16 weeks). It is expected that the new escalator will be fully operational by the end of July 1999.

Interconnector

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what consultations his Department had with the Directorate of Safety, Environment and Fire Policy at the Ministry of Defence, prior to giving consent for the laying of the Scotland-Northern Ireland electricity interconnector. [58710]

Ms Glenda Jackson: None. Consent was sought from the Department under Section 34 of the Coast Protection Act 1949. Consent under this Act is required if danger or obstruction to navigation is likely to result. The Department in making a decision under this section may consider only this question. It was concluded that the laying of the interconnector was not likely to cause such danger or obstruction and consent was accordingly given in February 1994.

Minerals Planning Guidance 3

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to publish a revised version of planning document MPG3: Coal Mining and Colliery Spoil Disposal. [58709]

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend the Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning published a draft revised MPG3 (Coal Mining and Colliery Spoil Disposal) for public consultation on 16 October. Comments on the draft guidance, which applies to England only, are requested by 15 January 1999.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland published draft revised planning policy guidance on opencast coal in Scotland on 23 October. Responses to that consultation paper are requested by 11 December 1998.

Millennium Dome

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what contingency plans have been made to get visitors to and from the Dome in the event that the Jubilee Line extension is not completed in time. [57279]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Government welcome London Transport's revised strategy for phased opening of the Jubilee Line Extension project and their confirmation that it will open in good time for the Millennium Experience. It would however be irresponsible not to have in place contingency arrangements to manage problems on any of the main transport links to the Millennium site, including any major failure of the Jubilee Line. London Underground Limited are developing contingency arrangements for this, and other eventualities, in association with London Transport Buses, London River Services, the Government Office for London, the Highways Agency, the Association of Train Operating Companies, Connex South East, Docklands Light Railways and the New Millennium Experience Company.

Road Deaths

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many road deaths and serious road accidents there were in each month or other period for which the information is available since 1 May 1997. [59015]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Information for 1998 is not yet available by month. Information for 1997 is as shown. Other casualties involved in these accidents who sustained slight injuries are not shown.

Car Sales

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many cars were sold in each month, or other period for which the information is available, since 1 May 1997. [59014]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The requested information, taken from DVLA records of new car registrations, is as shown.

Car Journeys

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many car journeys were completed in each month or other period for which the information is available since 1 May 1997. [59017]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This information is not available on a monthly basis. Information on journeys is provided by the National Travel Survey. Over the period 1995 to 1997, the estimated average number of car driver journeys was 401 per person per year in Great Britain.

White Paper Documents

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) when he expects each of the subsidiary documents referred to in the White Paper, A New Deal For Transport, to be published; [58527]

(2) when the publications listed in annex A of A New Deal for Transport will be published. [58698]

Mr. Prescott: The Government will launch their consultation on road user charging and the workplace parking levy shortly. In the following months we intend to issue further daughter documents on sustainable distribution, local transport plans, shipping, buses, road safety and inland waterways. We will also be issuing a paper on ports policy. In many of the documents we will be consulting on detailed aspects of policy, and we therefore intend to issue the documents in an orderly way so as not to overburden consultees and so as to encourage full and considered responses.

Of the other relevant documents listed in Annex A, the response to the Royal Commission and the consultation paper on climate change have already been published. An action plan to encourage walking will be published shortly. The remaining documents—a report on the review of national air quality strategy, a revised strategy for sustainable development, consultation on draft or updated planning guidance, and progress reports from the Cleaner Vehicles Task Force—will follow over the next few months.

Regional Planning Guidance (Transport)

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what is the (a) timetable and (b) budget for the transport problems to be considered by regional planning conferences through regional planning guidance systems detailed in Annex C of A New Deal for Trunk Roads in England; [58694]

(2) what is the (a) timetable and (b) budget for the study programme detailed in annex D of A New Deal for Trunk Roads in England; [58695]

(3) what is the procedure for the implementation of recommendations made by the (a) regional planning conferences and (b) study programme listed in annexes C and D of A New Deal for Trunk Roads in England. [58696]

Ms Glenda Jackson: A New Deal for Transport and A New Deal for Trunk Roads in England describe the enhanced role that Regional Planning Guidance (RPG) will play in integrating transport planning with other types of land-use planning and identifying regional priorities for transport investment and management. Draft RPG will be prepared by regional planning conferences (RPCs), in consultation with the Government Offices and other regional stakeholders, and submitted to the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State will consider whether the draft should be modified in the light of an independent Panel report and issue the final version of RPG. The Secretary of State will be committed to taking forward those transport proposals in RPG for which central government are responsible. The precise timing will depend on the circumstances of the particular public expenditure round. Other transport proposals will be delivered by local authorities through their local transport plans and by Railtrack and other transport infrastructure and service providers. Further guidance on the regional transport strategy element of RPG will be set out in a draft Planning Policy Guidance Note 11.

It is for RPCs, in consultation with other stakeholders and Government offices, to decide the timetable for updating RPG. All regions, except London and the West Midlands, are currently reviewing RPG. Following the Comprehensive Spending Review, my Department will be providing significant additional funding to support the research efforts of the Government offices and the RPCs in developing RPG and we will also be meeting the administrative costs of the RPG public examinations.

The programme of studies proposed in Annex D of A New Deal for Trunk Roads in England will assist RPCs in addressing the most serious and urgent regional transport problems in either the current round or future updates of RPG. The studies will be led by Government offices in partnership with RPCs and funded by the Department at a cost of some £30 million over the next three years. We will shortly be consulting RPCs about our proposals. The first studies will begin in 1999–2000.

Traffic Forecasts

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the impact of the transport policy measures announced as part of A New Deal for Transport, on (a) forecasts of future traffic made in the 1997 National Road Traffic Forecasts and (b) future levels of congestion on the motorway and trunk road network as shown in the Highways Agency's stress maps. [58699]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Revising and updating the 1997 National Road Traffic Forecasts to reflect the impact of the New Deal for Transport will involve new approaches to forecasting traffic and its environmental and economic effects. The Department is currently developing plans to take this work forward, on which we will be seeking advice from the Commission for Integrated Transport, after it is established next year. Our revised forecasts will also need to take account of the non-statutory 'interim' road traffic reduction reports we expect to receive from local highway authorities in July next year as part of their provisional local transport plans.

The Highways Agency's motorway and trunk road stress maps will be revised in line with the National Road Traffic Forecasts, which play a central role in their production.

French Lorry Drivers' Dispute

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if all outstanding claims arising out of the French lorry drivers' dispute have been settled. [58990]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We understand that at 10 September some 200 claims from UK companies were still under consideration by the French authorities.

PRIME MINISTER

Countryside Responsibilities

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Prime Minister if the Government have completed their review of countryside responsibilities; and if he will make a statement. [57230]

The Prime Minister: The Government completed their Comprehensive Spending Review of countryside and rural policy earlier this year. I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment on 29 July 1998, Official Report, columns 246–47.

The Government's new strategic approach—based upon a belief in the importance of integrating policies for rural areas, and ensuring that the rural dimension is fully reflected in wider policy-making—will enhance opportunity in rural areas, improve access to and enjoyment of the countryside and conserve and manage wildlife resources there. At Departmental level, work is in hand to improve co-ordination and financial planning of DETR and MAFF development programmes for rural areas. We have announced that from 1 April 1999 the work of the Rural Development Commission and the Countryside Commission will be brought together in a new agency to champion rural England. Regional Development Agencies will also have a specific remit to serve the rural areas of their regions, and will be responsible for developing an integrated approach to economic development and regeneration throughout their regions.

The Government believe in a living, working and sustainable countryside recognising the important links between rural and urban policy.

Ministerial Hospitality

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) of 9 February 1998, Official Report, column 17, if he will give a definition of the term ministerial hospitality. [58730]

The Prime Minister: Ministerial hospitality covers expenditure on official entertainment hosted by Ministers including events organised by the Government Hospitality Fund. Hospitality is offered, and costed, on the same basis as it was by the last Administration.

Life Peers

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister what criteria he employs in selecting candidates to be proposed for appointment as life peers. [58683]

The Prime Minister: That the individual concerned should be able to make a significant contribution to the work of the House of Lords.

Ministerial Appointments

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 9 December 1997, Official Report, columns 502–03, concerning advice from the security forces, if he will set out the circumstances in which it is deemed relevant that advice is made available to him; who is responsible for deeming it relevant; and if he will make a statement. [59004]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Mr. Cohen) on 2 November 1998, Official Report, column 402.

"Supporting Families"

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if he authorised inclusion of the Labour Party Manifesto 1997 in the list of related Government publications in the consultation paper "Supporting Families"; [59003]

(2) if the Government supplied copies of the first document in the reading list at the end of the "Supporting Families" consultation document to the Vote Office for distribution with the other publications listed. [59002]

The Prime Minister: The Labour Party Manifesto should have been included separately in the bibliography rather than under "Related Government Publications". No copies have been supplied to the Vote Office, but Members may obtain copies from Labour Party Headquarters.

Social Exclusion Unit

Ms Stuart: To ask the Prime Minister if he will instruct the Social Exclusion Unit to send copies of consultation letters issued by the client to individual hon. Members. [58804]

The Prime Minister: The Social Exclusion Unit is currently consulting on the subject of Teenage Parenthood. A consultation letter was issued on 7 October, and a copy has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses and on the Unit's website, as will all future consultations.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Civil Servants (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if she will provide a breakdown in numerical and percentage terms of the ethnic origin of civil servants in her private office, as at 1 October 1997; [56763]

(2) if she will provide a breakdown in numerical and percentage terms of the ethnic origin of civil servants in her Department, by grade, as at 1 October 1997. [56761]

Marjorie Mowlam: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 5 November 1998, Official Report, columns 666–70.

Hill Farmers

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the income for hill farmers in Northern Ireland as (a) a total and (b) an average per farmer in 1997–98; and what are the predictions for income in the present financial year. [58013]

Mr. Paul Murphy: A total income figure for hill farmers in Northern Ireland is not available.

Estimates of the average income per farmer in 1997–98 and the prediction for 1998–99 will be published by the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland on 30 November 1998, with accompanying statistical tables placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures the Government are (a) taking, and (b) proposing to take, to support the income levels of hill farmers in Northern Ireland. [58016]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Hill farmers in Northern Ireland continue to receive Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowances (HLCAs). Payments are based on numbers of cattle and sheep held and an annual review is ongoing on a UK basis as part of the process of determining the payment rates for the 1999 scheme.

Under EU Agenda 2000 proposals such support will switch to payment based on areas rather than headage but will continue to be targeted at the LFA. Agenda 2000 negotiations are still at relatively early stages.

Act of Union (Bicentenary)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans the Government have to celebrate the bicentenary of the Act of Union between Ireland and Great Britain. [58071]

Marjorie Mowlam: The Government have no plans to do so. Local communities and non-governmental organisations may wish to organise their own celebrations.

Proscribed Organisations

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many individuals have been (a) charged, (b) summarily convicted and (c) convicted on indictment under section 2 or the equivalent section of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 relating to membership of a proscribed organisation in each year since enactment; what percentage of those convicted in each year received a prison sentence; and what percentage of those were sentenced to a term of less than one year. [56320]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 3 November 1998]: The following table illustrates the information as requested.

Persons:

Year	Proceeded against	Found guilty	Sentenced to imprisonment	Percentage where sentence less than one year
1989	25	23	18	0
1990	33	30	24	0
1991	19	16	10	0
1992	16	15	10	0
1993	28	24	21	0
1994	19	17	17	0

	Persons:
Year	Proceeded against	Found guilty	Sentenced to imprisonment	Percentage where sentence less than one year
1995	28	24	17	0
1996	7	6	6	0
1997	6	3	3	0

Notes:
1. Persons were sentenced for offences including membership of a proscribed organisation—not membership only—and hence the length of sentence in each case was more than one year.
2. The figures may include suspended sentences.
3. Persons have been charged with membership of a proscribed organisation based on evidence to substantiate that charge, e.g. a more serious charge of murder.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Civil Servants (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his private office, as at 1 October 1997; [56813]

(2) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his Department, by grade, as at 1 October 1997. [56811]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 5 November 1998, Official Report, columns 666–70.

Israel

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Israeli Government over the legality of their announcement of the addition of further Jewish housing units to the settlement of Kiryat Arba near Hebron. [58570]

Mr. Fatchett: We have made no formal representation to the Israeli government specifically about the announcement of the addition of further housing units to the settlement of Kiryat Arba near Hebron. But our position on settlements is clear and well known to them. Settlements in the Occupied Territories and East Jerusalem are illegal under international law and an obstacle to peace. We note the clarification given by Prime Minister Netanyahu's Office on 1 November that no new building permits have been issued in Jerusalem. We expect the Israeli government to continue to refrain from granting such permits, and to abide by the new spirit of co-operation forged at Wye.

East Timor

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of recent reports concerning changes in the number of Indonesian troops in East Timor. [58434]

Mr. Fatchett: We are concerned at reports of an increase in the number of Indonesian troops in East Timor. I raised our concerns at troop levels with President Habibie and Foreign Minister Alatas in Jakarta last month. We endorse the UN Secretary-General's recent call for a substantial reduction in the Indonesian military presence in the territory.

Mercenaries

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will sign the United Nations International Convention Against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries. [58423]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We have no plans at present to sign the 1989 UN Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries because of widespread doubt that it is legally enforceable. The Convention has not attracted sufficient support to enter into force.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Government policy relating to the use of mercenaries in armed conflicts. [58431]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We and our EU partners have always made it clear that we unequivocally condemn the recruitment, use and financing of mercenaries in armed conflict. We are concerned about the spread of mercenary activity.

EU Treaties (Translations)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what official translations of (a) the four principal treaties of the European Union and (b) the Regulations and Directives in force, were made available to the Governments of countries who were candidates to join the EU during the United Kingdom's presidency. [58678]

Ms Quin: The four principal treaties and all the Regulations and Directives in force are published in all 11 official languages of the European Union. During the UK Presidency the European Commission started the process of screening the candidates' legislation against the EU's acquis, using the language versions agreed between the Commission and the candidate concerned.

Abductions

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the special unit in his Department which deals with cases of alleged abduction covers British citizens with dual nationality; and how many such cases there are which the unit is currently aware of but which have not been concluded, broken down by country and gender. [59018]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Department's special unit covers British citizens with dual nationality taken hostage as well as those without. The unit is presently handling one such case. The male abductee, kidnapped in August 1998 in the Democratic Republic of Congo, holds both New Zealand and British nationality.

Angola

Mr. Rapson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures Her Majesty's Government have taken to implement United Nations Security Council Resolution 1173 (1998) which imposed further sanctions on UNITA as from 1 July. [52366]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [pursuant to his reply, 23 July 1998, c. 689–91]: Additional information has reached me since my answer of 23 July. The correct answer is as follows.

Resolution 1173 imposed a freeze on the funds and financial resources of UNITA, its officials and their immediate families; a ban on most official contacts in Angola with UNITA; a prohibition on the import of diamonds outside the governmental certificate of origin regime; and prohibitions on the sale or supply of equipment which may be used in mining or transportation, and on transportation services.

We have instructed all our diplomatic missions overseas to avoid any contact with UNITA, whether locally or in Angola. There is one exception: our Embassy in Luanda may continue to have contacts with UNITA officials in areas of Angola to which State Administration has been extended. This is in accordance with UN Security Council Resolution 1173 (1998) which prohibits certain official contacts with UNITA.

The prohibition on the importation of diamonds will be given effect in the United Kingdom by amendment to the Open General Import Licence.

The remainder of the prohibitions are to be implemented in the UK by the Angola (United Nations Sanctions) Order 1998 and in the Overseas Territories by the Angola (United Nations Sanctions) (Dependent Territories) Order 1998 made on 21 July and laid in July.

Similar Orders have been made to give effect to the Resolution in the Crown Dependencies. These orders restrict the sale or supply of certain goods which may be used in mining or transportation and the supply of transportation services; impose a freeze on the funds and financial resources in relation to UNITA and persons connected with UNITA; and for the Overseas Territories and Channel Islands, restrict the importation of diamonds exported from Angola on or after 1 July 1998. There is provision for medical and humanitarian exceptions.

EU Business (Scrutiny)

Mr. Trend: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the projected date of release of the White Paper on National Scrutiny of European Union Business. [58009]

Mrs. Beckett: I have been asked to reply.

I expect the White Paper will be published shortly.

SCOTLAND

Further Education Colleges

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has to reduce the administrative burden on staff in further education colleges of processing information requested by (a) the Scottish Office, (b) training agencies and (c) local enterprise companies. [56951]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 3 November 1998]: In line with recommendations made by the Committee on Standards in Public Life in its Second Report, the Government take care to ensure that necessary monitoring and collection of information are undertaken in a way that is as simple as possible and which does not create unnecessary bureaucracy. However, as further education colleges themselves recognise, the fair and equitable application of the funding methodology for colleges is dependent on the accuracy and comprehensiveness of information which the Department receives from colleges on student activity. It is also appropriate that colleges' use of Government funding should be subject to proper monitoring and audit.

Scottish Enterprise (SE) and Highlands and Islands Enterprise (HIE) have responsibility for the management and delivery of Government funded training programmes. Administrative arrangements and information requirements are operational matters for these agencies. I understand that, following their recent Skillseekers Evaluation, SE and HIE are presently reviewing administrative procedures, with a view to simplifying them.

Pensioners (Reduced Taxi Fares)

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will extend the travel discounts afforded to pensioners to allow for reduced fares on taxis. [57607]

Mr. Macdonald: Local authorities are able at present to provide pensioners with concessionary travel by taxi if they so wish. Local authorities have discretionary powers under section 93 of the Transport Act 1985 which allow any local authority, or any 2 or more local authorities acting jointly, to establish a concessionary travel scheme for eligible categories of person including pensioners. At present all Scottish local authorities, except Orkney Islands Council, operate concessionary travel schemes and a number include taxicards for pensioners.

Autism

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce a charter for persons with autism in line with the charter adopted at the fourth Autism Europe Congress in May 1992; and if he will make a statement. [57614]

Mr. Dewar: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Cabinet Office on 3 November 1998, Official Report, column 558.

Land Law Reform

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the terms of reference of the Scottish Law Commission's investigation of the reform of Scottish land law. [57760]

Mr. McLeish: The Scottish Law Commission's work on the reform of Scottish land law is part of its Fifth Programme of Law Reform submitted to the Lord Advocate on 7 February and published on 25 February 1997 published (Scot Law Com. No. 159). As stated in the programme under item No. 6 the Commission aims to make recommendations for the abolition of the system of feudal tenure and its replacement with a modern system based on the principle of absolute ownership of land.

Organic Farming

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the disparity in support for organic farming as between (a) Scotland and (b) England; and what factors underlie such a disparity. [57342]

Mr. Macdonald [holding answer 3 November 1998]: There is no disparity. The Government are committed to supporting increased organic production. Support for organic farming conditions in Scotland takes account of the specific challenges facing producers. Interim measures to enhance the Organic Aid Scheme are being considered before the scheme is merged as from Spring 2000 with the mainstream agri-environment schemes with the aim of giving organic farming in Scotland a higher profile.

Nursing Care

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people have been assessed as being in need of long-term nursing care and are currently awaiting a placement (a) in total and (b) by local authority area. [58365]

Mr. Galbraith: Information on the number of patients awaiting a placement is not collected routinely. However, as at August 1998 Health Boards reported 1,716 patients in Scotland awaiting transfer from hospital to alternative continuing care. The information is not available by local authority care.

However, different Boards use different criteria for a "blocked bed" and the figures need to be interpreted with caution.

Not all the patients are assessed as requiring continuing nursing care. Those that are will have that care provided by an NHS Trust or by a registered nursing home under contract to the NHS.

Others, depending on assessed needs, will transfer to nursing home, residential home or domiciliary care under the lead responsibility of the local authority.

In every case, transfers to alternative care will be arranged only when the alternative planned care, support and accommodation are in place, appropriate and available.

Every effort is made to minimise delays in this process.

Trunk Road Review

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will publish the results of the Trunk Road Review for Scotland. [58703]

Mr. Macdonald: The consultation period on the Government's proposed framework for the appraisal of trunk road investment in Scotland ended on 16 October. The responses are now being analysed to enable the review to proceed and I expect the results to be available early next year.

Opencast Coal Developments

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to publish a revised version of planning document NPPG4: Land for Mineral Working. [58708]

Mr. Macdonald: Draft revised guidance on the new planning policy for opencast coal and related minerals working in Scotland was announced to the House on 22 October 1998, Official Report, columns 1165–66. The guidance sets out the most robust framework yet within which planning authorities must consider all proposals for opencast coal developments. Consultation on the guidance continues until 11 December with the intention of final guidance being in place early in the New Year. The guidance replaces paragraphs 74–78 of NPPG 4 on coal. As with all planning guidance the remainder of NPPG 4 is kept under review although there are no plans at present to update the non-coal aspects of the guidance.

Correspondence

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan can expect a reply to his letter of 20 August to the Minister with responsibility for agriculture, regarding Mr. Will, a constituent. [58829]

Mr. Dewar: My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Lord Sewel, hopes to be able to reply to the letter shortly.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Secure Training Units

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the courts which have sentenced a young person to a period of detention in a secure training unit since April. [58466]

Mr. Boateng: As of 6 November, there have been 85 secure training orders made since the sentence came into effect on 1 March. The following Youth Courts have made one or more orders:

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many young persons have been sentenced to a period of detention in a secure training unit since April; and if he will make a statement; [58463]

(2) how many persons had been sentenced to a period of detention in a secure training unit but were waiting for a place at the latest available date. [58464]

Mr. Boateng: As of 6 November, 85 young people had been sentenced to a secure training order. There are currently 7 trainees in local authority secure accommodation for whom no places are available for them at present.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the range of offences committed by young persons sentenced to a period of detention in a secure training unit since April. [58465]

Mr. Boateng: The following range of offences have been committed by young people sentenced to a secure training order:

Affray
Arson
Aggravated vehicle taking Attempted theft of motor vehicle
Burglary
Causing unnecessary suffering to an animal
Common assault
Criminal damage
Dangerous driving
Driving while disqualified
Indecent assault
No driving licence
Obtaining property by deception
Possession of a knife
Possession of drugs
Taking without the owner's consent
Theft
Violent disorder.

Health Care Staff

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about pay differentials between health care staff in the Prison Service and the National Health Service. [58460]

Mr. George Howarth: Nurses employed by the Prison Service are paid at the same basic rates and on the same terms and conditions as applied in the National Health Service. Many prison healthcare centres are also staffed by healthcare officers. These are paid on the appropriate prison officer scale and, in addition, receive a specialist allowance of £1,041 per annum. The prison officers' pay scale ranges between £14,863 and £21,257. Direct pay comparisons between healthcare officers and nurses are not appropriate as different employment conditions apply.

The Prison Service also employs doctors. From 1 January 1999 rates from Prison Service medical officers will range between £40,250 and £55,367. Rates for senior medical officers will range between £42,665 and £64,323. Individual salaries within these pay ranges will reflect qualifications, experience and performance. Rates for consultants in the National Health Service range between £45,740 and £59,040. In addition, discretionary points ranging between £2,370 and £11,810 can apply.

Child Curfews

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many local authorities have applied to introduce a local child curfew; and if he will make a statement. [58457]

Mr. Boateng: Local child curfews are a new provision which will help a local authority develop its community safety strategy. The aim of such curfews is twofold. They will address the need to prevent young children from being drawn into anti-social or criminal behaviour, and they will protect communities from the misery and distress which can be caused by groups of unsupervised children.

The power of local authorities to make a local child curfew scheme is an enabling one. It only came into force on 30 September 1998. Not surprisingly, therefore, no applications for local child curfew schemes have been received so far.

Policing

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the proposal to introduce targeted policing in 20 specific areas; what arrangements will be made for maintaining policing levels in other areas; and if he will make a statement. [58462]

Mr. Boateng: Research shows the value of targeted policing in addressing both complex community-wide problems, and specific repeated problems. Targeting policing effort at identified problems as part of a strategy to reduce crime and disorder enables chief officers to decide how to deploy their resources most effectively. The strategy should be based on an analysis of local crime and associated problems and the policing tactics adopted in the light of the analysis. The crime and disorder audits required by the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 support this approach.

Equally, our approach is output-driven and we will expect careful evaluation to demonstrate how crime and disorder are effected as a result of any strategy and how that fits with the locally agreed targets for crime reduction.

To help forces develop this approach, we are making over £30 million available over the next three years for targeted policing projects as part of the crime reduction strategy.

This funding is in addition to the extra £1.24 billion which will be available to police authorities in England and Wales over the next three years under the Government's spending plans announced in the summer. This settlement, along with savings from the 2 per cent. year on year efficiency improvements which police forces will be asked to achieve, will help to ensure that more resources are focused on the front line against crime.

As experience around the country shows that targeted policing does not require additional police officers or other resources to be successful, there is no reason to believe that the work we are undertaking will adversely affect existing policing levels.

Prisoners

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of recorded criminal offences committed by people serving prison sentences in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [58456]

Mr. George Howarth: The available information for persons who have been charged with a further offence whilst on temporary release from prison is given in table 1.

Information relating to offences committed whilst in prison which are too serious for a prison governor to deal with under the prison disciplinary system and are referred to the police for prosecution is given in table 2. This information is also published in successive volumes of "Statistics of offences against prison discipline and punishments England and Wales" up to 1996, and thereafter in "Prison statistics England and Wales" (chapter 8 of the 1997 edition, Cm 4017). Copies are available in the Library.

[1] not applicable

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage and number of prisoners, at the latest available date, had previously served a non-custodial sentence; and if he will make a statement. [58455]

Mr. Boateng: The most recent available information relates to a sample of sentenced prisoners held in prison on 30 June 1997. The estimated percentage of sentenced prisoners identified as having previous non-custodial sentences is 74 per cent., corresponding to around 36,000 prisoners.

Previous criminal history information is, however, derived from matching Prison Service records to offender details of the Home Office Offenders Index and a further 9 per cent. of prisoners could not be matched. A prisoner may not be matched because he or she may have been sentenced for an offence not on the 'standard list' and has no previous record for standard list offences or alternatively there may be an inconsistency between personal details held on the Offenders Index and those held on prison records.

The percentage of prisoners identified as having no previous non-custodial sentences is 16 per cent. A slightly lower percentage (14 per cent.) of prisoners was identified as having no previous sentence of any kind (i.e. including custodial sentences).

Prison population[1] in Prison Service establishments under sentence on 30 June 1997: by past criminal history[2] England and Wales

	Percentage[3]

[2] Relates to convictions for 'standard list' offences only. These offences include all indictable offences and some of the more serious summary offences.

[3] Percentages for previous history not found, previous non-custodial sentence and no previous non-custodial sentence do not add to 100 due to rounding.

[4] Information on prisoners was matched to records on the Home Office Offenders Index. In some cases no set of matching records can be found.

Health Care Services (Young Offenders)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to create a new position for the overseeing of the health care services for young offenders in custody; and if he will make a statement. [58461]

Mr. George Howarth: Health care in young offender institutions, in common with other Prison Service establishments, is delivered through the local operational line and supported by Prison Service area health care and nursing advisers. The Prison Service has no plans to create a new position specifically to oversee health care for young offenders. However, the future organisation of prison health care is currently under review.

Medway Secure Training Centre

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions the contract points requirements have been exceeded at the Medway secure training centre; and if fines (a) have been levied and (b) are being considered. [58471]

Mr. Boateng: The contract for Medway Secure Training centre provides for an evaluation of performance each quarter against a standard which assumes year on year improvement. At the end of the first quarter, contract payments were reduced by £5,869 to reflect performance points accumulated in that period. The evaluation of the second quarter has not yet taken place.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) assaults on staff and inmates and (b) acts of indiscipline there have been by young persons at the Medway secure training centre since its opening. [58468]

Mr. Boateng: Since Medway Secure Training Centre opened, the contractor has recorded a total of 97 assaults on staff by trainees. Twenty-six of these assaults resulted in staff being referred for medical treatment, and in 11 cases they led to criminal charges. Fourteen assaults on trainees by other trainees have been recorded, and in one case this led to criminal charges.

Fourteen incidents of concerted indiscipline involving more than two trainees have been recorded. In three cases, this led to criminal charges.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many young people have absconded from the Medway secure training centre since its opening. [58467]

Mr. Boateng: Two trainees breached the perimeter security at Medway Secure Training Centre on 22 August. They were immediately pursued by members of staff and were quickly returned to the centre.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total staff complement at the Medway secure training centre. [58470]

Mr. Boateng: The agreed staff complement for Medway Secure Training Centre is 100.5 staff.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many staff have resigned or been dismissed from the Medway secure training centre since it opened. [58469]

Mr. Boateng: Since Medway Secure Training Centre opened, 35 staff have resigned. The contract of one member of staff was terminated by mutual agreement, and one member of staff employed by a sub-contractor was dismissed.

Ex-service Men (Prisoners)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the average number of ex-servicemen and servicewomen serving prison sentences during the past year; and if he will make a statement. [58472]

Mr. George Howarth: The information requested is not available. Information regarding an individual's professional status, prior to reception into a Prison Service establishment, is not recorded on central computer records.

Young People (Re-offending)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if figures are available for the re-offending rates of young people released from each young offender institution; and if he will make a statement. [58458]

Mr. Boateng: The most recent available information is given in the table. It relates to a sample of sentenced prisoners released during 1994. The table contains reconviction rates within two years of discharge for young offenders discharged from each institution.

Differences between reconviction rates cannot simply be taken to show that one establishment is more effective than another as the characteristics of offenders vary between establishments.

The sample was drawn to produce national results. Reconviction rates at individual establishments need to be interpreted with considerable caution due to small numbers in the sample at some establishments.

Reconviction rates are affected by differences in age, sex, previous convictions and other characteristics of those sentenced (see Home Office Research Study 136, "Explaining reconviction rates: a critical analysis").

It is important to note that:

The establishment from which a prisoner is discharged will often not be the establishment in which he or she spent most of their sentence;

The process of allocation of prisoners to establishments is far from random. In some instances, prisoners are virtually hand-picked as being suitable for a particular type of regime. Factors such as age, gender and previous criminal history have significant influence on the allocation process; and regional variations in reconviction rates are likely to be related to factors such as police clear-up rates and this, in turn, will have some effect on rates for individual establishments.

Conviction Rates

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the (a) conviction rate and (b) clear up rate (i) for each category of crime and (ii) on average (1) at the last available date and (2) in each of the previous two years; and if he will make a statement. [58459]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is given in the tables. Figures for clear-ups and convictions are not directly comparable because clear-ups relate to offences and convictions relate to offenders.

Table A: Conviction rate[1] for indictable offences by offence group, England and Wales, 1995–1997[2]

Immigration

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals have received permission to enter or remain in the UK under the concession introduced in October 1997 for people in relationships. [58339]

Kate Hoey: In the 12 months ending September 1998, a provisional total of 383 people have been granted leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom under the concession for unmarried partners announced on 10 October 1997.

Religious Cults

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what plans he has to legislate to control religious cults; [58440]

(2) if he will set up an inquiry into religious cults with a view to creating an acceptable framework for their operations. [58441]

Mr. George Howarth: We have no plans to do so. The Government understand concerns expressed about the influence of some groups on individuals, but do not consider that it would be feasible or appropriate to introduce specific legislation or regulation. All such groups are subject to the general law, including harassment, obtaining property or money by deception, kidnap, false imprisonment, offences against the person and sexual assault. Any complaints about breaches of the law should be reported to the police.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received in the past year from hon. Members on behalf of constituents with family members who belong to religious cults. [58439]

Mr. George Howarth: Since 1 November 1997, we have received 17 such representations from hon. Members, including 12 on behalf of one constituent.

Independent Commission on the Voting System

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much the members of the Independent Commission on the Voting System spent on foreign travel. [58350]

Mr. George Howarth: The total cost of the Independent Commission's foreign trips was as follows:

Australia	10,009
Germany	4,175
New Zealand	8,782
Republic of Ireland	2,558

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what class the members of the Independent Commission on the Voting System travelled abroad by air on Commission business. [58352]

Mr. George Howarth: The members of the Independent Commission travelled in business class.

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated cost to date of the Independent Commission on the Voting System to the British Exchequer. [58351]

Mr. George Howarth: The final costs of the Independent Commission are still being calculated but we estimate that the total cost will be in the region of £250,000.

General Pinochet

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost to the British Exchequer of General Pinochet's police protection (a) since his arrival in the United Kingdom to date and (b) since the warrant for his arrest was issued to date. [58347]

Mr. Straw: The arrangements for the provision of protection are operational matters for the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police.

For security reasons, it has been the practice of successive Governments not to provide information about police operations relating to protection.

Police Cadets

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police cadets there were in (a) May 1979 and (b) May 1997; how many there are at present; what plans he has to increase the number; and if he will make a statement. [58540]

Mr. Boateng: The information is set out in the table.

Year	Number of police cadets
May 1979	2,893
March 1997[1]	261
March 1998[1]	127

[1] After March 1995 police personnel numbers were collected only twice a year (March and September). September 1998 figures are not yet available.

In 1979, all forces had police cadets. By 1997, cadets were employed in only six forces, and by March 1998 in four forces (Bedfordshire, Durham, Staffordshire and West Midlands).

Ministers have no direct control over numbers of police personnel. It has always been a matter for chief constables and police authorities to determine whether to employ police cadets.

Internet Publishing

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to require all task forces and equivalent bodies sponsored by his Department to publish their working papers and minutes on the Internet. [58770]

Mr. Straw: Task forces and other equivalent bodies that are sponsored by my Department, even when independent from it, are encouraged to publish their reports and other documents through the Home Office's internet web site. The Youth Justice Task Force and the Community Fire Safety Task Force have already done so and arrangements are being made for others to do so.

Lorry Stowaways

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultations he has carried out with other EU members concerning individuals seeking to make a clandestine illegal entry into the United Kingdom in lorries. [58514]

Kate Hoey: In order to combat the problem of clandestine entry, the United Kingdom has taken forward several initiatives which have involved consultation with our European partners. These include:

- closer liaison and exchanges of information and intelligence with the Belgian, Dutch and French authorities;
- the placement of an Immigration Liaison Officer in Calais for a three month trial period which started in September, following an agreement reached by my right hon. Friend and his French counterpart;
- on-going negotiations with French authorities, including DICCILEC, to tackle the problem—the last meeting took place in Paris at the end of October;
- frequent discussion of such issues at various European fora, such as the Justice and Home Affairs Council, which last met in September;
- regular discussions with the port authorities in France, Belgium and Holland in order to target illegal entrants in lorries before they reach the United Kingdom.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidelines have been given to the police for dealing with clandestine illegal entrants arriving in lorries. [58516]

Mr. Boateng: There are currently no formal guidelines to the police for dealing with clandestine illegal entrants arriving in lorries. As I said in my reply to the hon. Member on 28 October 1998, Official Report, column 183, the Immigration Service is consulting the police forces most affected by the arrival of clandestine entrants to ensure that incidents are dealt with properly. In areas where it is necessary, we hope to have a standard agreement in place shortly between the police and the Immigration Service to provide a clear mechanism for dealing with clandestine entrants.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what estimate he has made of the number of cases of clandestine illegal entry to the United Kingdom in lorries involving (a) Kosovans, (b) Albanians and (c) others in the most recent period for which figures are available; [58512]

(2) how many clandestine illegal entrants have presented themselves at Lunar House, Croydon and (a) claimed asylum and (b) not claimed asylum in the most recent period for which figures are available. [58513]

Kate Hoey: There is no estimate of the total number of persons gaining clandestine illegal entry to the United Kingdom, by lorry or otherwise, since, by the very nature of the problem, it is not possible to establish that a person has entered clandestinely until they have been traced and interviewed. Regrettably, therefore, the information requested is not available.

There is no central record of the total numbers of persons presenting themselves as clandestine illegal entrants at the Immigration and Nationality Directorate public caller facilities at Lunar House in Croydon and such information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The available information relates to the total number of persons issued with notices of illegal entry as clandestine entrants, which between 1 January 1998 and 30 June 1998 totalled 3,540 persons. Information on the numbers of these persons who are, or who claim to be, Kosovan, and the particular methods of clandestine entry, is not held centrally. However, 550 were identified as nationals of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; 290 were nationals of Albania; and 190 persons' nationalities could not be determined. Within the total of 3,540 persons, almost 90 per cent. have applied for asylum in the United Kingdom at some stage. These figures are provisional and rounded.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultations he has carried out with representatives of (a) road haulage firms and (b) lorry drivers concerning clandestine illegal entrants arriving in the United Kingdom in lorries. [58515]

Kate Hoey: My right hon. Friend wrote to the Road Haulage Association in July this year, offering to meet it to discuss the issue of clandestine illegal immigration. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), and Home Office officials met representatives of the Road Hauliers Association, the Freight Transport Association and the freight companies Cavewood Ltd. and Rockold European Transport on behalf of my right hon. Friend on 28 October. We are committed to consulting with representatives of the road haulage industry as we seek to identify a solution to this problem.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he has given to port authorities concerning clandestine illegal entrants arriving in the United Kingdom in lorries. [58517]

Kate Hoey: Discussions have taken place with port authorities outside the United Kingdom with the aim of preventing illegal entrants from reaching the United Kingdom. Arrangements are in place to ensure that port authorities in the United Kingdom are aware that if they encounter suspected immigration offenders within the port they should bring them to the attention of the Immigration Service.

Children (Sex Abuse)

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to extend the Indecency with Children Act 1960 to protect those between the ages of 14 and 16 years. [58310]

Mr. Boateng: The Government are concerned to ensure that children are protected from all kinds of sexual abuse. The law provides protection against sexual abuse of all kind. The Indecency with Children Act 1960 relates to gross indecency with or towards a child under the age of 14, or inciting a child to commit such an act; the maximum penalty for this offence has recently been increased to ten years.

We recognise that the law on sexual offences contains many anomalies, and the differing ages at which children are protected from various kinds of unacceptable behaviour is one such anomaly. That is why we have said that we will be conducting a review of sex offences to consider all such offences, and this will be one issue we will consider. One of the principal aims of the review will be to ensure that the legal framework, as far as possible, protects children and deals effectively with those who use and abuse them.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review the issues of (a) valid legal consent and (b) informed consent as they relate to children subjected to sexual abuse. [58312]

Mr. Boateng: We are committed to undertaking a wide-ranging review of the sexual offences and penalties, with a view to reforming them and bringing them up to date. However, the Government will not consider reducing the age of consent below 16—indeed, one of the principal aims of the review will be to ensure that the legal framework, as far as possible, protects children and deals effectively with those who use and abuse them.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to extend the provisions of the Sexual Offences (Conspiracy and Incitement) Act 1996 to the same offences being planned against young people in the UK. [58313]

Mr. Boateng: The Government have no plans to extend the provisions of the Sexual Offences (Conspiracy and Incitement) Act 1996 to the same offences being planned against young people in the United Kingdom because these provisions already exist in the criminal law. Anyone in the United Kingdom planning to commit sexual offences against young people in this country may be liable for an offence such as conspiracy, as set out in section 1 of the Criminal Law Act 1977, or counselling or procuring an offence contrary to section 8 of the Accessories and Abettors Act 1861 or incitement to commit an offence contrary to common law.

The Sexual Offences (Conspiracy and Incitement) Act 1996 extended the existing jurisdiction of the courts over conspiracies and incitement to commit crimes in the United Kingdom to conspiracies and incitement to commit certain sexual acts abroad against children, provided that the substantive act constituted an offence both under the law in the United Kingdom and in the country in which the act was to be committed. The Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998 repealed the part of the 1996 Act dealing with conspiracy and extended the jurisdiction of the courts to include conspiracies to commit any crime abroad, provided that the substantive act constituted an offence both under the law in the United Kingdom and in the country in which the act was to be committed. The consent of the Attorney-General to proceedings under the 1998 Act will normally be required.

Prostitution (Under-16s)

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the number of girls under 16 years cautioned in relation to offences connected with prostitution or charged with similar offences over the past five years who have a background in local authority care. [58311]

Mr. Boateng: Statistics held centrally do not identify children in local authority care from the total number of those cautioned or charged for prostitution offences.

The Government are determined to tackle the problem of children abused through prostitution and the measures we have announced in response to the Children's Safeguards Review are intended to protect looked-after children from those who might seek to abuse them, including those who might seek to involve them in prostitution. In addition, the Home Office is working with the Department of Health to produce new comprehensive inter-agency guidance for the police and local authorities on the treatment of children abused through prostitution. That guidance will recognise that children abused through prostitution come from a variety of backgrounds, including local authority care, and offer guidance on how to deal with the problem.

Sex Offenders

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average period of time taken for a sex offender's name to appear on the national register of sex offenders following a conviction for a sexual offence. [58529]

Mr. Boateng: The Sex Offenders Act 1997 requires offenders convicted of a relevant offence to notify the police of their name and address within 14 days of conviction or release from prison if a custodial sentence is passed. Although the information is held on the Police National Computer the original notification is made locally. The average time taken for registration could, therefore, be calculated only by reference to over 6,000 paper records held by police forces. Such an exercise would involve disproportionate cost.

Drug Traffickers

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to bring forward proposals for new powers to confiscate the assets of drug traffickers and other criminals. [59214]

Mr. Straw: I will publish tomorrow the Third Report of the Home Office Working Group on Confiscation. This will be available in the Vote Office and in the Library. The Report recommends measures to strengthen the legislation on confiscation and money laundering and its practical operation. It also proposes extending powers for the forfeiture of criminal assets in civil proceedings. In view of the innovatory nature of some of the Working Group's recommendations, it is important that the public should be able to comment on what is proposed. There will be a consultation period until the end of February.

Effective means of recovering criminal assets and depriving organised crime of its working capital are an essential tool of law enforcement. I attach great importance to ensuring that these powers are modernised. I am also determined that new powers should be subject to the right safeguards. The Government will take account of the responses to the Report before reaching decisions on its recommendations. In the meantime, I propose to initiate a separate study of the possibility, discussed in the Report, of establishing a confiscation or forfeiture agency.

Civil Servants (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his private office, as at 1 October 1997; [56792]

(2) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his Department, by grade, as at 1 October 1997. [56790]

Mr. Straw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 5 November 1998, Official Report, columns 666–70.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Millennium Experience

29. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received on the size of the total lottery contribution to the Millennium dome. [57272]

Mr. Mandelson: I have received many representations from members of the public and from Members of this House about all aspects of the Millennium Experience project. Of the £2 billion of lottery money which the Millennium Commission is distributing to flagship and community-based initiatives around the country, £449 million (gross) will go to the Millennium Experience project—this incorporates both the Dome at Greenwich and a linked programme of events and activities around the country.

30. Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to include information on cancer research in Britain in the Millennium dome. [57273]

Mr. Mandelson: The zones within the Dome will explore different aspects of our lives. The zones which will include a look at the world of medicine are those dedicated to the Body and the Mind. In developing the detailed content of these zones, the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) is taking advice from a number of advisers—including Sir Kenneth Calman (the recently retired Chief Medical Officer for England), and Professor Catherine Peckham and Sir Michael Peckham.

34. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the impact of the millennium experience on the regions. [57277]

Mr. Mandelson: One of the key commitments made by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister when the decision to proceed with the Millennium Experience was announced was that it would be a truly national event. I am delighted to say that this commitment is being more than met through the New Millennium Experience Company's (NMEC) national programme of events and activities and the Millennium Festival. Both initiatives are an integral part of the Millennium Experience project and their impact is already being felt in all regions of the United Kingdom.

The national programme consists of the Learning Experience and the UK Challenge which embrace a range of exciting projects. These include: Tesco SchoolNet 2000—enabling thousands of children across the UK to record their own ideas and those of their families about how they see life in the third Millennium; Marks and Spencer's Voices of Promise—a celebration of music talent in schools, encouraging young people to compose songs and perform them locally: and Manpower's UK Skills Championships, which brings together a range of competitions covering specific skills and trades.

The Millennium Festival, which is being run by the NMEC, in partnership with the Lottery Distributors, is offering grants to local and regional projects covering arts, sport, heritage and charitable activities and events taking place during the year 2000. More than 3,500 applications have been received in the first grant round.

In addition, to those specific initiatives, the positive impact of the Millennium Experience on the tourism and leisure industries will undoubtedly benefit the UK as a whole. For example, the NMEC aims to ensure access to pre-employment training opportunities to people around the country in preparation for recruiting staff to operate the Millennium Experience at Greenwich during 2000.

35. Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the contract for catering in the millennium experience has been awarded; if it was put out to tender; and if he will make a statement. [57278]

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to announce the outcome of bids for the provision of catering facilities at the Millennium Exhibition at Greenwich. [57210]

Mr. Mandelson: The new Millennium Experience Company's (NMEC) policy is to provide as wide a range of catering services as possible to meet the varied needs of visitors to the Dome. The NMEC intends to divide the provision of catering services between branded suppliers and a single catering services company. On 9 October the NMEC issued invitations to tender to thirty catering companies covering both branded suppliers and others. The deadline for tenders to be submitted is 16 November and the NMEC expects to reach decisions about contract awards by the end of this year.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if the New Millennium Experience Company has authority to receive sponsorship from anonymous corporate donors; [57017]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 2 September 1998, Official Report, column 866, if he will ensure that the name of each company which concludes a sponsorship agreement with the New Millennium Experience is published immediately thereafter; and if he will make a statement. [57019]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 27 October 1998]: There are no formal qualifications attaching to the New Millennium Experience Company's (NMEC) remit to raise sponsorship towards the cost of the Millennium Experience project in its Memorandum of Association, in the Financial Memorandum issued by the Shareholder in February 1997 or in the Grant Agreement issued by the Millennium Commission in August 1997.

The NMEC has not received any offers of sponsorship with anonymity of source as a condition; nor is it seeking such offers. Indeed, the whole basis on which the NMEC's sponsorship strategy is built concerns the benefits sponsors can achieve through public recognition of their support. The names of sponsors who have made a commitment to the project have been, and will continue to be, announced at such points in the negotiations between them and the NMEC which the two parties consider acceptable.

Pledge 2000

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on Pledge 2000. [58320]

Mrs. Roche: Pledge 2000™ was launched by Action 2000 on 29 July 1998 in response to industry demand for an approach companies could use to deal with the Millennium Bug. It is a public scheme designed to indicate statement of intent to work co-operatively with customers and suppliers to disclose, discuss and solve issues of mutual interest arising from the date change problem. Although not legally binding, Pledge 2000™ reduces the fear of litigation and enables work to continue towards ensuring business continuity up and down the numerous supply chains that underpin the UK economy.

The pledge is in the form of a six point manifesto encouraging companies to share information, help other firms in their supply chains and avoid resorting to legal action wherever possible. Signing Pledge 2000™ represents a commitment at the highest level and is signed by a Board level person who is responsible for communicating the company's pledge internally. Action 2000 will continue to encourage businesses to use this valuable tool to resolve their Millennium Bug issues.

Consumer Durables (Prices)

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the average change in prices of consumer durables as a result of last year's Government announcement of changes to resale price maintenance policies. [58984]

Dr. Howells: The RPI shows that retail prices of consumer durables have fallen by 4.4 per cent. in real terms in the year to September 1998. There has been no change in Government policy in relation to resale price maintenance. It is prohibited except where the Restrictive Practices Court has permitted an exemption.

Doorstep Selling

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received relating to unacceptable practices in doorstep selling; and if he will make a statement. [58138]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 5 November 1998]: My Department has received a number of representations from consumers about unacceptable practices in doorstep selling. The DTI recently consulted on proposals to strengthen consumer protection in this area. I hope to make Regulations by the end of the year to implement these proposals.

Working Time Directive

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the steps available to an employee to seek redress against an employer who (a) refuses to implement the Working Time Directive and (b) seeks to avoid meeting the employee rights contained in the Working Time Directive. [57718]

Mr. Ian McCartney [holding answer 4 November 1998]: An employee can seek redress against an employer for non-compliance with the Working Time Regulations through two enforcement bodies. The limits (e.g. the weekly working time and night work limits) in the Regulations are enforced by the health and safety enforcing authorities e.g. the Health and Safety Executive and Local Authorities. The entitlements (e.g. the rest periods and breaks and the paid annual leave) are enforced through Employment Tribunals.

Astra Holdings

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 1 June 1998, Official Report, column 118, what is the current estimated public cost of the disqualification proceedings against the directors of Astra Holdings. [57608]

Dr. Howells: Payments totalling £355,500 have been made to 5 of the 6 respondent directors in the disqualification proceedings. The only significant costs remaining outstanding are those of one legally aided respondent, Gerald James, whose solicitors have been paid £400,000 on account but the final figure has not yet been determined. In addition, the costs of the Treasury Solicitor acting for the Department are estimated at £280,000.

Vibration White Finger

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many claimants for compensation arising out of vibration white finger have received full settlement in respect of their claims. [58735]

Mr. Battle: As of 5 November, 1,828 VWF claimants have received full settlements.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many claimants for compensation arising from vibration white finger fall in the age groups (a) 40 to 50, (b) 50 to 60, (c) 60 to 70, (d) 70 to 80 and (e) 80 years and over. [58726]

Mr. Battle: To date the numbers of claims received for VWF, for the age groups specified, are:

(a) 4,557

(b) 7,638

(c) 8,296

(d) 4,902

(e) 496.

Respiratory Diseases

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many claimants for compensation arising out of chronic bronchitis and emphysema fall into the age groups (a) 40 to 50, (b) 50 to 60, (c) 60 to 70, (d) 70 to 80 and (e) 80 years and over. [58736]

Mr. Battle: To date the numbers of claims received for chronic bronchitis and for emphysema, for the age groups specified, are:

(a) 2,303

(b) 6,667

(c) 13,759

(d) 17,228

(e) 5,762.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many claimants for compensation arising out of chronic bronchitis and emphysema have received full settlement in respect of their claims. [58728]

Mr. Battle: Pending agreement on a medical assessment process, full and final settlements have so far been made only to the lead cases decided by the court. 7 such settlements have been paid. In addition the Department has made interim payments to 10,047 claimants.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects an agreement to be reached in respect of outstanding compensation claims relating to occupational respiratory disease; and how quickly medical reports could be produced following the conclusion of a handling agreement. [57575]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 3 November 1998]: My Department is fully committed to settling all valid occupational respiratory disease claims (COAD) as fairly and promptly as possible. To date this number in excess of 60,000. We have proposed to the plaintiff's solicitors that the claims should be dealt with through a single medical process which should expedite the processing of claims quite significantly compared with the conventional common law route where each party obtains their own medical report. Intense but constructive discussions are now taking place with the plaintiff's solicitors, on what are complex medical matters, within a framework agreed by the court. I hope that good progress will have been made towards resolving the outstanding issues by the end of the year. There will then be a need to procure through tendering the medical services required to deliver the records, reports and examinations required, and for the successful tenderer to put in place the staff and facilities to deliver the service. Subject to a prompt conclusion to negotiations with the plaintiff's solicitors I am hopeful that final settlement of valid claims will start flowing early in the second half of 1999. In the meantime we may be able to extend payment of interim awards.

Motor Vehicles (Prices)

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to monitor the comparative prices of motor vehicles in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the rest of the EU, (c) Japan and (d) the United States. [57939]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 3 November 1998]: The Department of Trade and Industry monitors the European Commission's six-monthly reports on car prices across the EU. These comprehensive reports compare the prices in each Member State (including the United Kingdom) of the best-selling models in the EU.

The Department does not currently monitor the comparative prices of motor vehicles in either Japan or the United States.

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will require industrial tribunals to maintain statistics on the size of employers involved in cases brought before them. [58137]

Mr. Ian McCartney [holding answer 5 November 1998]: There is no requirement on an employer to disclose this information routinely to an employment tribunal and hence the Employment Tribunals Service does not maintain such statistics. I have no plans to introduce such a requirement.

Single Currency

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact on the levels of inward investment of the UK's decision not to join the single currency; and what steps he has taken to advertise the benefits of that decision to potential inward investors. [58679]

Mrs. Roche: The level of inward investment in the UK is unlikely to be significantly affected in the short-term as a result of the Government's decision not to recommend UK membership of the single currency in the first-wave.

The UK attracts a significantly larger share of inward investment than other countries in the EU. This reflects a number of important benefits that we offer including low taxes, the English language, a flexible and adaptable work-force and a commitment to lasting economic stability.

In the short-term, while the UK remains insufficiently converged with the rest of Europe there would be risks for stability in the UK if we joined EMU, and hence for inward investment. However, looking further ahead if the single currency succeeds in promoting stability and strengthening the Single Market, there may be a risk that inward investment decisions at the margin would move against countries perceived to be staying out for the longer term.

The Invest in Britain Bureau continues to promote in all major international markets all the inherent strengths which have made, and will maintain, the United Kingdom as the most attractive European location for inward investment.

Start-up Grants

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies have received start-up grants and closed within two years of opening in the last five years. [58119]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 3 November 1998]: Over the past five years, there have been 957 offers of Regional Selective Assistance grant for start-up projects. Of these, 61 companies closed within two years of the offer being accepted.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry by whom the decision not to recover start-up grant from Siemens at present was made; what the company has been told as regards possible future repayment of that grant; and if he will make the relevant correspondence available in the Library. [58117]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 3 November 1998]: My officials are currently working with the company trying to find a buyer for the plant. Whilst that is the case, I have decided that it would be inappropriate to recover the grant. However, the company has been informed that if any of the grant aided assets are removed without prior permission, or the plant finally has to close, it would be in breach of the conditions set down in the offer letter and the Department would have the power to seek full recovery, plus interest if appropriate, of the £18 million grant paid.

I will not be making the correspondence available in the Library. This is part of the official record and would add nothing to the answer above.

Non-fossil Fuel Levy

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of the non-fossil fuel levy is allocated to the support of (a) renewable energy and (b) nuclear power in the current financial year; and what plans he has to vary these arrangements in future. [57095]

Mr. Battle: The Fossil Fuel Levy Act which came into effect on 1 April 1998 ensured that electricity supplied from nuclear sources continued to be subject to the Fossil Fuel Levy. From 1 April all of the proceeds from the Fossil Fuel Levy have been used for the support of generation of electricity from renewable sources. I have no plans to use the levy for other purposes.

Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what communications Ministers or officials in his Department have had with (a) Euratom and (b) the International Atomic Energy Agency in respect of the proposals for the substitution of BNFL-owned plutonium for foreign-owned plutonium contained in wastes from the Sellafield Plutonium-Uranium mixed oxide fuel plant. [57105]

Mr. Battle: Ministers and officials in my Department have not had any communication with (a) Euratom or (b) International Atomic Energy Agency in respect of the proposals for the substitution of BNFL owned plutonium for foreign-owned plutonium contained in wastes from the Sellafield Mox Plant.

Aviation Fuel

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what research into alternatives to Jet A1 aviation fuel is being funded by his Department. [55781]

Mr. Battle: None.

Motor Manufacturers (Crash Test Standards)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to mitigate the impact of the new EC crash test standards on the costs of UK-based motor manufacturers. [57789]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 4 November 1998]: I have been asked to reply.

We welcome the introduction of the new European front and side impact standards which represent a valuable step forward in making cars which are subject to EC Whole Vehicle Type Approval safer. The standards have applied to new designs since 1 October this year, but will not apply to existing car designs until 1 October 2003. We believe the timescales in the Directive will allow vehicle manufacturers to incorporate modifications at the design and development stage as models are changed or updated. As the new standards apply across the whole of Europe, the cost of designing to them must fall to industry.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Industrial Heritage

12. Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on his Department's support for Britain's industrial heritage. [57253]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Our industrial heritage is of unquestionable value in helping us to understand our history and the way our forefathers lived and worked. No industry has had a bigger influence on creating modern day Britain than coal. I was very pleased to be able to announce recently that my Department will pay an annual revenue subsidy grant to the National Coal Mining Museum for England from 1999–2000.

The NCMME has a fascinating story to tell and DCMS support will provide the stability to allow it to plan for an exciting future.

Arts Council

15. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the allocation of funding by the Arts Council for music. [57257]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Arts Council of England devotes a substantial part of its budget each year to supporting music. It will make a further contribution over the years ahead through its support of the Youth Music Trust.

World Heritage Sites

16. Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many natural sites the Government are putting forward to UNESCO as proposed new world heritage sites. [57258]

Mr. Chris Smith: Together with Ministerial colleagues in the other interested Departments, I will need carefully to consider the results of the current consultation exercise before reaching a final decision on the number of natural sites to include in the list.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport on what date he expects to announce the United Kingdom's list of world heritage sites for submission to UNESCO. [57517]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 2 November 1998]: Together with Ministerial colleagues in the other interested Departments, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will need carefully to consider the results of the current consultation exercise before reaching a final decision on the list; but we hope that an announcement can be made within the next two or three months.

News at Ten

17. Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received on the proposal to reschedule News at Ten. [57259]

Mr. Chris Smith: I have received 2 letters from hon. Members on behalf of constituents and 19 letters from members of the public. Of these 21 letters, 19 were against the proposal to move News at Ten and 2 were in favour of allowing the move.

New Opportunities Fund

18. Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the progress of the new opportunities fund. [57260]

Mr. Banks: The New Opportunities Fund will invite grant applications for its first three initiatives early next year and plans to announce the first awards next spring.

Scientific Centres

19. Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to co-ordinate the work of scientific "hands-on" centres across the UK. [57261]

Mr. Chris Smith: I have no such plans. However, the National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts (NESTA) will shortly be publishing a consultation document, outlining, among other things, its proposals for a programme which aims to contribute to the UK public's knowledge and appreciation of science, technology and the arts. Subject to the outcome of the consultation, such "hands-on" centres may be able to bid for contracts being awarded by NESTA or enter into joint venture with them. This would obviously be a matter for the Chairman and Trustees of NESTA.

BBC Licence Fee

20. Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when the Government intend to review the BBC licence fee; and what form the review will take. [57262]

Janet Anderson: We shall be reviewing the future of the BBC licence fee after 2002 early next year. The issues will be examined initially by an independent review panel which will report to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State no later than the end of July. We shall then consult on the panel's findings.

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) if he plans to include a pensioner representative in the membership of the independent review panel considering BBC funding after 2002; and if the panel will be required to consult pensioner organisations; [58492]

(2) if he expects to implement changes in the current concessionary television licence scheme before 2002; [58660]

(3) when he expects to announce the membership of the independent review panel considering BBC funding after 2002. [58493]

Janet Anderson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be announcing the membership of the review panel shortly.

The review panel will no doubt wish to consider the views of various bodies and groups of people, including pensioners. In addition, pensioner groups will have an opportunity to feed in their views when the Government consult publicly on the panel's findings.

The Government will consider any proposals to change the concessionary television licence scheme, and the implementation of any changes, following the consultation exercise.

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to reduce the TV licence fee for blind people; and if he will make a statement. [58279]

Janet Anderson: Current concessionary arrangements, including those for blind people, will be examined next year as part of the review of the future of the BBC licence fee after 2002. The issues will be examined initially by an independent review panel which will report to the Secretary of State by the end of July. The Government will then consult on the panel's findings.

Millennium Projects

21. Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport in what ways millennium projects will benefit people in the north-west. [57263]

Mr. Chris Smith: Millennium Commission capital projects in the North-West have been awarded grant totalling almost £115 million.

These projects are creating opportunities for employment, education, entertainment and tourism which will benefit individuals and communities across the whole of the North-West region for many years to come. In addition 327 people in the North-West are taking part in Millennium Award schemes.

It is expected that some 40,000 individuals around the country will receive Millennium Awards.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) how much partnership funding has been secured, and how much remains to be secured, for each of the following millennium projects (a) Bristol 2000, (b) British Museum Great Court, (c) Changing Places, (d) Dynamic Earth, (e) Earth Centre, (f) Eden Project, (g) Hampden Park Stadium, (h) International Centre for Life, (i) Lowry Centre, (j) Millennium Link, (k) Millennium Point, (l) Millennium Seedbank, (m) Millennium Stadium, (n) National Botanic Gardens of Wales, (o) National Discovery Park, (p) National Cycle Network, (q) National Space Science Centre, (r) New Technopolis, (s) Odyssey Park, (t) Remaking the Heart of the City, (u) Renaissance of Portsmouth Harbour, (v) Tate Gallery of Modern Art and (w) University of the Highlands and Islands Project; [58958]

(2) what is the outstanding amount of marketing funding required to complete the landmark projects sponsored to date by the Millennium Commission. [58860]

Mr. Chris Smith: These are matters for the Millennium Commission. I will reply to the hon. Member in my capacity as Chairman of the Commission, and place copies of my reply in the Libraries of the House.

National Lottery

22. Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport in what ways the national lottery will benefit millennium award-winners in London. [57265]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Millennium Awards scheme is funded by the National Lottery through the Millennium Commission. To date 244 individuals in London have been awarded a total of £750,000 towards schemes to: popularise science; attend Summer University; improve the environment; and promote understanding of mental illness.

It is expected that some 40,000 individuals around the country will receive Millennium Awards.

26. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what action his Department is taking to ensure (a) communities and (b) individuals are made aware of the availability of lottery funds for communities eligible for small grants; and if he will make a statement. [57269]

Mr. Banks: We are working with the Lottery distributors on a new leaflet to highlight the availability of Lottery funding. It will publicise the one-stop shop scheme for small community grants which distributors in England are planning to introduce in the East Midlands on 18 November and extend to the rest of England next spring. The scheme will also be publicised at a conference which the Department is running in Barnsley on 10 November to explore how Lottery funding can help to regenerate coalfield communities.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will provide a breakdown, by local authority area in Scotland, of the grants awarded for each National Lottery good cause. [58294]

Mr. Banks: To date 4,710 awards worth a total of £497,705,355 have been made in Scotland. A breakdown by Scottish local authorities for each good cause is in the following table.

Awards information is also available on the Lottery website at www.lottery.culture.gov.uk.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what consultations he undertook with National Lottery distribution bodies prior to his announcement that the Millennium share would be moved into the New Opportunities Fund. [58484]

Mr. Chris Smith: We are regularly in touch with all the National Lottery distribution bodies and are conscious of the demands they are seeking to meet. We are also conscious of the potential for New Opportunities Fund (NOF) has to meet pressing needs in the fields of health, education and the environment. That is why, as well as announcing that NOF will inherit the Millennium stream, we also announced that each of the arts, sport, heritage and charities can plan on an extra £50 million from the Lottery between now and 2001 and that they are each guaranteed 16 per cent. of Lottery revenues from October 2001 onwards.

Employment

23. Ms Christine Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many people are employed in the cultural and creative industries. [57266]

Mr. Chris Smith: On Friday I published a document, produced on behalf of the Creative Industries Task Force, which I chair, which attempts to analyse for the first time the economic impact of the diverse and dynamic sectors which constitute the creative industries. We estimate the creative industries to turn over nearly £60 billion a year and to employ 1½ million people, making them an increasingly significant element in the national economy.

Asylum Seekers

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will ascertain the number of asylum seekers in representative British national sports teams, or who have competed in such teams over the last two years; and if he will facilitate arrangements for their travel for overseas events. [58547]

Mr. Banks: Britain competes in a great many sports internationally and at many levels including youth teams. Unfortunately I do not have this information and I think it would be costly, and in some cases an imposition on the governing bodies of the sports concerned, to try to collate it. However, I would be delighted to discuss with the hon. Member any individual cases or difficulty of which he is aware and explore what action is open to the Government to facilitate arrangements for travel for overseas events.

Sport (Women)

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when (a) he and (b) the Minister for Sport last met the Minister for Women to discuss the role of women in sport. [58483]

Mr. Banks: I have been in contact with my noble Friend the Minister for Women about women in sport and will be meeting with her to discuss this very soon. Officials in my Department are in contact with officials in the Government's Women's Unit to discuss issues relating to women and sport.

I remain determined to find ways to encourage and promote women in sport. We shall be looking at further ways to do so.

Lottery Funding (Witney)

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) how many bids for Lottery funding for arts projects in the Witney constituency (a) have been received, (b) have been awarded, giving amounts and (c) are still outstanding, since the establishment of the National Lottery; [57562]

(2) what proportion of total Lottery funding for arts projects and sports projects has been awarded to such projects in the Witney constituency since the establishment of the National Lottery; [57563]

(3) how many bids for Lottery funding for sports projects in the Witney constituency (a) have been received, (b) have been awarded, giving amounts and (c) are still outstanding, since the establishment of the National Lottery. [57561]

Mr. Banks [holding answer 3 November 1998]: To date the National Lottery distributors have awarded £5.03 billion to 31,000 projects across the United Kingdom. In England, the Arts Council of England has announced grants totalling £963,271,382 to 7,411 projects. The English Sports Council has announced grants totalling £753,348,968 to 2,679 projects. The figures for the Witney constituency are set out in the table:

Witney	Arts projects	Sports projects
Number of applications	30	27
Outstanding applications	6	0
Successful applications	12	15
Value of successful applications (£)	817,552	1,411,853
Value as per cent. of England	0.8	1.87

Information on successful Lottery applicants can be found on the Department's website www.lottery.culture.gov.uk.

Running Tracks

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment his Department has made of the impact of the safety checks introduced by British Athletics 98 on the number of all-weather running tracks available for use; and what assistance his Department will provide to local authorities to replace all-weather running tracks which have been declared unsafe by British Athletics. [57893]

Mr. Banks: No direct assessment has been made of the impact of the safety checks on the number of all-weather running tracks available for use. However, the English Sports Council (ESC) has provided financial and other support services to UK Athletics '98 over the last year to produce a national facilities strategy. This is due for publication and promotion in December 1998. The strategy recognises that the sport needs to encourage better management and maintenance of existing all weather tracks, which are predominantly owned and managed by local authorities.

No direct assistance from the UK Sports Council (UKSC) or ESC has been provided to local authorities to replace all-weather tracks which have been declared unsafe. However, both the UKSC and ESC are planning to provide exchequer funding to the new national governing body, Athletics UK, to support a new staffing structure which will include a full-time Facilities Co-ordinator post. This post will enable the sport to provide more pro-active advice and better services to local authorities and other track providers as to what is best practice with regard to the management of athletics stadia. In addition, local authorities may also apply to the ESC for a grant from the Lottery Sports Fund to help build new or upgraded facilities. Around £250 million of Lottery Grants will be awarded to sport in 1998–99.

Sportsmatch

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the future of Sportsmatch; and what effect the changes in its operation will have on his departmental budget. [58019]

Mr. Banks: Sportsmatch is a successful scheme which brings in much needed business sponsorship to the previously neglected area of grass roots sport. We have made it clear that we would like to see distributors come forward with new ideas for opening up Lottery funds to smaller community sports initiatives and we believe there may be links here to be made with the Sportsmatch approach. We have consulted on the future of Sportsmatch in England on this basis.

The starting point of the consultation was that greater synergy would best be achieved by transferring in full responsibility and funding for the Sportsmatch scheme from the Department to the English Sports Council with effect from April 1999. The funds would be ring fenced for the first financial year at least while the Council reviews with the scheme's managers the options for the future. Longer term arrangements would be decided following discussion of the review with Ministers. The aim would be to ensure that the grant-in-aid, lottery funding, and Sportsmatch money could be deployed in a synchronised way. Responses to the consultation have now been received and are being considered.

Departmental Guarantees

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what guarantees his Department has made in monetary terms to (a) arts, (b) sport, (c) charities, (d) heritage, (e) projects to mark the Millennium and (f) the New Opportunities Fund. [58020]

Mr. Chris Smith: As a result of my Department's overall settlement from the Comprehensive Spending Review, I have been consulting on my proposals for the allocation of the £290 million additional investment which I have received. This is investment for reform and modernisation and in exchange I expect to see improvements in efficiency, access and modernisation. I anticipate being able to provide institutional allocations in early December.

The arts, sport, heritage and charities Lottery good causes can now plan on receiving an extra £50 million by the end of the present licence period in September 2001, bringing their forecast income by then to over £1.85 billion each. Thereafter they have each been guaranteed one sixth of Lottery revenues for good causes.

The Millennium Commission has been guaranteed an income of £2.017 billion over its funding lifetime.

The New Opportunities Fund will receive around £1.2 billion during the licence period. Once the millennium stream has closed down, NOF's share of Lottery revenues will rise to one third.

Digital Broadcasting

Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of the extent to which the move to digital broadcasting will allow reception of appropriate regional variations of BBC and ITV in (a) West Norfolk and (b) other regions unable to receive local programming. [57264]

Janet Anderson: The Government's priority is the successful launch of digital television and the expansion in choice it will bring. By the end of 1999 digital terrestrial television will cover 90 per cent. of the UK population and be supplemented by digital cable and satellite services. At this stage, we have made no assessment of what additional benefits digital broadcasting might bring in terms of further local programming.

Regional Orchestras

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on his policy on regional orchestras. [57255]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Government policy on the arts is guided by a desire to promote excellence, access, innovation and education. Our regional orchestras play a valuable role in this, by opening up to a wide range of people the enjoyment of music of the highest standards.

Football (Youth Development)

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much of the English Sports Council's promised annual funding for youth development has been disbursed to lower league football clubs. [57159]

Mr. Banks: The English Sports Council has made available £20 million over the next four years from the Lottery Sports Fund for the establishment of new academies or centres of excellence for Football League clubs. This money is to be matched pound for pound by the FA Premier League. The English Sports Council take the final decision on applications from this source. The Council has recently allocated £5.8 million over the next four years to 22 Football League Clubs—the first allocation under this initiative. The Premier League will be allocating a similar sum.

Artistic Heritage

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has held in the past year on proposals to protect the United Kingdom's artistic heritage from export. [57180]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The UK's artistic heritage is already well protected by our present system of export controls. Ministers have not within the past year discussed proposals for improving them.

Film Industry

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when the new Film Export Trade body was established; and how often it has met. [58486]

Janet Anderson: Film Export UK was established on 25 September this year as a division of the Producers Alliance for Cinema and Television (PACT). To date it has held two meetings.

Royal Parks (Car Parking)

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 29 October 1998, Official Report, column 267, what assessment he has made of the impact of weekend charges for parking in the Royal Parks on (a) parking and (b) road safety in neighbouring streets where no charges are levied; and what representations he has received from residents. [58225]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 4 November 1998]: The Agency undertook a consultation exercise to solicit the views of interested parties before making a final decision on the amendments to regulations affecting Hyde Park and Regent's Park.

Those consulted include the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, the neighbouring local authorities, local interest groups, including residents' associations, and the four local MPs. The original proposals were amended as a result of the responses received.

The level of charges is designed to improve traffic management, and is pitched at a level to minimise displacement of traffic and avoid increasing on-street parking in the vicinity. The changes are consistent with government policy on traffic, parking and transport in London.

DEFENCE

Air-to-air Missiles

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the criteria required in the invitation to tender for the Staff Requirement (Air) 1239 for a beyond visual range air-to-air missile. [58523]

Mr. Spellar: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) on 6 July 1998, Official Report, column 354.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those companies which have been invited to tender for the SR(A) 1239. [58525]

Mr. Spellar: SR(A)1239 refers to our requirement for a Beyond Visual Range Air-to-Air Missile for Eurofighter. Invitations to tender were issued in December 1995 to the following companies:

a) BAe Dynamics, Stevenage.

b) Hughes Aircraft Co., Tuscon, USA.

c) Daimler-Benz, Germany.

d) Alenia, Italy.

e) Matra-Defence, France.

f) GEC-Marconi, Stanmore.

g) Aerospatiale, France.

h) Saab Dynamics, Sweden.

i) Raytheon Electronic Systems, Bedford.

Responses were received from Matra BAe Dynamics and Hughes Aircraft Co., now Raytheon Systems Ltd. Following initial evaluation, it was decided to conduct a project Definition/Risk Reduction phase, and further Invitations to Tender were issued to both companies in October 1997.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from other EU countries on the Staff Requirement (Air) 1239 for a beyond visual range air-to-air missile. [58524]

Mr. Spellar: Although SR(A)1239 is to meet a UK requirement for a Beyond Visual Range Air-to-Air Missile for Eurofighter, our Eurofighter Partner Nations, Germany, Italy and Spain, have similar requirements, as do Sweden for their JAS 39 Gripen aircraft, and have agreed to be associated with our competition. We are assessing the bids jointly and are exploring the possibility of meeting our requirements through a common solution.

Nuclear Warheads

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if there will be a reduction in the number of warheads produced at Aldermaston as a result of the alterations to the United Kingdom's nuclear posture announced in the Strategic Defence Review; and if he will make a statement. [58144]

Mr. George Robertson: We announced in the Strategic Defence Review that a stockpile of fewer than 200 operationally available nuclear warheads was required to meet our future needs, a reduction from the maximum of 300 announced by the previous Government. There will, therefore, be a reduction in the number of warheads produced at the Atomic Weapons Establishment at Aldermaston.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if all UK Trident missiles are (a) deployed, (b) held as part of a processing margin or (c) to be used in test firings; [58148]

(2) if the total holding of operational nuclear warheads, as revised by the Strategic Defence Review, provides the potential to deploy more than 48 warheads per Trident submarine; [58149]

(3) under what circumstances the Government would consider further reducing the number of nuclear warheads deployed on UK Trident submarines. [58150]

Mr. George Robertson: Our Trident operating posture, including the number of warheads deployed, is based on a rigorous assessment of the minimum necessary to provide credible deterrence. Should changes in strategic circumstances lead to a change in that assessment, we would make corresponding adjustments to our deployed posture. The Strategic Defence Review decisions on missile numbers and the stockpile of operationally available warheads are based on an assessment of the worst circumstances which might arise during Trident's life, however remote they may seem today, and thus provide potential to deploy additional weapons should that ever become necessary. In addition, total stockpile numbers also take account of processing margins and, in the case of missiles, anticipated test firings.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the number of nuclear weapons held as a necessary processing margin or for technical surveillance purposes will increase as a result of the Strategic Defence Review. [55870]

Mr. George Robertson [holding answer 28 October 1998]: There will be no increase in the number of nuclear weapons held as a processing margin or for technical surveillance purposes as a result of the Strategic Defence Review. However, there will be an increase in the number of nuclear warheads awaiting dismantlement.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if any UK Trident missiles are deployed without nuclear warheads. [58151]

Mr. George Robertson: Disclosing the information requested would assist a potential adversary to calculate our capabilities and would therefore be harmful to deterrence. Consequently I am withholding the information under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Defence, Security and International Relations).

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the United Kingdom's sub-strategic nuclear capability deployed on Trident missiles has been reduced as a result of the outcome of the Strategic Defence Review compared with the previous Government's deployments. [58152]

Mr. George Robertson: We stated in the Strategic Defence Review White Paper that each Trident submarine will carry the reduced load of 48 warheads when on deterrent patrol. This compares with the previous Government's announced ceiling of 96. The reduced load of 48 warheads will meet both our strategic and sub-strategic requirements in current Strategic circumstances. Details on the breakdown of this number is classified as this information could be used to provide insights into the precise capability of the United Kingdom's nuclear deterrent. I am therefore witholding this information under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what are the cost implications of reducing the number of warheads deployed on UK Trident submarines; [58143]

(2) what financial savings will arise from the Government's revised total holdings of operational nuclear warheads. [58147]

Mr. George Robertson: The decision in the Strategic Defence Review that the operationally available stockpile will consist of less than 200 warheads is expected to result in financial savings of some £22 million in the cost of the nuclear warhead programme over the next ten years. There will also be savings of some £50 million from the associated decision to limit to 58 the purchase of Trident missile bodies.

Weapons of Mass Destruction

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the Strategic Defence Review, Supporting Essays, Essay 5, paragraph 47, when the detailed review of national responses to the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction will be completed; and when a summary of the conclusions will be made public. [58142]

Mr. George Robertson: As I indicated to the House during the debate on the Strategic Defence Review on 19 October 1998, Official Report, column 978, I plan to report the conclusions of the review to the House shortly.

Mr. Doug Henderson: The cost of the Falklands garrison in the current financial year 1998–99 is expected to be just over £70 million. In the absence of significant modifications to the size and shape of the garrison, which are not currently foreseen, its cost is likely to continue to be roughly of this order in each of the next five years.

Menwith Hill

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) American military personnel, (b) American civilian personnel, (c) GCHQ personnel and (d) RAF military and civilian personnel are present at Menwith Hill Station. [57316]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 3 November 1998]: As at 9 October 1998, at RAF Menwith Hill there were 435 US military personnel, 935 US civilian personnel and 416 RAF and Ministry of Defence civilian personnel. I am withholding the numbers of operationally deployed GCHQ staff under exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the name and rank of the officer in charge at Menwith Hill Station. [57317]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 3 November 1998]: Squadron Leader Ted Sumner is the senior RAF officer at the site while the US base commander is Colonel Joseph Brand of the United States Army.

Infra Red System

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the two radomes which are to be part of the space-based infra red system will be constructed. [57313]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding reply 3 November 1998]: Construction of the two radomes at RAF Menwith Hill is due to begin in November 1999 and is scheduled for completion in February 2000. The radomes will support the new US Space Based Infra-Red System, providing early warning of ballistic missile launches.

Mr. Spellar: If the Rothschild Foundation agrees to the public release of this document which is a commercial agreement between us, then a copy will be placed in the Library of the House.

RAF High Wycombe

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for new building works at RAF High Wycombe. [58691]

Mr. Spellar: A Framework Development Plan was presented to Wycombe District Council earlier this year, outlining key proposals for future development of the RAF High Wycombe site.

There are two main proposals: first, to replace the site reception and RAF Police Flight Portakabin-style facilities with a permanent building; secondly, to replace two other buildings, used by Headquarters Strike Command, which are over 25 years old and nearing the end of their useful and economic life. The new buildings would provide modern facilities that meet current statutory legislation and provide suitable long-term office accommodation for staff. The proposals would address Wycombe District Council's concern over temporary buildings, the visual impact of the proposed developments when viewed from outside the site, and for landscape improvements, such as tree planting, on the RAF High Wycombe site.

Planning permission has been sought from Wycombe District Council for the reception/RAF Police Flight facilities. It is intended to present Outline Planning Permission application for replacing the HQ Strike Command buildings in the near future.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department has spent in legal fees when dealing with legal action against it by current or former service men and women in each of the last 10 years. [58145]

Mr. Spellar: Information on legal fees relating to common law compensation claims submitted by current and former Service personnel has been held centrally only since 1 April 1994. The figures cover legal fees and disbursements.

(2) how many RAF flight crew have (a) killed and (b) injured in training accidents in each of the last 10 years. [58141]

RNAD Trecwn

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what nuclear weapons or items were stored at the former RNAD Trecwn; and what licensing was required for them to be stored there. [58594]

Mr. Spellar: No nuclear weapons or items were stored at the former RNAD Trecwn. The question of licensing does not therefore arise.

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many companies and individuals other than WR Trust, including estate agents, were allowed access to the RNAD Trecwn site during the run-up to bidding in all bidding rounds. [58595]

Mr. Spellar: Access to RNAD Trecwn was granted to all companies and individuals who wished to visit the site during the run-up to bidding. From records kept of all visitors to the site, 114 individuals, including representatives from various companies and estate agents, took up the opportunity to inspect the site prior to bidding.

Chile

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 3 November 1998, Official Report, column 441, if he will identify which of the 21 meetings General Pinochet was present at; where and when such meetings took place; and which ministers were present. [58777]

Mr. Doug Henderson: General Pinochet was not present at any of these meetings.

St. Dunstan's

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to provide grants to assist the work of St. Dunstan's in caring for men and women blinded in the service of their country. [58244]

Mr. Doug Henderson: We are very conscious of the great efforts made by organisations such as St. Dunstan's to assist former Service personnel, and know how greatly their work is valued both by the present service community and by ex-Service men and women.

However, it is the longstanding practice of central Government not to finance charities' core activities. Therefore, as with all registered charities, St. Dunstan's—as a wholly independent charity—raises its own funding.

Under Section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968, there are powers for central Government to fund voluntary organisations whose activities support the Department of Health's policy objectives relating to health, and personal and social services. However, the budget is finite and more applications are received than it is possible to meet. I am given to understand that an application from the Diana Gubbay Trust for the Blind which is administered by St. Dunstan's, and provides care for visually impaired people who are ex-members of the Armed Forces or civilian services but whose blindness is not attributable to their service has been received this year and will be given serious consideration.

The Government provide considerable assistance for disabled ex-Service personnel, including St. Dunstaners. Personnel deemed to have sustained a disability due to service in the Armed Forces qualify for a tax-free War Pension from the War Pensions Agency. In addition, most Service personnel are members of The Armed Forces Pension Scheme (AFPS), which ordinarily pays an immediate pension on completion of 16 years' service in the case of officers and 22 years in the case of non-commissioned personnel. The AFPS also provides pensions to most Servicemen or Servicewomen who are medically discharged from their Service. Additional benefits may be paid if a disability is deemed to be attributable to or aggravated by Service. Attributable benefits are payable irrespective of length of service or whether the individual is a member of the AFPS.

Requisitioned Land

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list British Army military installations that are sited on requisitioned land; when his officials last had contact with the landowners of each site; and what plans he has to return the land to its original use. [56395]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 3 November 1998]: The Army's installations, that are entirely or partly sited on requisitioned land, are listed.

County Armagh:

Cloghoge Base, Newry
Crossmaglen Base
Keady Base
Newtownhamilton Base

County Down:

Rathfriland Base

County Fermanagh:

Annaghmartin Patrol Base
Clonatty Bridge Patrol Base
Gortmullan Patrol Base
Mullan Bridge Patrol Base
Rosscor Bridge Patrol Base
Wattle Bridge Patrol Base

County Londonderry:

Masonic Base

County Tyrone:

Aughnacloy Permanent Vehicle Check Point
Cookstown Base
St. Lucia Base

Belfast:

Fort Whiterock Base.

Apart from the initial serving of the Requisition Order my officials do not have any contact with landowners except where a landowner wishes to raise a particular matter concerning that Order.

The Northern Ireland Office (NIO) is responsible for compensation arising from Requisition Orders and payment of rents is made by the Compensation Agency on behalf of the NIO. The Compensation Agency would therefore have contact with the landowners due to their responsibility for the rent.

The requirement for bases and installations is kept under constant review and the improvement in the security situation allowed for the planned removal of the Aughnacloy Permanent Vehicle Check Point which was announced by the Chief Constable on 30 September 1998. The closure and planned removal of the Fort Whiterock base in West Belfast was announced by the Chief Constable on 26 October 1998. As the security situation improves there may be scope for further measures; however, there are no plans for additional bases to be removed from requisitioned land at the present time.

Royal Irish Regiment

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) serving and (b) former members of the Royal Irish Regiment held personal protection firearms on 10 April; how many new weapons have been issued since then; and how many weapons have been handed in. [56296]

Mr. George Robertson [holding answer 3 November 1998]: There are two types of Personal Protection Weapons (PPWs) which can be held by personnel of the Royal Irish Regiment (R IRISH). These are MOD-issued PPWs, and privately owned and purchased PPWs held on Fire Arms Certificates (FAC) which are issued and renewed every 3 years by the RUC Firearms Licensing Branch.

My Department does not hold details of R IRISH PPW holdings as at 10 April 1998. However, information on holdings based on returns collected from units between 21 April 1998 and 6 July are given in the table.

Table 1

MOD issued PPW	PPWs held under Fire Arms Certificate	Total
1,172	758	1,930

Details of PPW holdings as at 22 October 1998 are given in the table.

Table 2

MOD issued PPW	PPWs held under Fire Arms Certificate	Total
1,083	751	1,834

Table 2 shows holdings of 96 fewer PPWs on 22 October, than between 21 April and 6 July; this represents 97 weapons handed in, and one new weapon issued.

My Department does not hold records of PPW issued under Firearms Certificates to former members of R IRISH.

Civil Servants (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his private office, as at 1 October 1997; [56801]

(2) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his Department, by grade, as at 1 October 1997. [56799]

Mr. Spellar: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 5 November 1998, Official Report, columns 666–71.

Naval Bases and Supply Agency

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when he expects to make a decision on the proposed partnership between Matra-BAe UK Ltd and the Naval Bases and Supply Agency at RNAD Gosport; [57170]

(2) what representations he has received concerning the proposed partnership between Matra-BAe UK Ltd and the Naval Bases and Supply Agency at RNAD Gosport. [57169]

Mr. Doug Henderson: We have now completed the formal consultation process with the Trades Unions over the proposed Partnering Arrangement between the Naval Bases and Supply Agency and Matra-BAe UK Ltd. The Trade Unions are fully supportive of the proposed arrangement, recognising that this presents an opportunity for both parties to secure the benefits of skills exchange and the optimum utilisation of resources and facilities.

My Department has received no other representations on the Partnering Arrangement.

We expect the formal signing of the Partnering Arrangement, between MBUK Ltd. and the Naval Bases and Supply Agency will take place shortly.

HEALTH

Hospital Doctors

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many senior registrars are in post in each specialty; and how many have been given consultants posts in each of the last [illegible] years. [56741]

Mr. M[illegible]n: Copies of the information requested will be placed in the Library. On 1 April 1996, the Specialist Registrar (SpR) grade was introduced. Existing registrars and senior registrars were given the option to enter the SpR grade. Since 1 April 1997, those Senior House Officers who are eligible and wish to enter higher specialist medical training have been able to do so only by entering the SpR grade.

Clinical Psychologists

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will estimate the average life-time earnings of a clinical psychologist working in the NHS at current prices; [56449]

(2) what are the mean and modal salaries of fully qualified clinical psychologists; [56575]

(3) if he will list the real rates of increase in each pay award for clinical psychologists working for the NHS since 1990; [56444]

(4) what was the total salary bill for clinical psychologists in the NHS in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [56446]

Mr. Milburn: The current national pay scales for qualified clinical psychologists employed in the National Health Service range from £14,690 to £33,474 (in Grade A) and from £32,185 to £53,593 in Grade B. The latest Departmental survey of NHS earnings 1997 gives a mean salary figure of £33,100 and £42,600 for the modal salary, rounded to the nearest £100.

Total salary bill information, including employers contributions, is collected and monitored locally by trusts. Information on the total salary bill is not collected centrally. The real rates at which clinical psychologists pay has changed as a result of pay awards since 1990 are shown in the table.

Changes to Clinical Psychologists' pay in real terms: NHS pay awards 1990–98

Percentage

Clinical psychologists' pay awards in year change	Pay settlement	GDP factor	Real terms increase
1990–91 over 1989–90	7.90	7.83	0.07
1991–92 over 1990–91	7.90	6.20	1.70
1992–93 over 1991–92	4.75	3.31	1.44
1993–94 over 1992–93	1.50	2.66	–1.16

1995–96 over 1994–95	3.00	2.91	0.09
1996–97 over 1995–96	2.80	3.08	–0.28
1997–98 over 1996–97	2.43	2.60	–0.17
1998–99 over 1997–98	3.47	2.90	0.57

Notes:

1. The pay awards have been compared with the gross domestic product deflator to obtain real terms increases/reductions.
2. The pay awards represent annual changes of pay over each financial year (1 April to 31 March) since 1990 and includes the 1998 settlement.
3. The effect of staging the 1997 and 1998 pay awards has been taken into account.

Maternity Units

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospital maternity units in (a) the North West of England and (b) England have been (i) closed and (ii) merged since 1 May 1997. [57179]

Mr. Milburn: No hospital maternity units in the north west of England have been closed or merged since 1 May 1997.

Five hospital maternity units in England have closed since 1 May 1997, as part of local service developments. In one of these cases this change followed a merger.

Midwives

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many midwives have been subject to personal attack in the last year. [57599]

Mr. Milburn: The information requested is not collected centrally. However, officials in the National Health Service Executive are currently analysing the results of a survey of violent incidents in all trusts against all staff. The information from this survey will be used to set performance targets for the reduction of violent incidents. Violence to NHS staff is unacceptable and will not be tolerated.

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current average pay for midwives; and how this has varied in percentage terms in each of the last two years. [57597]

Mr. Milburn: The great majority of midwives are graded E (salary range £14,705 to £17,030 from 1 December 1998), grade F (salary range £16,310 to £19,985 from 1 December 1998) or grade G (salary range £19,420 to £22,255 from 1 December 1998), with some at higher grades ranging up to the maximum of the Senior Midwife pay scale (currently £48,820 plus the possibility of local pay). Midwives may also receive significant extra earnings for evening, night or weekend duty. Midwives' on grades F, G, H and I are also eligible for discretionary points which could mean up to an extra £1,195 per year. Midwives' pay is based on the recommendations of the Review Body for Nursing Staff, Midwives, Health Visitors and Professions Allied to Medicine. The pay award for the 1997–98 year was 3.3 per cent. (paid as 2 per cent. from 1 April 1997, 3.3 per cent. from 1 December 1997) and for 1998–99 3.8 per cent. (paid 2 per cent. from 1 April 1998, 3.8 per cent. from 1 December 1998).

Norwich Community Health Partnership NHS Trust

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many Norwich Community Health Partnership NHS Trust positions are currently vacant. [57488]

Mr. Milburn: There is currently one vacancy for a non-executive director on the board of the Norwich Community Health Partnership NHS Trust.

Dental Fluorosis

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the incidence of dental fluorosis in children, and its relationship to areas where the fluoride levels in the public water supply exceed one part per million. [57461]

Mr. Milburn: A national survey of children's dental health is undertaken every ten years. The 1993 survey, in which the teeth of over 17,000 children aged between five and fifteen years attending state schools throughout the United Kingdom were examined, was the first survey to include examination for enamel opacities. Some 1,700 12-year-olds were examined of whom 39 per cent. had one or more enamel opacity. We estimate that about half of these opacities could have been due to dental fluorosis which is a cosmetic effect which, where required, can often be removed by non-invasive dental procedures. The sample was not large enough to investigate any correlation between the incidence of opacities and the level of fluoride in drinking water, but this will be among the items considered in the planning of the next survey.

Ongar War Memorial Hospital

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of the Ongar War Memorial Hospital. [57408]

Mr. Milburn: We will announce our decision when we have given full and proper consideration to the proposals.

NHS Funding

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average annual real terms percentage increase in funding for the NHS between 1979 and 1997; and what is the equivalent figure for the next three years. [57464]

Mr. Milburn: During the years 1979–80 to 1997–98, the annual average real terms increase in National Health Service total net expenditure in England was 3.1 per cent. The annual average real terms increase for 1999–2000 to 2001–2002 is 4.7 per cent.

Pre-birth Care

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what payments are made to (a) doctors and (b) midwives for undertaking pre-birth care. [57595]

Mr. Milburn: Fees as set out in paragraph 1, Schedule 1 of the Statement of Fees and allowances are payable to general practitioners for the provision of maternity medical services.

Basic salaries for midwives and hospital obstetricians already include payment for undertaking pre-birth care, as this is part of their normal duties.

Nurses

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of nurses are employed in the National Health Service on a part-time basis; and if he will make a statement. [57863]

Mr. Milburn: The proportion of nurses directly employed by the National Health Service in England on a part-time basis (including those employed through a nursing 'bank') was 47 per cent. at September 1997. This is equivalent to 33 per cent. if part-time staff are counted in terms of full-time equivalents, for example where an employee working half the hours of a full-time employee is counted as 0.5.

Palliative Care

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list, by former regional health authorities and NHS Executive Regions, the number of (a) palliative care in-patient beds and (b) day and respite care places per 100,000 population for each year since 1990. [58180]

Mr. Milburn: The number of palliative care in-patient beds (and beds per 100,000) for each year from 1990 is shown in tables which are available in the Library. Information on the number of home care and day care services is available only for 1997 and 1998. This information is collected annually by the Hospice Information Service at St. Christopher's Hospice.

Interpreters

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the (a) demand for, and (b) cost of, interpreters employed on (i) a contract and (ii) a casual basis by East Kent hospitals and the East Kent Health Authority. [57548]

Mr. Milburn: The demand for foreign language interpreters in East Kent has increased since the arrival of asylum seekers from Eastern Europe.

The health authority has paid a full year cost of £19,000 for an asylum seekers nurse. In addition to this the Health Authority has paid £7,000 on interpreting services. Local hospitals also use on an ad-hoc basis and at no significant cost, a telephone service provided by an external organisation.

Organophosphates

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what research the Government have commissioned on the effects of organophosphates using human subjects; [57867]

(2) what reports the Government routinely receive from independent research bodies relating to the effects of organosphosphates on human subjects. [57866]

Ms Jowell: I refer my hon. Friend to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food publication PB 3814: "Official Group on OPs Report to Ministers" which gives details of all Government-funded research and development projects with a direct relevance to organophosphates. Copies are available in the Library.

The Government do not routinely receive reports from independent research bodies relating to the effects of organosphosphates (OPs) on human subjects. However, as part of the approvals processes for products containing OPs, from time to time, data which have been obtained using human subjects may be submitted to the regulatory authorities by manufacturers. I also refer my hon. Friend to the reply my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food gave him on 19 October 1998, Official Report, column 1057, which gave more information about the circumstances in which research data on human subjects may be required.

Information Technology

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to modernise information technology in the NHS. [57740]

Mr. Milburn: The White Paper "The new NHS—Modern, Dependable" made it clear that the National Health Service has to be underpinned by modern information technology. Together with leaders from the clinical professions, we launched our £1 billion strategy for achieving this on 24 September 1998. Entitled Information for Health, our strategy will support the many important actions that need to be taken between now and 2005. Copies of the strategy are available in the Library.

Ear, Nose and Throat Services

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions his Department has had regarding the proposed transfer of ear, nose and throat services from Cheltenham General Hospital to Gloucester Royal Hospital. [57884]

Mr. Milburn: Officials at the south and west regional office of the National Health Service Executive have had informal discussions with Gloucestershire Health Authority about the proposed transfer of ear, nose and throat services from Cheltenham General Hospital to Gloucestershire Royal Hospital in the course of their normal performance management duties.

Strokes

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the amount of funding provided for research into strokes in the last five years for which figures are available. [58105]

Ms Jowell: The Government fund health and medical research in a number of ways:

The Department funds research and development to support its work on policy development and evaluation in health and social care. The Department also manages the National Health Service research and development levy which is used to support research and development of relevance to the NHS both in NHS hospitals, general practice and other health care settings, and to fund the NHS research and development programme.

In addition, the Medical Research Council (MRC) which receives most of its income via grant-in-aid from the Office of Science and Technology in the Department of Trade and Industry, funds medical research as part of the Government's funding of the research base. The Scottish Office Department of Health (SO) also fund research.

Central records show the following expenditure:

Strokes

[1] Further funding may be being provided by the Department of Health through the NHS R&D Levy detailed information about which is not held centrally.
[2] The MRC also funds basic research including the study of molecules and cells, genetics and infections and immunity which will inform research in this area.
[3] Approximately £6 million since 1994—It is not possible to give accurate annual spend. Projects include those in areas related to stroke.
[4] Plus £2 million investment at Cambridge Cerebrovascular Centre

Cancer

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the amount of funding provided for research into (a) breast cancer, (b) childhood leukaemia, (c) cervical cancer, (d) prostate cancer, (e) colon cancer and (f) lung cancer for the last five years for which figures are available. [58104]

Ms Jowell: The Government fund health and medical research in a number of ways:

The Department funds research and development to support its work on policy development and evaluation in health and social care. Industry and medical research charities also make a substantial investment in cancer research.

Notes:
The fluctuation in levels of spend reflects the cycle of commissioning as projects start and finish.

Dentists

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what circumstances a dentist can enrol on a course on (a) peer review and (b) clinical audit without first being given a dental vocational training number. [58091]

Mr. Milburn: Participation in peer review and clinical audit schemes is of most benefit to principal general dental practitioners. A dentist without a vocational training certificate cannot join a peer review and clinical audit groups or receive expenses payments for attending their meetings. However, arrangements can be made for dentists seeking to acquire a vocational training certificate to sit in as an observer on a group and attend relevant study days in the local vocational training scheme without charge.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the dates on which future waiting list numbers will be published. [58272]

Mr. Milburn: The current pattern of publication of National Health Service waiting list statistics was set out in the 31 August 1998 "Statistical Press Notice on NHS Waiting List and Activity Figures". Monthly in-patient waiting lists statistics are published during the fifth full week after the month end, unless the month coincides with a quarter end when the figures are published a week later with quarterly National Health Service activity figures. The timetable for the next three months will be as follows:

Figures relating to end of month	Publication date
September (plus activity for July to September quarter)	Week commencing 9 November
October	Week commencing 30 November
November	Week commencing 4 January 1999

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what day in the current month the waiting list statistics will be published. [58518]

Mr. Milburn: September in-patient waiting list statistics for the National Health Service in England were published today, 9 November 1998.

Health Authority Appeals

Mr. Ivan Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list the occasions when appeals against health authority proposals were upheld by his Department between 1979 and 1997; [58429]

(2) how many appeals were made to his Department following proposals put forward by each health authority between 1979 and 1997. [58430]

Mr. Milburn: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Primary Care Groups

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what his Department's policy is on the appointment of elected councillors to primary care group boards; [58358]

(2) how many health authorities have indicated to his Department their intention to reserve places on primary care group boards for elected councillors; [58360]

(3) what guidance he has issued to health authorities on the appointment of elected councillors to primary care group boards; [58359]

(4) what guidance he has issued to local authorities regarding the nomination of elected councillors to serve on primary care group boards. [58357]

Mr. Milburn [holding answer 5 November 1998]: Guidance (Local Authority Circular 1998/21) has been issued to local authorities regarding the nomination of elected councillors to serve on primary care group boards. Guidance (Health Service Circular 1998/139) has been issued to health authorities on the appointment of elected councillors to primary care group boards. The Guidance makes it clear that elected councillors may serve as lay members of Primary Care Groups. We are not aware of any health authorities indicating their intention to reserve places on primary care group boards for elected councillors.

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the budget for managing primary care groups will be spent on allowances and expenses for board members. [58361]

Mr. Milburn [holding answer 5 November 1998]: The management costs of health authorities and their constituent primary care groups must be contained within management cost ceilings set for each health authority.

It is for health authorities and their constituent primary care groups to agree what proportion of their management cost allocation will be available for each primary care group. The proportion of primary care group's management budget spent on board members' allowances and expenses will vary for each primary care group depending upon local circumstances, the constitution of the board and the level of delegated responsibility taken on by the primary care group.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 3 November 1998, Official Report, columns 537–38, concerning local authority representation on primary care group boards, for what reasons he decided not to reserve a board place for an elected member of the relevant local authority. [58802]

Mr. Milburn: Primary Care Groups are concerned with the delivery of better local health services to their patients and how such services can be effectively integrated with social services. It is therefore important that at this operational level a local social services authorities officer should be the representative on the governing board of a Primary Care Group.

Health authorities and local government authorities remain responsible for the strategic planning and delivery of these local care arrangements and it is at this level that we see local authority members as having an enhanced opportunity to influence the development and implementation of health care arrangements for their community.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 3 November 1998, Official Report, column 538, concerning primary care group boards, what plans he has to issue guidance to board members in dealing with potential conflicts of interest. [58801]

Mr. Milburn: Primary Care Groups, as committees of health authorities, are governed by existing guidance on corporate governance.

Work-related Stress

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the impact of work-related stress in the NHS on levels of absenteeism; and what measures he is taking to reduce (a) work-related stress and (b) staff sickness. [57797]

Mr. Milburn [holding answer 5 November 1998]: Research has shown that National Health Service staff suffer substantially higher levels of stress than employees in the private sector and that this contributes to 40 per cent. of all sickness absence. The NHS Executive has issued guidance to all NHS trusts and health authorities on managing stress through its Health at Work in the NHS project and is piloting work based on this guidance at four trusts. The new strategic framework for managing Human Resources in the NHS is setting targets for reductions of sickness absence rates.

Coal Burn (Pollution Effects)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will assess the effect on rates of morbidity and mortality from cerebrovascular pulmonary and cardiac diseases of sustaining coal burn in the United Kingdom at present relative to continuing with change in the electricity generation mix towards gas-fired generation. [58707]

Ms Jowell: None. However, emissions from power stations will be taken into account as part of a review of the air quality strategy, which will be completed by the end of this year.

Mid Essex Hospital Trust

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 2 November 1998, Official Report, column 416, if he will publish the size of the waiting list at Mid Essex Hospital's NHS Trust calculated on the same basis as the figure provided in his answer. [58693]

Mr. Milburn: The total number of patients waiting at Mid Essex Hospital National Health Service Trust is 11,615 at September 1998.

Internet Publishing

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to require all task forces and equivalent bodies sponsored by his Department to publish their working papers and minutes on the Internet. [58773]

Ms Jowell: The Department is committed to encouraging greater openness of those public bodies which it sponsors, whenever this is practical or appropriate. Any decision to publish information on any of those bodies on the Internet will be taken on a case-by-case basis, in line with the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information[1].

[1] Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, Second Edition (1997), The Stationery Office Ltd.

Care Services

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 3 November 1998, Official Report, column 538, concerning care home placements, what research he has commissioned to establish the scale of the problems. [58803]

Mr. Hutton: No research has been commissioned specifically to look at this issue. Following the passage of the Community Care (Residential Accommodation) Act 1998 we are unaware of any major problems in this area.

Registration and Inspection

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those health care establishments and services that are not covered by a regulation and inspection regime (a) currently and (b) under proposals made by his Department. [58775]

Mr. Hutton: Statistics on unregistered health care establishments are not collected centrally. Currently, independent sector hospitals, clinics and nursing homes are required to be registered under the Registered Homes Act 1984.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Partners in Europe

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the impact of the schools pack Partners in Europe; what feedback he has received from schools and pupils; how he intends to monitor the future success of the pack in schools; and if he will make a statement. [58747]

Mr. Mudie: The Partners in Europe pack for schools was distributed in January 1998 to all schools in the United Kingdom. No formal assessment of the impact of the pack has been made nor is any planned, as its use in schools is voluntary.

The Partners in Europe information and resource pack for schools was produced in response to requests from teachers to update materials that were already in use in the classroom. The pack takes account of existing work in schools. It was produced in conjunction with the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority and the Central Bureau for Educational Visits and Exchanges.

New Deal (Substitution)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if the Government's evaluation of the New Deal for Young People will take into account the effects of substitution, dead-weight and displacement. [58876]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Yes: we are evaluating New Deal very thoroughly: that evaluation will take account of substitution, dead-weight and displacement. Details of the monitoring and evaluation of New Deal are contained in an article in the November issue of Labour Market Trends which has been placed in the Library.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pension Incomes

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 3 November 1998, Official Report, columns 547–48, on pension incomes, if he will provide corresponding figures based on income excluding income from capital; and if he will provide a more detailed breakdown of the results for those below £70 per week. [58881]

Mr. Denham: The information is in the table.

Pensioner benefit units disqualified from the proposed minimum income guarantee because of excess capital but who have incomes below Income Support levels, excluding income from capital, by band of income

Income	Pensioners
Up to £49.99	[3]50,000
£50 to £59.99	150,000
£60 to £69.99	220,000
£70 and over	180,000
Total	600,000

Notes:

1. Estimates are based on the 1995–96 Family Resources Survey and are almost certainly subject to a degree of error; the true figures could be higher or lower than those given.
2. This estimate should be treated with some caution as it is based on small sample sizes.
3. Estimates have been rounded to the nearest 10,000 cases.
4. Sample sizes are too small to give a breakdown below £49.99.
5. The estimates of income used here exclude income from savings and 'tariff income'. They also exclude any pensioners in full time work.
6. A pensioner, for income support purposes, is a single person aged 60 or over, or a couple (married or living as married) where at least one of them is aged 60 or over.
7. Of the total of 600,000, around 55 per cent. (340,000) have savings of over £20,000 and of these, approximately 190,000 have savings of more than £50,000.

Stakeholder Pensions

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the level of an adequate retirement income for the purposes of the stakeholders pension. [58828]

Mr. Denham: It is for individuals to decide for themselves what would be an adequate retirement income.

At present many people who cannot join an occupational pension scheme also find personal pensions are too expensive or give poor value for money. The Government will set out their proposals in the Green Paper.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the Government plans to introduce legislation for the implementation of the stakeholder pension. [58827]

Mr. Denham: We are committed to creating a framework for stakeholder pension schemes and will bring forward any necessary legislation at the appropriate time. Our proposals will be set out in the Pensions Green Paper.

Disability Benefits

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his oral statement of 28 October 1998, Official Report, columns 339–42, if he will list the estimated public expenditure effects of each of his proposed reforms to disability benefits in each of the next five years, and for each the eventual effect once the measures are fully implemented. [58597]

Mr. Timms: The information is set out in the table.

Estimated public expenditure effects of each of the proposed reforms over this period and in the long term

£ million

Measure	1999–2000 and 2000–01	2001–02	2002–03	2003–04	Long term
Reform of Incapacity Benefit	0	–90	–155	–205	–650 –700
Reform of Severe Disablement Allowance	0	–10	–20	–35	–100 –150
Disability Income Guarantee	0	+60	+65	+70	+70
Disability Living Allowance: higher rate mobility component for 3 and 4 year olds	0	+15	+15	+15	+15

Notes:

1. There are no effects in the first two years because the measures are not planned for implementation before 2001.
2. There will also be administration costs arising from the implementation of these changes, the reform of the All Work Test, and measures to take forward a more active modern service for claimants of Incapacity Benefit, Disability Living Allowance and Attendance Allowance.

Benefit Integrity Project

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expect the final investigations under the Benefit Integrity Project to commence. [58972]

Mr. Timms: In his statement of 28 October 1998, Official Report, columns 339–55, and the exchanges which followed discussing the next phase of the Government's plans to reform the welfare state, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made it clear that we will introduce a modern, active approach to Disability Living Allowance which puts greater emphasis on getting claims right first time and which allows for regular reviews of claims in payment. He also emphasised that there would be no return to the situation that existed before April 1997, when nothing was being done to check that people were getting the right benefit.

The Benefit Integrity Project will be replaced by a new system which we will ensure is fair as well as sensitive. The characteristics of the new system and when and how it will be introduced will be the subject of future discussions with the Disability Benefit Forum. We are keen to introduce this change as soon as possible but it is most important that we get it right.

War Disablement Pensions

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) civilian internees and (b) former prisoners of war are in receipt of a war disablement pension relating to the Second World War. [58475]

Mr. Timms: At 31 October 1998 there were 254,209 War Disablement Pensions in payment. Statistics on the number of former civilian internees and prisoners of war receiving payment are not kept and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Social Security Expenditure

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the total level of expenditure or planned expenditure (a) in cash terms, (b) in real terms and (c) as a share of GDP on (i) social security benefits excluding family credit and disability working allowance, (ii) family credit, (iii) disability working allowance, (iv) the working families tax credit, including tax expenditure and (v) the disabled persons tax credit, including tax expenditures in each year from 1978–79 to the end of the planning period. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his private office, as at 1 October 1997; [56825]

(2) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his Department, by grade, as at 1 October 1997. [56823]

Mr. Denham: I refer my hon. Friend to the Written Answers my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office gave him on 5 November 1998, Official Report, columns 666–70.

Benefits

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate is provided by his Department's Policy Simulation Model of the number of (a) adults and (b) children in benefit units receiving either means-tested benefits or the working families tax credit (i) in 1997–98, (ii) in 1998–99, (iii) in April 1999 after the introduction of the pensioner income guarantee, (iv) in October 1999 after the introduction of the WFTC and (v) once the changes to disability and incapacity benefits announced on 28 October have been fully implemented. [58598]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the table. Benefit units may be in receipt of more than one of the benefits shown. Consequently, the sum of the totals will not represent an overall estimate for adults and children on income-related benefits.

Notes:
1. Figures are rounded to the nearest 10,000 and based on the 1995–96 Family Resources Survey uprated to 1999–2000 prices, benefit levels and caseloads.
2. Total caseloads of numbers in receipt of benefits are consistent with the Department's 1998 Comprehensive Spending Review forecasts.
3. As estimates are based on survey data and then calibrated to forecasts based mainly on administrative data, the totals shown for each family type may differ from the true total.
4. The total number of adults represents those aged 16 and over, except for those 16 to 18 year olds in full time education. The total number of children represents those aged under 16 or 16 to 18 year olds in full time education.

Internet Publishing

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to require all task forces and equivalent bodies sponsored by his Department to publish their working papers and minutes on the Internet. [58772]

Mr. Timms: Working papers and minutes of task forces sponsored by this Department are internal policy documents and as such we have no plans to request their publication. When reports or documents are subsequently published or made available by conventional means, publication via the Internet is automatically considered.

Single Gateway

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what funding has been allocated for nationwide implementation of the single gateway following the completion of the pilot scheme. [58986]

Angela Eagle: We will use the single gateway pilots to find out what the costs are of operating such a service. We will then consider national implementation in light of these findings.

Pensions (Age Additions)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answers of 3 November 1998, Official Report, column 547, and of 10 December 1997, Official Report, column 603, on age additions, for what reason the means-tested benefit offset resulting from a £5 age addition is estimated to be lower in 1999–2000 than it would have been in 1997–98. [58767]

Mr. Denham: The answers were based on different models (a full suite of models for 1999–2000 is not yet available) and calibrated to different forecasts. Both answers provided the best estimate available at the time.

Social Security (Recovery of Benefits) Act 1997

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what changes there have been in the speed with which settlements of personal injury cases are made since the passage of the Social Security (Recovery of Benefits) Act 1997. [58410]

Mr. Timms: The information is not available.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received about the working of the Social Security (Recovery of Benefits) Act 1997. [58413]

Mr. Timms: Since the Social Security (Recovery of Benefits) Act came into force on 6 October 1998, we have received a total of 168 representations about the working of the scheme. The majority concern individuals making representations about the way the scheme has affected their compensation payment.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people have (a) applied for and (b) been awarded incapacity benefit in each year since April 1995 in (i) Staffordshire and (ii) the West Midlands. [58275]

Mr. Timms: The administration of Incapacity Benefit is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Brian Jenkins, dated 5 November 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking for the number of people in the Staffordshire and West Midlands areas who have applied for, and been awarded, Incapacity Benefit (IB) in each year since April 1995.

Information on the number of IB claims received is only available by each of the Agency's district, which do not match county boundaries. To obtain this information in the format requested would involve disproportionate cost.

Information on the number of awards of IB broken down by geographical areas has only been available since November 1996. Information from that date is shown in the attached table.

I hope the information is helpful.

Incapacity benefit awards

	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99
West Midlands	24,516	36,945	5,053
Staffordshire	9,091	15,809	2,318

TREASURY

Civil Servants (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his Department, by grade, as at 1 October 1997; [56756]

(2) if he will provide a breakdown in numerical and percentage terms of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his private office as at 1 October 1997. [56758]

Ms Hewitt: I refer my hon. Friend to the answers given to him by the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 5 November 1998, Official Report, columns 669–70.

Fixed-rate Preference Shares

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect of the repeal of section 255 of the Taxes Act 1988 on companies which have in issue fixed-rate preference shares created before 6 April 1973. [58349]

Dawn Primarolo: The effect of the repeal of section 255 of the Taxes Act 1988 was considered as part of the general assessment of the changes flowing from the Government's decision to abolish Advance Corporation Tax from 6 April 1999.

The Government took into account the cumulative effect of twenty-five years' inflation on the value of any remaining shares to which section 255 applies, and subsequent changes, including those effective from 6 April 1999, to the taxation of companies and shareholders which mean that it no longer works as intended.

Aviation Fuel

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the revenue which would be raised if aviation fuel sold in the UK were subject to VAT at (a) 8 per cent. and (b) 17.5 per cent.. [58500]

Ms Hewitt: HM Customs and Excise have no estimate.

Prudential

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with the Prudential over the disposal of its surplus funds; what sums are involved; and if he will make a statement. [58721]

Ms Hewitt: The Prudential announced in 1996 that it was opening discussions with DTI on the attribution of the inherited estate in its long-term business fund. These discussions are continuing with the Treasury, which took over responsibility for insurance regulation from DTI in January 1998. The total amount involved was estimated by an official of the Prudential when the company gave evidence to the Treasury Select Committee on 2 July 1998, to be between £6 billion and £8 billion.

It is the Treasury's policy not to comment publicly on discussions which it may have with companies in its regulatory capacity, in the interests of effective regulation and commercial confidentiality. But the Government's position on inherited estates was set out in a statement by the then Minister for Corporate Affairs in February 1995, and reaffirmed by the then Economic Secretary in a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Twigg) on 24 July 1998, Official Report, columns 750–52. The Treasury will deal with the Prudential's proposals, and any other proposals for attribution of the inherited estates of life offices, in accordance with the principles set out in those statements. The Treasury will place particular emphasis on protecting the interests of policyholders.

Charity Taxation

Mr. Pike: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current position with regard to the review of charity taxation policy; and if he will make a statement. [58543]

Ms Hewitt: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by the Financial Secretary to the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) on 26 October 1998, Official Report, column 46.

Landfill Tax (Salt Extraction Industry)

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce measures to reduce the impact of the landfill tax on the salt extraction industry; and if he will make a statement. [58581]

Ms Hewitt: The landfill tax applies to disposals of waste at sites that are subject to waste management licensing. The salt extraction industry currently pays the lower rate of landfill tax on the liquid waste that it deposits in salt cavities. It pays only on the solids content of the waste. Customs carried out a review of the tax, involving other Government Departments with waste policy interests, which reported in March 1998. The review considered the case for certain exemptions from the tax, including for salt extraction industry wastes, but concluded that no further exemptions should be granted. I understand that the industry has made representations that its waste disposal operations should be exempt from waste management licensing. The provision of exemptions is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions. I understand that his officials are examine the industry's case.

Tax Burden

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answers of 5 May 1998, Official Report, columns 331–34, on taxation, when he intends to publish an updated version of estimates of the tax burden. [58329]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the hon. Gentleman to table 2.8 of Inland Revenue Statistics 1998.

Withholding Tax

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to veto the EU proposal regarding the introduction of a 20 per cent. withholding tax on interest payments paid to non-UK resident recipients residing in the EU. [58792]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government are in favour of effective international action against tax evasion, and we are taking an active part in discussions on the draft

Directive. We will not agree to any course of action which would seriously damage the UK and other European financial markets.

Growth Forecast

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will set out the basis for revising the growth forecast for 2001–02; [58795]

(2) if he will set out the basis for revising upwards the growth forecast for 2000–01; [58794]

(3) if he will set out the basis for forecasting growth of 2½ per cent. in 2000. [58798]

Ms Hewitt: Full details of the Treasury's new forecasts were set out in the Pre-Budget Report, published on 3 November.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will assess the effect of his revised growth forecast on unemployment in 1999. [58796]

Ms Hewitt: The economy continues to expand and create new jobs. Employment has risen by 400,000 since the election and unemployment has fallen by 280,000. With regard to future employment prospects, the Government have been putting in place a wide range of measures to address structural problems in the labour market. The key is to ensure that people are well trained and able to adapt to the changing circumstances of a modern dynamic economy.

Resource Accounts

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the dry-run resource account for 1998–99 will be published. [58797]

Ms Hewitt: The Government's intention is to implement Resource Accounting and Budgeting fully from 2001–02. In advance of full implementation, departments are producing dry-run resource accounts over the next three years when, subject to Parliamentary approval, resource accounts will replace Appropriation Accounts.

For 1998–99, all departments will produce dry-run resource accounts which will be subject to a dry-run audit by the National Audit Office. There is no intention to publish these formally, although they may be made available to departmental Select Committees.

Subject to the result of the NAO dry-run audit, accounts directions will be issued to departments in respect of the financial year 1999–2000. Two further full sets of dry-run resource accounts will then be produced by all departments in respect of the financial years 1999–2000 and 2000–01. These dry-run accounts will be published, along with a report by the Controller and Auditor General, following audit by the NAO.

Petrol Smuggling

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide estimates of the cost to the Exchequer in lost revenue of petrol smuggling from the continent for the last year for which figures are available. [58519]

Ms Hewitt: HM Customs and Excise have no estimates for the revenue lost to the Exchequer through this activity.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of revenue was lost in (a) Northern Ireland, (b) Scotland and (c) North West Region through petrol smuggling in the last year for which figures are available. [58520]

Ms Hewitt: HM Customs and Excise have no estimates for the revenue lost to the Exchequer through such activity in these regions.

Imported Motor Vehicles

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost to the Exchequer in lost revenue from the parallel import of motor vehicles from Ireland to the UK in the last year for which figures are available. [58521]

Ms Hewitt: No figures on the revenue loss from the parallel import of motor vehicles from Ireland to the UK are available.

VAT (Hospitals)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the rules governing reclamation of VAT by hospitals. [58522]

Dawn Primarolo: The business activities of hospitals are governed by the same VAT rules as those for other organisations. Private care provided by all hospitals is exempt from VAT, which means that hospitals cannot recover any VAT associated with those supplies. However, when providing free health care, the funding NHS hospitals receive from the Department of Health takes account of VAT. In addition, when NHS Trusts contract out services to the private sector, the tax they incur can in most instances be reclaimed.

Income Tax

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if all lower rate and higher rate tax payers will receive the full value of his proposed 10 pence starting rate of tax. [58600]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government will introduce a 10 pence starting rate of income tax when it is economically right to do so. The new rate will be incorporated in the income tax system in the way that best meets the Government's objectives of improving work incentives and promoting a fair and efficient tax system.

Taxation (Estimates)

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in respect of which taxes Treasury ministers receive estimates from the Inland Revenue of monthly receipts. [58601]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 6 June 1997, Official Report, column 277.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the current rates of vehicle excise duty, or equivalent, for (i) a 1600cc engined car, (ii) a goods vehicle with a gross or train weight of between 3,500 and 7,500 kg, (iii) a three axle tractor unit with a two or more axle semi-trailer with a weight of 38,000 kg and (iv) a single-deck bus with capacity for 50 passengers in each of the countries of the EU. [58706]

Ms Hewitt: The current rates of UK Vehicle Excise Duty for the vehicles quoted are as follows:

(i) 1600cc car—£150 per annum.

(ii) A goods vehicle with a gross or train weight of between 3,500kgs and 7,500kgs pays £160 per annum.

(iii) A three axle tractor unit with a two or more axle semi-trailer with a weight of 38,000kgs pays £2,820 per annum.

(iv) A single deck bus with seating capacity for 50 passengers pays £320 per annum.

Vehicle Excise Duty in other member states is based on a variety of different factors such as types of fuel, power output, weight and noise. It is, thus, impossible to make direct comparisons across the EU member states.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he estimates the yield will be in 1998–99 from (i) vehicle excise duty, (ii) fuel duty on petrol and diesel and (iii) VAT on sales of petrol and diesel. [58704]

Ms Hewitt: Table B10 of the November 1998 Pre-Budget Report forecasts that the yield in 1998–99 from vehicle excise duty will be £4.7bn and the yield from fuel duty on petrol and diesel will be £21.8bn. These figures do not include VAT receipts, which are not disaggregated to sales of petrol and diesel.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what rules will govern the decision as to which employer delivers the working families tax credit where an employee works for more than one employer. [58978]

Dawn Primarolo: This is one of the issues currently under discussion between Inland Revenue officials and employer representatives and decisions will be announced in due course.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures were taken to prevent fraud from collusion between employers and employees in designing the working families tax credit. [58977]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government recognise that most employers carry out their obligations honestly and properly. Working Families Tax Credit will build on Family Credit, but it will be administered by the Inland Revenue. The Inland Revenue has considerable experience of checking the operation of PAYE. It will use its expertise to detect and prevent collusive fraud in Working Families Tax Credit.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect the operation of the working families tax credit will have on the cashflow of small businesses with low-paid employees. [58974]

Dawn Primarolo: Inland Revenue officials have been consulting employer representatives, including representatives of small businesses. The effect on cash flow is one of the issues they are examining.

Smaller businesses will benefit from the proposals that, while employer payments of WFTC will normally be set off against PAYE tax and NICs deducted, employers will be able to apply to the Inland Revenue for funding if they have insufficient PAYE tax and NICs out of which to pay the tax credit.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Civil Servants (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his private office, as at 1 October 1997; [56798]

(2) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his Department, by grade, as at 1 October 1997. [56796]

Mr. Morley: I refer my hon. Friend to the answers given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 5 November 1998, Official Report, columns 666–70.

Food Production

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent meetings he has had with the supermarket industry to discuss its influence on the food production policies of farmers; and if he will make a statement. [57304]

Mr. Rooker: Our right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food met representatives of the British Retail Consortium on 3 November. I was present, as was our noble Friend Lord Donoughue.

Meat Inspection Charges

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in which other EU countries meat inspection charges are levied on the industry; and at what rate. [57724]

Mr. Rooker: Council Directive 85/73/EEC (as amended) on the financing of veterinary inspections and controls requires Member States to recover the costs of those hygiene inspections conducted at licensed fresh meat premises in accordance with harmonised EC meat hygiene rules. The Directive sets minimum standard charges (in ECU) applicable in all Member States for hygiene inspections of red meat, poultry meat and game meat dependent on the species and size of animals being slaughtered. Subject to meeting specified criteria such as the efficiency of operations at individual plants, the Directive provides for the standard charge to be abated by up to 55 per cent. Conversely, where the actual cost of inspection exceeds the standard charge, the Directive provides for actual costs to be charged. Similar principles apply in respect of charges for cutting plants.

The actual level of hygiene inspection charges levied on individual meat plants is set by the competent authority in each Member State within the framework laid down by the Directive. Information about the level of such charges in other Member States is not yet available. I am seeking such information and will write to the hon. Member, although this may take some time.

Genetically Modified Food

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to require manufacturers to inform consumers when the content of food has been genetically modified. [57953]

Mr. Rooker: It is already a requirement of the EC Novel Foods and Novel Food Ingredients Regulation (258/97) and EC Regulation 1139/98 concerning the compulsory labelling of foodstuffs produced from genetically modified soya and maize that foods are clearly labelled to show when they contain genetically modified materials.

Maladministration Compensation

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will ensure that his Department's response to the instructions in the report of 28 August 1998 by the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration with regard to compensation for Mr. D. J. Kennard conforms to Government Accounting Standards 3/97 amendment 7, chapter 36.3. [57970]

Mr. Rooker: The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has already paid to Mr. and Mrs. D. J. Kennard the compensation recommended by the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration (in his report of 28 August 1998) relating to delays in the administration of the 1993 sheep quota national reserve. The payment was consistent with Treasury Guidance on financial redress.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his policy for compensating people whom the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration concludes have suffered an injustice as a result of maladministration by his Department. [57973]

Mr. Rooker: Where the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration concludes that an individual has suffered an injustice as a result of maladministration by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Ministry normally accepts and implements any recommendations for redress made by the Ombudsman, having regard to central financial guidance.

Horses (Strangles)

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what investigations his Department has carried out into the recent trend in the number of cases of strangles in UK-based horses; and if he will make strangles a notifiable disease. [57874]

Mr. Rooker: I am aware that the horse industry is concerned over the prevalence of strangles reported in horses in the UK and elsewhere. However, this is a matter for the industry which is best placed to control it, and Codes of Practice published by the Horserace Betting Levy Board already incorporate guidelines on strangles. I have no plans to make strangles a notifiable disease.

Honey Bees

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the danger to the native honey bee arising from imported honey bees; and if he will make it his policy to ban the importation of honey bees. [58221]

Mr. Rooker: Imports of honey bees are currently allowed from other Member States provided they are accompanied by a health certificate. Imports of Queen bees with attendant workers are also permitted from Australia, Fiji, Hawaii, and New Zealand under licence and with a health certificate.

I have no evidence that such legal importation of honey bees poses any threat and therefore have no grounds upon which to base a ban. Our technical advisers at the National Bee Unit are currently undertaking a risk assessment to help us determine whether we should also allow imports of bee packages from New Zealand. No decisions will be taken until we have that assessment.

Livestock Producers

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assistance his Department is currently giving to livestock producers; and if he will make a statement. [58274]

Mr. Rooker: Government action to assist livestock producers is constrained by the rules of the CAP. Nevertheless, we have successfully lobbied the Commission to grant Private Storage Aid in the UK in both the pigmeat and sheepmeat sectors. In addition, following representation from the UK and others, the Commission agreed on two occasions, most recently on 15 October, to increase payments of export refunds on pigmeat.

With regard to the beef sector, we have agreed with other Member States that advance payments under the 1998 Beef Special Premium and Suckler Cow Premium Schemes will be increased from 60 per cent. to 80 per cent. This means bringing forward some £100 million of payments to the industry which would otherwise not have been available until the spring of next year.

Chernobyl

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the estimated cost to his Department of the payment of grants to farmers who were unable to move cattle as a result of the radioactive fall-out from the Chernobyl accident. [58658]

Mr. Rooker: The only Food Protection Orders which came into force as a result of the Chernobyl accident concerned the movement, sale and slaughter of sheep. There were no Food Protection Orders on the movement of cattle. Therefore no payments of grants to cattle farmers were necessary.

Imported Meat

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans the Government have to enforce United Kingdom meat production standards on non-EU imported meat. [58568]

Mr. Rooker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply to my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Levitt) on 2 November 1998, Official Report, column 431.

Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what recommendations have been made to his Department by the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee following the finding of abnormal prion protein in the appendix of a patient in Torbay; what steps he has taken to implement the recommendations; and if he will make a statement; [57202]

(2) what meetings his Department has had, with which bodies, following the finding of abnormal prion protein in the appendix of a patient in Torbay; and if he will make a statement. [57128]

Mr. Rooker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health on 3 November 1998, Official Report, columns 532–36.

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what meetings his Department has had with representatives of (a) the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee and (b) the Central Veterinary Laboratory following the finding of abnormal prion protein in the appendix of a patient in Torbay; and if he will make a statement. [57201]

Mr. Rooker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health on 3 November 1998, Official Report, columns 532–36. A member of the staff of the Central Veterinary Laboratory is a technical adviser at SEAC meetings.

Beef Ban

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he estimates the European Union beef ban will be lifted. [56458]

Mr. Rooker: The European Commission's proposal for a Date-based Export Scheme (DBES) is currently being considered by the Standing Veterinary Committee. The DBES would permit the resumption of exports of deboned beef from UK cattle born after 1 August 1996. We wish the ban to be lifted as quickly as possible and hope the scheme will be adopted by the end of the year. The export of deboned beef from certified herds in Northern Ireland has been permitted since 1 June.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

New Parliamentary Building

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee if he will make a statement on the use of bronze in the New Parliamentary Building. [58782]

Sir Sydney Chapman: The initial brief for the building was set out in the Second Report from the Select Committee on House of Commons (Services), Session 1990–91 (HC551). The Committee recommended a building of "durable, high-quality materials which are in keeping with the area and will weather well".

In his subsequent report to the House, the architect, Sir Michael Hopkins, advised that the materials which had been selected were consistent with the requirements of a high-quality building with a minimum life span of 120 years. The major components of the building, including the main structural elements, would be designed to last for the life of the building.

Aluminium bronze was selected for the roof for both its durability and good structural properties. The use of bronze has been continued down the elevations as a facing for the duct panels and the frames to the windows.

The first of the fenestration and duct units will be installed before Christmas with work on the roof starting early in the New Year. Hon. Members will have then the opportunity to see the contribution the use of bronze has made to the high quality of the design of the building as well as to achieving the functional requirements.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Council if she has completed an audit of the state of readiness for millennium compliance in the public sector. [59268]

Mrs. Beckett: My right hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) first reported to the House on the progress that was being made by central government departments and agencies in achieving millennium compliance on 27 November 1997, Official Report, columns 1104–05. Arrangements were then put in place to monitor progress on a quarterly basis. Three subsequent statements on progress across central government have since been made. The results of the last review, which I published on 9 September, showed that good progress is being made by departments and agencies in tackling the millennium bug. Work on correcting priority, business-critical, systems is particularly well advanced.

The Government also reported on progress across the wider public sector in their statement in the House on 8 June 1998, Official Report, columns 716–18. More detailed information on key parts of the wider public sector was then made available in the September statement.

It is intended to issue the next statement on progress in tackling the bug shortly.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Public Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will publish the names of those people she has appointed to public bodies since 1 May 1997, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed, and whether they receive remuneration. [56762]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have placed in the Library a list of those individuals who have been appointed to public bodies in Northern Ireland in the period 6 December 1997 to 23 October 1998, with details of their position and whether they receive remuneration. Details for the period 1 May to 5 December 1997 were given in my answer of 15 December 1997, Official Report, column 40.

Assaults (Direct Action Against Drugs)

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many serious violent assaults in Northern Ireland since 11 April (a) have been admitted by and (b) are believed to have involved Direct Action Against Drugs. [58205]

Mr. Ingram: None.

Lone Parent Benefit

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for (a) lone parent benefit and (b) child benefit were made from (i) 1 April 1997 to 31 March 1998 and (ii) 1 April 1998 to 30 September 1998; of these how many have been approved; how many were refused; and how many await determination. [58666]

Mr. McFall: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Social Security Agency under its Chief Executive, Mr. Chris Thompson, and I have asked him to arrange for a response to be given.

Letter from Chris Thompson to Mr. Eddie McGrady, dated 10 November 1998:

I have been asked to reply to your Parliamentary Question about the number of applications for lone parent benefit and Child Benefit.

The number of claims for Child Benefit for the period 1 April 1997 to 31 March 1998 was 32,817 and for the period 1 April 1998 to 30 September 1998 was 15,744.

During the period 1 April 1997 to 30 September 1998 46,530 claims were approved and 366 claims were refused. At 30 September 1998 there were 1,665 awaiting determination.

There is no separate benefit for lone parents only a higher rate of Child Benefit. It is therefore not possible to give separate figures for lone parents.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for renewal books were made in respect of (a) child benefit and (b) lone parent benefits from (i) 1 April 1997 to 31 March 1998 and (ii) 1 April 1998 to 30 September 1998; how long it took on average to process such applications; and how many applications are still outstanding. [58665]

Mr. McFall: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Social Security Agency under its Chief Executive, Mr. Chris Thompson, and I have asked him to arrange for a response to be given.

Letter from Chris Thompson to Mr. Eddie McGrady, dated 10 November 1998:

I have been asked to reply to your Parliamentary Question about the number of applications for renewal order books for Child Benefit and lone parent benefit.

All renewal order books for Child Benefit are automatically issued to the customer so there is no need for an application to be made. Order books are normally issued to the post office 4 weeks before a customer's current order book is due to expire. Accordingly there is no information regarding the length of time it takes to process a renewal or how many renewals are outstanding.

The number of Child Benefit renewal order books issued for the period 1 April 1997 to 31 March 1998 was 387,636 and for the period 1 April 1998 to 30 September 1998 was 232,051.

There is no separate benefit for lone parents only a higher rate of Child Benefit. It is therefore not possible to give separate figures for lone parents.

You will know that Child Benefit Office has experienced some problems following the introduction of a new computer system. This has undoubtedly had some impact on the issue of renewal order books but no separate figures have been kept. I am pleased to say we are over the worst of our difficulty.

Paramilitary Attacks

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list for each week in October the number of (a) punishment beatings and (b) punishment shootings which took place in Northern Ireland indicating how many were in each category committed by (i) Loyalist and (ii) Republican groups. [59231]

Mr. Ingram: The number of paramilitary style attacks for each week in October is shown in the table:

	Paramilitary assaults		Paramilitary shootings
Period	Attributed to Loyalists	Attributed to Republicans	Attributed to Loyalists	Attributed to Republicans
1–4 October	3	0	0	0
5–11 October	2	2	0	0
12–18 October	2	0	0	0
19–25 October	1	0	0	1
26–31 October	0	2	0	0
Totals	8	4	0	1

Note:
These figures are subject to minor amendment in the light of further information becoming available. The figures refer to casualties as distinct from incidents.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list for the week ended Saturday 7 November the number of (a) punishment beatings and (b) punishment shootings which took place in Northern Ireland; and if she will indicate how many in each category were committed by (i) Loyalists and (ii) Republicans. [59244]

Mr. Ingram: The number of paramilitary style attacks during the period 1–7 November 1998 are shown in the table:

	Paramilitary assaults	Paramilitary shootings
Attributed to Loyalists	1	2
Attributed to Republicans	1	1

Note:
These figures are subject to minor amendment in the light of further information becoming available. The figures refer to casualties as distinct from incidents.

Autism

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will introduce a charter for persons with autism in line with the charter adopted at the fourth Autism European Congress in May 1992; and if she will make a statement. [57627]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary at the Office of Public Service on 3 November 1998, Official Report, columns 558–59.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Do-It-Yourself Shared Ownership Scheme

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many beneficiaries of the Do-It-Yourself Shared Ownership Scheme there were (a) in total and (b) newly approved in the last full year for which data are available for (i) the UK, (ii) London and (iii) the London Borough of Richmond. [58589]

Mr. Raynsford: My Department is responsible for housing matters in England and the following figures therefore refer to England rather than the UK as a whole.

(a) between its start in 1991–92 and 1997–98, the Do-It-Yourself Shared Ownership Scheme has assisted a total of 23,306 households in England; of which 5,659 were in London and 72 in the London Borough of Richmond.

(b) in 1997–98, a total of 2,238 households were assisted in England; of which 619 were in London and 10 in the London Borough of Richmond.

Heathrow Airport

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what risk assessment has been made of the simultaneous use of the Kew and St. Margaret's western approaches at Heathrow. [58501]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The KEW and St. Margaret's western approaches are used simultaneously only rarely when the scheduled demand of aircraft waiting to land at Heathrow exceeds the capacity of the designated landing runway. This procedure conforms with the International Civil Aviation Organisation's standard operating procedures and requires the maintenance of standard separation criteria between landing traffic. It does not, therefore, require special risk assessment.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action he is taking to ensure that no area is disproportionately affected by overflying aircraft landing at Heathrow. [58496]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Landing aircraft need to make their final approach aligned with the runway, which limits the scope for varying their final approach track. The Aircraft Noise Monitoring Advisory Committee (ANMAC), which advises the DETR on aircraft noise at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted, is currently investigating the feasibility of setting noise limits for arriving aircraft and other possible means of ameliorating arrivals noise. ANMAC has also established a working group which is looking at the causes of variability in the noise levels of landing aircraft.

In the second stage consultation paper on night restrictions at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted, to be issued shortly, we will be inviting views on various options for changes to the preferential use of Heathrow's runways at night.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment the Government have made of the safety impact of recent steps to reduce horizontal distances between planes on landing at Heathrow. [58494]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Safety concerns are paramount to both the Government and to our aviation safety advisers, the Safety Regulation Group (SRG) of the Civil Aviation Authority (CAA). SRG approved stringent procedures for using reduced horizontal spacing for arriving aircraft at Heathrow in January 1998 after exhaustive trials had confirmed that safety was in no way compromised. Reduced separation can be implemented only in daylight hours; for certain types of aircraft; when there is an arrivals backlog; and is subject to prevailing weather conditions. SRG will continue to monitor the use of these procedures to ensure that the safe operation of the airport is maintained.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will establish an independent monitoring body to measure aircraft noise at Heathrow. [58497]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We have no plans to do so. Aircraft noise is already measured satisfactorily by Heathrow Airport Limited to check compliance with the take-off noise limits set by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and to detect infringements. The integrated aircraft noise and track-keeping (NTK) system installed by BAA plc. in 1993 is used for this purpose. Data from the system are also used by the Department of Operational Research and Analysis of the CAA/NATS in producing the annual historical aircraft noise exposure contours published by the DETR, and for study purposes.

Aircraft noise around Heathrow is monitored by the Heathrow Airport Consultative Committee (HACC) and has been the subject of technical studies by DORA on behalf of the Aircraft Noise Monitoring Advisory Committee (ANMAC), which advises my Department. Both include representatives of local government, local interest groups and the aviation industry.

Bus Services

Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions under what statutory provisions traffic commissioners allow small public service vehicle operators to run unregistered bus services. [58724]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The bus services which have to be registered with the traffic commissioner are 'local services', as defined in section 2 of the Transport Act 1985. Broadly speaking, local services are those using public service vehicles for the carriage of passengers at separate fares, with stopping places less than fifteen miles apart, and which are not trips organised privately by persons acting independently of vehicle operators etc. (as set out in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Public Passenger Vehicles Act 1981), or services operated under a permit under section 19 of the Act. The requirement to register services is imposed by section 6 of the 1985 Act, which applies irrespective of the size of the public service vehicle concerned.

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will issue guidance to regional development agencies on their sustainable development role and responsibilities in respect to rural areas; [58729]

(2) if regional development agencies will be given guidance on their sustainable development obligations and responsibilities for rural areas before they prepare their regional strategies. [58659]

Mr. Meale: Yes. We published draft guidance to RDAs on their regional strategies on 20 October, and have invited comments by the end of November. Work is in progress on supplementary guidance to RDAs on how they should contribute to sustainable development and on rural policy, on which we will consult interested parties in due course. The aim is to finalise all these documents early in the New Year. RDAs will be fully operational from April 1999, and we envisage that they will produce their regional strategies by October 1999.

Teesside Development Corporation

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 3 November 1998, Official Report, columns 454–45, if he will list the companies which submitted bids for disposal of (a) computers, (b) CD-Roms, (c) office equipment and (d) boardroom furniture, indicating which bids were accepted for each of the above categories of equipment after the demise of Teesside Development Corporation. [58675]

Mr. Meale: I understand that a large number of firms were approached in connection with the disposal of TDC's furniture and equipment. Three expressed interest and two definite bids were subsequently received, the higher of which was accepted. For reasons of commercial confidentiality, the names of these firms cannot be divulged.

I further understand that, in subsequent negotiations, it was agreed that the bulk of TDC's computers would also be sold to this firm. The remainder of the computers and some other furniture were made available to the remaining staff of the Corporation for sums which exceeded the relevant "benchmark" figures submitted by an office equipment company.

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 3 November 1998, Official Report, column 454, if he will list those individuals who have kept a record of information which was previously stored on (a) CD-Roms or disks and (b) on paper after the demise of Teesside Development Corporation. [58779]

Mr. Meale: I understand that, upon its dissolution at the end of June 1998, the TDC bequeathed some 600 boxes of files to the Commission for the New Towns, as the residuary body. The CNT is currently working on cataloguing the information in these boxes before putting them away for long-term storage.

Houses in Multiple Occupation

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list by local authority the level of charges set for registration of houses in multiple occupation. [58583]

Mr. Raynsford: Local authorities are required to charge a reasonable fee which does not exceed the maximum specified by the Secretary of State. This maximum is £80 per property under a notification registration scheme, and £60 per habitable room under a registration scheme with control provisions. Information on the levels set by authorities who have introduced schemes is not held centrally.

Integrated Transport Policy

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on how his integrated transport policy will apply to rural areas. [58478]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The measures in the Government's White Paper will produce a transport system which increases choice for all—including those who live in rural areas. There are specific measures targeted at rural areas; the White Paper announced the creation of a new Rural Transport Partnership fund to help get extra resources into rural transport where it counts. In addition, the Chancellor announced on 17 March 1998, Official Report, column 1109, an additional £50 million a year to improve the public transport alternative in rural areas.

Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what acreage of land in England is registered as (a) areas of outstanding natural beauty and (b) sites of special scientific interest. [58814]

Mr. Meale: The total area of land in England within designated areas of outstanding natural beauty is 5,039,360 acres; sites of special scientific interest extend to 2,440,318 acres. About one third of the area of sites of special scientific interest is within areas of outstanding natural beauty.

Flood Damage (Shrewsbury)

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what resources he will make available to Shrewsbury to deal with recent flood damage. [59153]

Ms Armstrong: Local authorities affected by an emergency or disaster, such as severe flooding, can apply to my Department for special financial assistance under the Section 155 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 (the 'Bellwin scheme'). The scheme is intended to help local authorities deal with the immediate aftermath of such an event in their area or among their inhabitants. Grant is discretionary and is normally paid on qualifying expenditure at 85 per cent. above a threshold. The threshold is related to an authority's Standard Spending Assessment.

Supermarket Developments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what meetings he has held in the last six months with representatives from supermarkets. [58883]

Mr. Prescott: In the last six months, I have met representatives of many organisations, including supermarkets, who have interests in the subject areas for which I am responsible and the many consultation documents my Department has issued.

Connex South Central

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to meet the management of Connex South Central to discuss its performance and services. [59228]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Ministers will be meeting representatives from all of the train operating companies and Railtrack on November 26, to discuss future railways policy and in particular ways of improving poor performance generally.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 4 November 1998, Official Report, column 574, concerning rolling stock replacement, when he expects the Franchise Director to conclude his exploration of options with Connex South Central. [59227]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I understand that the position reached in the Franchising Director's exploratory discussions with Connex South Central is that the Company is now considering how it wishes to proceed. The Franchising Director will examine and respond to any further approach from the Company. There are no time limits on this process of dialogue.

Buses and Coaches (Speedometers)

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions under the public service vehicle regulations, how often the speedometers of (a) fare stage buses and (b) coaches must be recalibrated; and if he will make a statement. [58755]

Ms Glenda Jackson: There is no legal requirement for the speedometers in either fare stage buses or coaches to be recalibrated. The Road Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1986 require that speedometers must be maintained in a good working order. If the vehicle is fitted with a speedometer in accordance with either EC Directive 75/443EEC or UN ECE Regulation 39, then the accuracy requirements are that the speed indicated by the speedometer must never be less than the true speed at which the vehicle is travelling.

BEST Trustees

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if negotiations between the Government's lawyers and the BEST trustees have begun; what outstanding issues remain; and when he expects a final settlement to be reached. [59157]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Discussions with the lawyers for the National Bus Company pension trustees have begun. They were started immediately after the announcement by the Deputy Prime Minister on 30 September of the intention to achieve a just out-of-court settlement of the trustees' claim for return of the pension surplus paid over following NBC's privatisation.

High priority is being given to achieving as soon as possible a conclusion to these discussions which is satisfactory for all concerned.

Motor Coaches (Vehicle Condition Check-ups)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the number of motor coaches stopped by the police forces during the month of September for a vehicle condition check-up, how many (a) were found to have faults and (b) were refused permission to complete their journey, pending repairs to their vehicles; and if he will make a statement. [58298]

Mr. Boateng: I have been asked to reply.

Figures for the numbers of motor coaches stopped by police officers during September are not available centrally, but I can report the coach checks recorded by the Vehicle Inspectorate (VI) in that period. Police officers exercise their power to stop moving traffic to enable VI to examine vehicles during multi-agency checks, and the VI also examines coaches whilst they are parked to minimise traffic disruption. In the latter cases, police officers would not be involved.

Checks on coaches by Vehicle Inspectorate examiners during September 1998

	Number
Full roadside checks by VI examiners	1,328
Prohibition notices issued	164 (of which 76 had immediate effect, preventing coaches from continuing their journeys)

Checks on coaches by Vehicle Inspectorate examiners during September 1998

	Number
Roadside emissions checks by VI examiners	659
Prohibition notices issued	19 (of which one had immediate effect)

HOME DEPARTMENT

Firefighters

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to legalise the payment of compensation by fire authorities to firefighters who are permanently incapacitated or to dependants of firefighters killed on duty. [58590]

Mr. George Howarth: I have been asked by the National Joint Council for Local Authorities' Fire Brigades to give statutory authority for compensation payments, originally set out in the Council's Scheme of Conditions of Service for members of fire brigades. I am considering how this can be done.

Speed Cameras

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning the imposition of an administration fee in addition to the fine imposed upon drivers for exceeding the speed limit in cases detected by speed cameras. [58688]

Mr. Boateng: The Home Office has received representations from the Association of Chief Police Officers' Traffic Committee that an administrative charge should be added to fixed penalties for speeding offences detected by cameras. In addition, we have received a large volume of correspondence about increasing the funds for speed cameras by hypothecating the fine income from them.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans his Department has to introduce an administration fee payable by drivers who have been detected speeding by speed cameras in addition to any other penalty they may face. [58689]

Mr. Boateng: The Government are currently reviewing the funding arrangements for speed cameras to see what more might be done. The suggestion that an administrative charge be introduced is one of a number of options which are being considered.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy on the future licensing of the use of animals in skin corrosivity and phototoxicity tests, under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. [58667]

Mr. George Howarth: On receipt of the statement on the scientific validation of the 3T3 NRU PT test from the European Commission in November 1997, the Chief Inspector advised that in vivo tests of phototoxicity will no longer be authorised in research applications in the United Kingdom and will not be permissible in safety testing unless the regulatory requirement can be demonstrated. This advice was updated when validation of the alternative test was extended to UV filter chemicals in May 1998.

Similarly, the TER and EPISKIN in vitro skin corrosivity tests were substituted as soon as the statement of scientific validation was received in April 1998. In vivo skin corrosivity tests are now not authorised in relevant research work and will be permitted in regulatory safety testing only while regulators demand in vivo data. This advice was conveyed to Certificate holders in a newsletter on 29 June 1998.

The Home Office policy in actively taking up validated alternative tests was discussed when my noble Friend the Minister of State visited the European Centre for the Validation of Alternative Methods in May 1998.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the figures in Home Office Statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals in Great Britain, Table 2, column 2, include animals imported from sources outside the EU to United Kingdom suppliers and then sold to designated establishments. [58668]

Mr. George Howarth: Animals used in scientific procedures which are listed in Schedule 2 to the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 and must therefore be obtained from designated supplying establishments in the UK, are accounted for in column 2 of table 2. This is the case, even if the animals were obtained by those supplying establishments from other countries, either inside or outside the European Union.

"Election Expenses"

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what dates following the (a) 1979, (b) 1983, (c) 1987 and (d) 1992 General Elections the Home Office published "Election Expenses"; and when he expects the volume for the 1997 General Election to be published. [58539]

Mr. Straw: The Home Office, Scottish Office and the Northern Ireland Office published the Election Expenses volume following the last four Parliamentary general elections as follows:

1979: 11 February 1980

1983: 12 December 1983

1987: 20 April 1988

1992: 15 April 1993.

It is hoped to be able to publish the volume relating to the 1997 general election before the end of the year.

Video Evidence

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Government intend to implement the outstanding recommendations of the Pigot report. [58670]

Mr. Boateng: The majority of the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Video Evidence, chaired by Judge Pigot, were implemented in the Criminal Justice Act 1991. Those which have not been implemented were considered by interdepartmental Working Group on Vulnerable or Intimidated Witnesses, the establishment of which was announced on 13 June 1997 by my right hon. Friend. The Working Group's report "Speaking up for Justice" was published on 10 June this year by my right hon. Friend for the purpose of consultation, and included recommendations to implement the outstanding recommendations of the Pigot Report. The consultation exercise has now been completed and the Government are urgently considering the responses. We are determined to improve the treatment of vulnerable and intimidated witnesses, including children in the criminal justice system.

Young Offenders

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 2 November 1998, Official Report, column 385, concerning children in prison, how many children aged 15 years or under (a) are in young offenders' centres and (b) in adult prisons. [59251]

Mr. George Howarth: Provisional information shows that of the 203 persons aged 15 years in Prison Service establishments in England and Wales on 30 September 1998, 162 were held in accommodation dedicated to young offenders and 41 were held in other accommodation containing adults. Young persons held in adult prisons are normally accommodated separately from adults.

Former Secretary of State for Wales

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information was passed by Home Office (a) Ministers and (b) officials to the Prime Minister's Office prior to 11 a.m. on Tuesday, 27 October regarding the actions of the right hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies); and if he will make a statement. [59278]

Mr. Straw: When the Deputy Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, Mr. John Stevens, told me in a telephone call shortly after 10 a.m. on Tuesday, 27 October, that Mr. Davies had been involved in an incident, I passed that on in a telephone conversation to the Prime Minister's Chief of Staff, Mr. Jonathan Powell. By coincidence, Mr. Stevens then came to the Home Office on other business and looked in on me. During that meeting, Mr. Stevens also spoke on the telephone to Mr. Powell. I cannot properly disclose the contents of the conversations because of the risk of prejudicing any criminal proceedings. At that stage, the police had not taken a formal statement from Mr. Davies and we were talking only about the initial information which was available and lines of inquiry which were being followed by the police.

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what briefing was received by (a) him and (b) Home Office (i) Ministers and (ii) officials from the Metropolitan Police before 11.00 am on Tuesday, 27 October, regarding the actions of the right hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies); and if he will make a statement. [59279]

Mr. Straw: The first information provided to Ministers or officials at the Home Office was given by the Deputy Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, Mr. John Stevens, when he spoke to me on the telephone shortly after 10.00 am on Tuesday, 27 October. By coincidence, Mr. Stevens then came to the Home Office on other business and he looked in on me. The Permanent Secretary, Mr. David Omand, attended that meeting, which took place before 11.00 am.

Police Recruitment

Mr. Sheldon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the average costs of recruitment of policemen (a) in the Metropolitan area and (b) in the rest of England. [58838]

Kate Hoey: The Commissioner tells me that the current average cost of recruiting a police officer for the Metropolitan Police Service is estimated at £780.

Information about the cost of police recruitment for the rest of England is not collected centrally and could be obtained from each police force only at disproportionate cost.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 6 October to the Under-Secretary of State regarding the right of abode of a constituent. [59063]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I wrote to my hon. Friend on 9 November.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what representations he has made to the Secretary of State for Defence concerning the role of the TA in contingency planning scenarios for the millennium bug; [59161]

(2) what assessment he has made of the impact on emergency preparedness for the millennium bug (a) in the UK, (b) in Scotland and (c) north of Inverness of planned reductions in the Territorial Army. [59159]

(3) what representations he has received from the Secretary of State for Scotland concerning the role of the Territorial Army in responding to civil emergencies resulting from the impact of the millennium bug on electricity supply and telecommunications; and if he will make a statement; [59158]

(4) if his contingency planning scenarios for the millennium bug include a role for the TA infantry and TA engineers. [59160]

Mr. George Howarth: Procedures are already in place for the provision of military aid to the civil authority and these arrangements are under regular review in the run up to the Millennium date change. The deployment of the Territorial Army in response to requests for aid is an operational matter for consideration within the Ministry of Defence.

Adoption

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will establish a national register of couples wishing to adopt. [58248]

Mr. Hutton: I have been asked to reply.

We have no plans to introduce a national register of couples wishing to adopt. However, the recent Government initiative 'Quality Protects', and publication in August of the Local Authority Circular 'Adoption—Achieving the Right Balance' set out the Government's commitment to improving services for children, including adoption. Local authorities must be pro-active in avoiding undue delay in placing children for adoption and in recruiting prospective adopters able to meet the needs of children needing new and permanent families. We will monitor closely progress by local authorities on the placement of children for adoption.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Sports Facilities

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many local authorities with responsibility for provision of leisure facilities have a strategic sports facilities plan; and if he will make a statement. [57892]

Mr. Banks: The English Sports Council (ESC) advises me that some 170 local authorities have such strategies currently in place, with around a further 70 in draft form.

Government and the English Sports Council (ESC) see such strategies as an important element of delivering sport at the local level. They should set the context not only for the provision of new facilities, but also for sports development and the protection of playing fields. To help assist local authorities assess their facility needs in preparing their strategies, the ESC has developed a Facilities Planning Model, and this service will be available in the Spring.

We are seeking to raise the importance of these strategies through a number of channels. Planning Policy Guidance for Sport and Recreation (PPG17) advises planning authorities which sport and recreation matters should be included within Development plans. Planning authorities are advised to consider sport and recreation strategies when they prepare those plans. This PPG is currently being updated with a revised draft for consultation around the turn of the year. In addition, as well as tying this work with the production of its Lottery Strategy, the ESC will be producing revised guidance on preparing local sport and recreation strategies early in the New Year.

Digital Terrestrial Television

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) if he will ensure that the proceeds from auctions of analogue spectrum are used to assist all consumers and communities in the United Kingdom to receive the same quality of digital television service; [58502]

(2) when the switch-off date will be for analogue transmissions; [58503]

(3) if he will provide financial support to households that currently receive analogue terrestrial television, but which cannot receive digital terrestrial television to enable them to receive the digital television service via (a) digital satellite television and (b) otherwise. [58684]

Janet Anderson: We have not set a date for the switch-off of analogue terrestrial transmissions or yet taken a view on whether any spectrum so released should be auctioned and whether any direct Government measures should be taken to assist the migration from analogue to digital reception. These issues and others were raised in our consultation paper "Television: the Digital Future". We are currently considering the responses to that consultation exercise and an announcement on next steps will be made in due course.

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what estimate he has made of the number of households which will need to purchase new antennae in order to receive digital terrestrial television; [58720]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of households in the United Kingdom which will not be directly served by digital terrestrial television; [58733]

(3) what steps the Government intend to take to ensure that the digital terrestrial television network provides the same level of coverage as the existing analogue network; [58725]

(4) how many residents in the Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber constituency will not be directly served by digital terrestrial television; [58722]

(5) which regions will experience difficulties in being directly served by digital terrestrial television. [58723]

Janet Anderson: The launch phase of digital terrestrial television has been jointly planned by the BBC and Independent Television Commission so that the 81 transmitters used will reach around 90% of the UK population by the end of 1999 though the coverage of all six multiplexes will vary and in some cases be less. Extending digital services beyond the reach of the first 81 digital terrestrial transmitters was one of the issues raised in our consultation paper "Television: the Digital Future" the responses to which are currently being considered.

The Independent Television Commission published estimates of digital terrestrial television coverage by existing aerials in their Invitation to Apply for Multiplex Service Licences. For the first multiplex carrying the BBC's services, the ITC estimated that 81–87% of the UK population should be able to receive the service with their existing aerials.

I understand that digital terrestrial transmissions from the Rosemarkie transmitter are expected to cover the Inverness region. The BBC and ITC have jointly produced a CD-Rom containing coverage predictions for each multiplex for each transmitter site. Copies of the CD-Rom have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

"Modernising Local Government"

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions have been held between his officials and the Local Government Association about the implications for (a) the performing arts, (b) the visual arts, (c) museums and galleries and (d) libraries of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions' White Paper "Modernising Local Government". [58861]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 9 November 1998]: Discussions with the Local Government Association about the development of cultural strategies have included discussions on the implications of the White Paper.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions regarding the White Paper "Modernising Local Government". [58964]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 9 November 1998]: The subject has been discussed in correspondence and at the Central Local Partnership meeting I attended in July. Officials of both Departments are discussing how best to take forward the White Paper proposals in areas where I have an interest.

Internet Publishing

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make it his policy to require all task forces and equivalent bodies sponsored by his Department to publish their working papers and minutes on the Internet. [58768]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 9 November 1998]: My Department encourages greater openness of the public bodies it sponsors, wherever practical and appropriate. My Department supports the proposals in "Quangos: Opening The Doors" which recommends that public bodies be encouraged to follow best practice in producing and distributing information on their role and achievement on the Internet. The extent to which the records of any specific task force or equivalent body are published or placed on the Internet will depend upon the individual circumstances and specific tasks undertaken. However, the presumption will be that the final report or recommendations will be made public unless there are good reasons to the contrary.

World Heritage Sites

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when the Government will announce their list of prospective world heritage sites to be put forward by the UK to UNESCO for consideration. [59019]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Together with Ministerial colleagues in the other interested Departments, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I will need carefully to consider the results of the current consultation exercise before reaching a final decision on the list; but I hope that an announcement can be made within the next two or three months.

Youth Music Trust

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimates he has made of the costs of establishing the Youth Music Trust. [59234]

Mr. Chris Smith: There are various costs associated with the establishment of the Youth Music Trust, including administrative support and the cost of expert advice on the development of the Trust's underpinning policy and structure. My Department is supporting the work to establish the Trust, both financially, and in kind.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

British Council (Director-General)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the resignation of the Director-General of the British Council and place a copy of his resignation letter in the Library. [59274]

Mr. Fatchett: Dr. David Drewry resigned from his post as Director-General of the British Council having successfully completed a review of the Council's purpose and strategy. I understand that he saw this as an opportune time to return to his interest in academia. There is no letter of resignation: Dr. Drewry communicated his intention to resign orally in a private meeting with the Chair of the British Council, Baroness Helena Kennedy.

East Timor

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last made representations to Indonesia about East Timor. [59283]

Mr. Fatchett: I visited Jakarta on 8 October and met President Habibie and members of his Cabinet. I reinforced our commitment to the United Nation's efforts to seek a just, comprehensive and internationally acceptable solution to the East Timor issue.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to (a) Indonesia and (b) Australia following the decision of the International Commission of Jurists that five Australian journalists were killed by the Indonesian Government at the time of the invasion of East Timor. [59282]

Mr. Fatchett: I raised the issue of the deaths of two British born journalists in Balibo in 1975 with President Habibie in Jakarta last month. He undertook to look into the matter. We are aware of reports in Australia of new information on the incident and welcome the Australian government's decision to refer this to Mr. Tom Sherman for his consideration.

Child Abuse

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is intending to take to reduce the incidence of child abuse in the Third World by western tourists. [59281]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The UK has adopted tough legislation to strengthen action against those who organise or participate in the sexual exploitation of children overseas. There are also extensive arrangements in place for assisting other countries in the investigation and prosecution of offences involving the sexual exploitation and trafficking of children, as well as for responding to extradition requests.

Following a joint UK-Philippines initiative at the Asia-Europe Summit (ASEM), the UK hosted a conference on Child Welfare in London in October, involving government and non-government representatives from the 25 ASEM countries. The meeting focused on practical cooperation to tackle the commercial sexual exploitation of children.

Pakistan

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to review the UK's policy on sanctions against Pakistan. [59277]

Mr. Fatchett: The measures which the UK and the international community took in response to nuclear tests by Pakistan and India are kept under constant review. We regularly consult our partners on the two countries' progress on nuclear non-proliferation and regional security, most recently at a meeting of the Task Force of Senior Officials held in London on 30 October.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effect of the imposition of sanctions on Pakistan by the USA on the prospects of Pakistan signing the Non-Proliferation Agreement. [59280]

Mr. Fatchett: We welcome the progress made by Pakistan on regional security and nuclear non-proliferation since its nuclear tests at the end of May, namely Pakistan's stated intention to sign the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, its participation in negotiations on the Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty and the resumption of talks with India. We attach importance to further progress, in particular the unconditional signature and ratification of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty.

Counter-drug Agreement

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 23 July 1998, Official Report, columns 692–93, when he will place in the Library a copy of the agreement by the United Kingdom and United States concerning maritime and aerial operations in the Caribbean, signed in Washington on 13 July, together with the explanatory memorandum. [59042]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We expect to place a copy of the agreement by the United Kingdom and United States concerning maritime and aerial operations in the Caribbean in the Library of the House by the end of the year.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Teachers' Pay

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the number and percentage of classroom teachers in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools who are paid on each point of the pay spine. [57699]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The numbers and percentages of full-time classroom teachers in England and Wales at 31 March 1997[1] in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools, on each point of the pay spine, are given in the table.

Mr. Charles Clarke: The following tables give information on:

(a) the number of applications to primary initial teacher training (ITT) courses, separately for undergraduate and postgraduate, for the years 1992 to 1998;

(b) the number of students entering primary ITT courses, separately for undergraduate and postgraduate, for the years 1992 to 1997; information for 1998 is not yet available;

(c) the information requested on the number of primary ITT students beginning courses each year who subsequently fail to complete the course is not available centrally.

New Deal (Construction)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many places have been filled on the New Deal for Construction programme for the latest available date. [57556]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 2 November 1998]: A total figure for New Deal clients moving into jobs in construction is not yet available, because an analysis of those starting unsubsidised jobs by industrial sector is not yet available; however, the number who had started subsidised jobs in construction was, by the end of August 1998, 750.

The construction industry has a relatively good vacancy to placing ratio, which suggests that young people are finding construction jobs attractive and have the skills and qualities required by the industry.

We are grateful for the positive contribution the construction industry is making to the New Deal.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what target the Government have announced for the number of places to be taken up on the New Deal for Construction programme from the date of its launch to 31 December. [57557]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 2 November 1998]: The Government have announced no target but, when the Construction Industry New Deal framework was launched in February 1998, the industry expected to offer opportunities to around 3,000 young people each year.

New Junior Schools

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many new junior schools, in which local authority areas, have been (a) started and (b) completed in each of the last five years. [58285]

Ms Estelle Morris: No statutory proposals to establish new junior schools have been approved in the last three years. Accurate information for earlier years is not available.

Full-time Students

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many 11 to 18 year olds were in full-time state education in (a) 1998 or the latest available date, (b) 1988, (c) 1978 and (d) 1968. [58346]

Ms Estelle Morris: The number of full-time 11 to 18 year old pupils in maintained schools is shown in the table.

School Budgets

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was (a) the lowest and (b) the highest sum of money allocated per state (i) primary and (ii) other school pupil in full-time education in 1997–98. [58290]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following table sets out the education standard spending assessment per primary pupil and per secondary pupil for all local education authorities in England for 1997–98. The lowest sum of money allocated per primary pupil and per secondary pupil was £1,902 and £2,466 respectively, and the highest sum of money allocated per primary pupil and per secondary pupil was £3,576 and £7,247 respectively.

Todmorden Road Primary School

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what action he proposes to take on the leaking of the draft OFSTED report regarding Todmorden Road County Primary School, Burnley; and if he will make a statement. [58541]

Ms Estelle Morris: Arrangements for confidential oral feedback of OFSTED findings are set out in the Framework for School Inspection. I deplore any case in which formal publication arrangements are pre-empted by a breach of confidentiality, but this is not a matter in which the Department can intervene and I am not in a position to make any judgment on the case referred to.

Todmorden County Primary School is failing to provide an acceptable standard of education and requires special measures. The school and Lancashire LEA must now produce urgent plans to resolve the key issues identified in the OFSTED report so that it can be removed from special measures within 2 years.

New Secondary Schools

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many new secondary schools have been (a) started and (b) completed in each of the last five years; and in which council areas the schools are located. [58800]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following table shows the number of proposals approved and implemented in each Local Education Authority to establish new maintained secondary schools in each of the last three years. The list includes proposals which have been determined by the Local Education Authority and proposals by independent schools to join the maintained sector. A number of proposals have been decided but not yet implemented. Accurate information for earlier years is not available.

Education Funding (Wandsworth)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of his Department's funding for education for the year 1997–98 has been allocated to the London Borough of Wandsworth. [58826]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Department's funding for education in Wandsworth in 1997–98 consisted of some £91.7 million through the education SSA system, £1.5 million through grant for education support and training, £0.1 million for capital expenditure, and £0.1 million for the New Deal for Schools. These allocations represent 0.5 per cent. of the Department's total funding for education.

Special Educational Needs

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list for each local education authority the percentage of children in that local authority with statements of special educational needs. [58989]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 9 November 1998]: The latest available data are drawn from schools' Annual Census returns to the Department and relate to January 1998. The table indicates, for each local education authority as at January 1998, the proportion of pupils attending schools in the authority's area who had statements expressed as a percentage of the total number of pupils in such schools.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 29 October 1998, Official Report, columns 233–34, if the research project to assess the relative costs, benefits and practical implications of educating children with moderate learning difficulties in mainstream and special schools covers children assessed as having emotional, behavioural and psychiatric problems. [58992]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 9 November 1998]: The research project recognises and allows for the fact that pupils with moderate learning difficulties may also have other special educational needs. The project, which is small-scale, does not cover those with emotional and behavioural or other difficulties who do not have moderate learning difficulties.

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent representations he has received on special educational needs. [59291]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We received over 3,600 responses to consultation on the Green Paper, Excellence for all children: meeting special educational needs. In the light of these, and the advice of the National Advisory Group on Special Educational Needs (SEN), we published Meeting Special Educational Needs: A programme of action, earlier this month. This sets out the practical steps we will take to support and promote developments in SEN over the next few years.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidelines his Department has issued on staffing levels at special needs schools for children with (a) severe and (b) moderate learning difficulties. [59258]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Department issued guidance on staffing for pupils with special educational needs in 1990, in Circular 11/90. The Circular outlines the factors which Local Education Authorities and schools ought to consider in determining staffing levels, and is not intended to be prescriptive. Local Education Authorities and schools are best placed to determine their staffing needs in the light of local circumstances.

LEAs (Project Funding)

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the funds which have been made available to (a) local education authorities and (b) schools for projects as part of the £19 billion extra spending on education as announced in the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 14 July 1998, Official Report, columns 187–211. [58988]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 9 November 1998]: England's share of the additional £19 billion for education over the next three years is £16 billion. Increases in Education Standard Spending Assessments account for £7.135 billion of this. Local education authorities and schools will also benefit from substantial other additional resources, including an additional £1.5 billion for schools capital and a big increase in the Standards Fund. A number of areas are still to be finalised, and full details will be published in the Department's Annual Report in the spring.

Veterinary Science and Medicine Primary Degrees

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what were the typical offers of A-level grades required for students wishing to pursue primary degrees in (a) veterinary science and (b) medicine in universities, broken down by university, for each of the last five academic years. [59294]

Mr. Mudie: The expected A-level grades required for entry to first degree courses in veterinary science and medicine are set out in the Universities and Colleges Entrance Guide published by the Universities and Colleges Admission Service (UCAS). Copies of the latest edition (covering 1999 entry) and those for the previous four years are available in the Library.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what were the examination failure rates for undergraduate students in universities pursuing primary degrees in (a) veterinary science and (b) medicine, broken down by (i) university and (ii) year of study for each of the last five academic years. [59296]

Mr. Mudie: Information on first degree examination failure rates by individual course and university or year of study is not compiled centrally.

Work is currently being undertaken by the funding bodies in the UK to produce progression statistics for each institution. After a period of consultation with individual institutions, this is intended to lead to the publication next year of progression rates which will reflect the numbers of students who do not complete courses, which will include those who do so as a result of examination failure.

Access to Work

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to the answer of 3 November 1998, Official Report, column 404, concerning access to work, what assessment he made of the implications of creating full-time councillors in drawing up the proposals for directly elected mayors and cabinets contained in the White Paper, In Touch with the People. [59229]

Ms Hodge: Access to Work provides help for disabled people who are in, or about to start, paid employment. Help can be provided for people who are employed or self-employed, full or part-time, permanent or temporary. Councillors do not come within the scope of the programme because their activities are not regarded as their main paid employment. If this situation changes, and the activities of councillors become their main paid employment, then they may be eligible for Access to Work support.

Unemployment

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish a table showing the levels of unemployment in each of the areas currently designated as (a) development areas and (b) intermediate areas under the provisions for regional selective assistance. [58718]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Dafydd Wigley, dated 10 November 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent question on unemployment.

The information you have requested can only be derived from the monthly claimant count of people claiming unemployment-related benefits (i.e. Jobseeker's Allowance or National Insurance credits). Essentially, all people who were claiming these benefits on the count day are counted.

The number of people claiming unemployment-related benefits in each of the areas currently designated as (a) development areas and (b) intermediate areas under the provisions for regional selective assistance can be obtained from the Nomis database which can be accessed by the House of Commons Library.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Uganda

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress has been made in relieving the debts of Uganda owed to OECD countries. [57903]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

On 24 April this year, Uganda became the first country to reach its completion point under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) debt initiative. This last tranche of multilateral debt relief resulted in a further debt reduction of $347 million in NPV terms (approximately equivalent to $650 million in nominal terms), on top of previous concessional reschedulings and aid loan write offs.

Civil Servants (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development (1) if she will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in her private office, as at 1 October 1997; [56807]

(2) if she will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in her Department, by grade, as at 1 October 1997. [56805]

Clare Short: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 5 November 1998, Official Report, columns 666–70.

Central America (Hurricane Mitch)

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps her Department is taking to provide aid to Nicaragua, and other Central American countries devastated by Hurricane Mitch. [59142]

Clare Short: We are responding to the immediate relief needs of the region as part of the international relief effort. This includes a contribution of £200,000 to the Red Cross Regional Appeal, approximately £60,000 to the Pan American Health Organisation for basic health care needs, £94,525 to CAFOD for food and household items and £100,000 to Christian Aid to supply medicines, temporary shelters, blankets and water containers for Honduras. In Nicaragua, we have channelled £32,585 through the non-governmental organisation CARE for the provision of safe water, food and clothes. We are also sending medical supplies to El Salvador to meet the needs of 20,000 people for 3 months. In addition, HMS Sheffield provided immediate disaster assistance to Honduras, and RFA Sir Tristram and HMS Ocean are providing further support. We have also provided a UK expert to the United Nations Assessment and Co-ordination teams working in the region.

We have recently agreed an enlarged development programme for Central America and committed £6 million. We are currently refocusing the programme to take account of reconstruction needs.

Nicaragua and Honduras are both Heavily Indebted Poor Countries, as defined by the World Bank and IMF. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and I have called on the IMF and World Bank to look urgently at the case for special treatment in the matter of debt for countries afflicted by natural disasters which severely damage their economies. We are urging the international community to consider what exceptional debt relief measures might be appropriate in the short term for these countries.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what aid the UK Government are providing to victims of Hurricane Mitch; and if she will make a statement. [59255]

Clare Short: Since May 1997 my Department has been working to strengthen the capacity of the international system to respond very quickly to emergencies wherever they arise. In the past, uncoordinated shipments of aid and expertise often exacerbated rather than assisted such crises. The first step following Hurricane Mitch was that UN disaster assessment teams were mobilised. A British expert was made available. HMS Sheffield was in the vicinity and was helping in Belize and at the request of the local authorities was able to make available helicopters, engineers and medical support. DFID immediately contacted NGOs who were already working in the countries concerned to offer support. We have made available £200,000 to the Red Cross Regional Appeal and supplies were flown on Sunday.

In Honduras, we have contributed £60,000 to the Pan American Health organisation for basic health care needs, £94,525 to CAFOD for food and household items and a grant of £100,000 to Christian Aid to supply medicines, temporary shelters, blankets and water containers. In Nicaragua, we have channelled £32,585 through the NGO CARE for the provision of safe water, food and clothes. We are also sending medical supplies to El Salvador to meet the needs of 20,000 for three months. HMS Ocean and RFA Sir Tristram are also in the area and, at local request, are providing search and rescue and reconnaissance service.

We have recently agreed an enlarged development programme for Central America and committed £6 million. We are currently refocusing the programme to take account of reconstruction needs.

We must ensure that the reconstruction effort focuses on reducing vulnerability, for example by flood protection and through the appropriate location of new housing. It will also be necessary to strengthen local and regional capacity to respond more effectively when disaster strikes. We have recently agreed a major programme with the International Red Cross to strengthen such capacity in all developing countries.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what aid has been requested by the Nicaraguan Government from the UK to help the victims of Hurricane Mitch. [59256]

Clare Short: The Nicaraguan Government have requested international assistance to provide food, medicines, tents and construction materials to cope with the aftermath of the disaster. Our contributions so far have been channelled through the Red Cross and the non-governmental organisation CARE.

We continue to monitor the situation in Nicaragua closely through the United Nations, the Red Cross and our Embassy and we are in close contact with British non-governmental organisations about support to their relief activities. Beyond the immediate response to the emergency, we are considering how we can best use our recently enlarged assistance programme to help with reconstruction.

Nicaragua, is a heavily Indebted Poor Country, as defined by the World Bank and IMF. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and I have called on the IMF and World Bank to look closely, as part of the work they already have in hand on post-conflict debt relief, at the case for special treatment in the matter of debt for countries afflicted by natural disasters which severely damage their economies. We are urging the international community to consider what exceptional debt relief measures might be appropriate in the short term for these countries.

UNESCO

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development (1) if she will make a statement on the UK National Commission for UNESCO; [59252]

(2) if she will make a statement on the process for appointing members of the UK National Commission for UNESCO. [59253]

Clare Short: The structure and funding of a UK Commission for UNESCO, including the process for appointing members, are currently under discussion. It is my intention that the Commission be effective and economical. I hope that an announcement on the establishment of the Commission will be made shortly.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the costs of the UK's membership of UNESCO in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99. [59254]

Clare Short: The identifiable costs of the UK's membership of UNESCO were £16,185,671 in 1997–98, and are projected to be £11,304,718 in 1998–99.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Civil Servants (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his Department, by grade, as at 1 October 1997; [56817]

(2) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his private office, as at 1 October 1997. [56819]

Dr. Howells: I refer my hon. Friend to the replies given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 5 November 1998, Official Report, columns 666–70.

Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many contracts are under investigation by his Department under the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1994. [57530]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 2 November 1998]: None. My Department has no powers to investigate complaints under the Regulations.

[3] This is an increase from 80 MWe to 92 MWe of an existing combined heat and power station. The increase will be fuelled by bio-fuel.

EC Directives

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the EC Directives due to come before Parliament in the session commencing November 1998 which will be the responsibility of his Department. [58530]

Mr. Mandelson: Scrutiny by Parliament of European legislation is a continuing process involving deposit in Parliament of documents which fall within the terms of reference of the scrutiny committees of both Houses of Parliament. These include formal legislative documents such as proposals for Directives, Regulations and Decisions.

The Commission's work programmes, which are deposited in the House, outline areas in which it will seek to legislate and give an indication of the Directives which may come before the Scrutiny Committees in the next session.

PRIME MINISTER

Life Peers

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will set out the procedures for and list the committees, and their membership, involved in selecting candidates to be proposed for appointment as life peers; and what changes to these arrangements he proposes to make following the abolition of hereditary peers' rights to vote. [58681]

The Prime Minister: Under this and the previous administration, there has been no formal committee structure in the selection of candidates for appointment as life peers. We will announce our proposals for changes in the way life peers are appointed in due course.

Anglo-Irish Secretariat

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister how many persons are presently working in the Anglo-Irish Secretariat at Maryfield; on what date Maryfield will be closed; and if he will make a statement. [59287]

The Prime Minister: The British and Irish sides of the Secretariat comprise 26 full and part-time British and Irish civil servants.

The offices of the Secretariat at Maryfield will close by the end of the year.

Public Bodies

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Prime Minister how many non-departmental public bodies have been (a) established and (b) abolished since 1 May 1997. [59208]

The Prime Minister: Since 1 May 1997, the Government have abolished 44 non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) and have established 30, including bodies such as the Low Pay Commission, the Disability Rights Task Force and the New Deal Task Force which will help the Government fulfil their Manifesto commitments. The Government have also announced plans to abolish a further 37 NDPBS and Ministers are continuing to examine all the NDPBs they sponsor with a view to identifying further candidates for abolition.

Surveillance Commissioners

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make an announcement about arrangements to appoint the Surveillance Commissioners under Part III of the Police Act 1997. [59445]

The Prime Minister: I appointed Sir Andrew Leggatt as the Chief Surveillance Commissioner in July. In accordance with section 91 of the Police Act 1997, I have, in addition, appointed six Surveillance Commissioners for a period of three years. There will be three Commissioners for England and Wales, two for Scotland and one for Northern Ireland. However, the remit of each Commissioner will cover the whole of the United Kingdom so that any Commissioner will be able to act in jurisdictions other than his own.

The Commissioners, who must hold or have held high judicial office, are:

For England and Wales

Sir Christopher Staughton—retired as a Lord Justice of Appeal in December 1997.

Sir Michael Hutchison—a Lord Justice of Appeal who will be retiring in January 1999.

Sir Charles McCullough—retired in January 1998 as the senior judge of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court.

For Scotland

Lord Davidson—retired in 1996 as a Senator of the College of Justice in Scotland.

Lord Bonomy—a Senator of the College of Justice in Scotland since 1997.

For Northern Ireland

Sir John MacDermott—retired in August 1998 as the senior Lord Justice of Appeal in Northern Ireland.

The Commissioners are the first to be appointed under the provisions of Part III of the Police Act 1997. Since the authorisation of intrusive surveillance operations forms a key component of the Government's response to serious and organised crime, I attach considerable importance to the early implementation of these provisions, and I am delighted that the Commissioners have accepted their appointments. In conjunction with Sir Andrew Leggatt, their substantial judicial experience, particularly of the criminal justice system, will provide independent oversight of surveillance operations, which although operationally important, must also be subject to stringent safeguards.

In the more sensitive categories of intrusive surveillance, application will be made to a Commissioner for prior approval of authorisations and renewals given by chief officers of police, the National Crime Squad, the National Criminal Intelligence Service and HM Customs and Excise. The Commissioners will also be responsible for scrutinising notifications and renewals of all other surveillance operations, together with cancellations, and for investigating complaints that authorisations have been improperly given.

The Commissioners will have the power to quash or cancel authorisations where there are no reasonable grounds for believing that they meet the criteria set out in Part III of the Police Act 1997. They may also order the destruction of records (other than those required for pending criminal or civil proceedings) and the payment of compensation where a complaint is upheld. The decisions of the Commissioners will be subject to appeal to the Chief Commissioner, but are not liable to be questioned in court.

Sudan

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 19 October 1998, Official Report, column 915, what advice he received on the production of EMPTA as a bi-product of tests on insecticides and pesticides for use in Africa. [57344]

The Prime Minister: On the basis of information available to them the Americans advised that there are no known commercial reasons to produce EMPTA nor are CBD Porton Down aware of any commercial uses for EMPTA.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if he has been notified of the exact circumstances surrounding the finding of EMPTA at the El Shifa plant; and in what quantities they were found; [57345]

(2) what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken to verify the information from the United States concerning the strike against the El Shifa factory; [57346]

(3) pursuant to his answer of 19 October 1998, Official Report, column 915, what assessment he has made of the possibility that the EMPTA alleged to have been found in soil samples close to the pharmaceutical factory in the Sudan could have been the hydrolysis product of an insecticide or germicide chemical for (a) military and (b) commercial test purposes; [57347]

(4) what (a) independent scientific organisations and (b) United Kingdom universities have been invited to assess whether the American claims about the Sudanese factories are true. [57348]

The Prime Minister: It is established practice under Section 1(c) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information not to disclose information received in confidence from foreign Governments.

Economic Forecasts

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer of 4 November 1998, Official Report, column 870, if he will list the forecasts which indicate that there will be a pick-up in growth after next year. [59293]

The Prime Minister: Full details of independent forecasts for the medium-term were published in "Forecasts for the UK Economy" by HM Treasury on 19 August.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Members of Parliament (Criminal Offences)

Mr. Forth: To ask the Attorney-General what contact he or his Department have had with (a) the Crown

Prosecution Service and (b) the Metropolitan Police following recent allegations of criminal offences involving a Member of Parliament. [58850]

The Attorney-General: It is the practice that I am informed (but not usually consulted about) any case involving a Member of Parliament under consideration by the Crown Prosecution Service. I have not been informed of any such case in the recent past but on two occasions the Crown Prosecution Service raised with my officials concerns about the possible impact of publicity on a criminal case. It is my policy not to give details of discussions about individual cases.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Beef

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the (a) tonnage and (b) value of British beef sold in the United Kingdom during September; and if he will make a statement. [57438]

Mr. Rooker: This information is not held centrally. However, the market research company Audits of Great Britain conducts a monthly survey of household consumption on behalf of the Meat and Livestock Commission (MLC). The latest figures, for the four week period up to 20 September 1998, show that 16,988 tonnes of beef were consumed in this period and expenditure on this beef was £76.5 million. It should be noted that these figures include imported beef but exclude beef consumed in NI, beef used in processing and beef used in the catering sector. Separate information from the MLC suggests that, for the first half of 1998, 79 per cent. of all beef consumed in the UK was home produced, up 7 percentage points on the same period last year.

Fish Quotas

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the policy of the fisheries regulating authority of the Commission of the European Community in respect of (a) off-quota catches by line fishermen in the territorial waters of the United Kingdom and (b) fisheries within territorial limits of a member state shown to be self sustainable. [57483]

Mr. Morley: All landings of fish of stocks subject to quotas count against Member States' quotas whether or not the fish are caught within territorial waters and regardless of the means used to catch the fish. Such restrictions do not apply to stocks of fish and shellfish for which quotas are not set.

Member States are able to apply additional national conservation rules to their own fisherman. Many such rules are applied by Sea Fisheries Committees within the 6 mile limits around the coasts of England and Wales.

Battery Cages

Mr. Todd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the policy his Department will adopt on the European Commission proposals on battery cages; and how he will ensure that third country imports comply with EU regulations. [57746]

Mr. Morley: Our policy is to negotiate for an early phase out of the battery cage, improved standards in the interim and appropriate EU wide standards for non-cage systems. We recognise that the implications of any different standards applying in the case of third country imports have to be taken into account and have already taken steps to ensure that these are considered: an obligation has been placed on the European Commission to produce a report on this aspect by 30 June 1999.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what steps he plans to take to encourage red meat and poultry slaughterhouses to have a written welfare policy for the protection of animals; and if he will make a statement; [58169]

(2) what steps he plans to take to (a) encourage slaughterhouses to keep detailed records of the testing and maintenance of all stunning devices and (b) encourage red meat and poultry slaughterhouses to ensure that all staff involved in the stunning and slaughter of animals have received formal training in animal welfare; and if he will make a statement; [58171]

(3) what steps he plans to take to require poultry slaughterhouses to have devices for the metering and monitoring of the electric current supplied at stunning. [58166]

Mr. Morley: I have welcomed the recommendations of the Meat Hygiene Service Animal Welfare Survey Report 1997–98 that slaughterhouse operators should develop a written policy for the protection of animals in their care and increase formal welfare training together with other recommendations in respect of stunning equipment and record keeping. The Survey assessed compliance with the Welfare of Animals (Slaughter or Killing) Regulations 1995 and was also designed to identify slaughterhouses operating to standards beyond the statutory minimum and to encourage other premises to adopt these higher standards. As a part of the Survey process, Official Veterinary Surgeons discussed reports with individual slaughterhouse operators to initiate, where appropriate, changes intended to improve animal welfare standards.

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) sheep, (b) goats, (c) cattle and (d) chickens were slaughtered by a religious method without prior stunning in 1997. [58167]

Mr. Morley: Information is not held separately on the number of animals slaughtered by a religious method without stunning. The Meat Hygiene Service Animal Welfare Survey Report 1997–98 indicated that, at the time the survey was carried out, 26 slaughterhouses killed cattle and/or sheep and 19 poultry by the Jewish or Muslim method without stunning.

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he plans to take to ensure that slaughterhouses using electrical stunning apparatus comply with the requirements of the Welfare of Animals (Slaughter or Killing) Regulations 1995 that (a) the apparatus must incorporate a fail-safe device which prevents its operation unless a current sufficient to stun the animal unconscious can be passed, (b) a device indicating the voltage and current being used must be clearly visible to the operator and (c) the apparatus must incorporate an audible or visible device indicating the length of time of its application to an animal. [58170]

Mr. Morley: The development of new systems which measure impedance and control current flow will make it easier for slaughterhouse operators to comply fully with this requirement. We are closely monitoring the work being done on this so that as soon as such systems become commercially available we will be ready to take any additional enforcement action which may be necessary. In addition, the Meat Hygiene Service will provide Official Veterinary Surgeons with additional technical information and guidance on electrical stunning systems to help them to assess existing equipment.

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the effect of World Trade Organisation decisions on animal welfare legislation in the United Kingdom. [58224]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 3 November 1998]: WTO rules have no effect on legislation on the welfare of farm animals in the UK. There is, however, a need for attention to be given to the question of animal welfare standards to which products imported into the EU are produced. As a result of initiatives made during our Presidency, the European Commission has been expressly charged with producing a report on the implications of third country welfare standards which differ from those in the Community.

Milk

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to revise his Department's advice on the safety of milk following the finding of abnormal prion protein in the appendix of a patient in Torbay; and if he will make a statement. [57000]

Ms Jowell: I have been asked to reply.

We have no plans to revise present advice relating to the safety of milk. The Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee (SEAC) advises Government on all matters connected with Transmissible Spongiform Encephalopathies. As part of its remit SEAC is kept informed of new scientific findings and keeps its advice on matters under review. At its meeting in April it re-affirmed earlier advice in relation to milk that no further measures were needed to protect public health.

The finding of the abnormal prion protein in the appendix of a patient who subsequently died of new variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease tells us nothing about the possibility of infectivity being present in cow's milk. Furthermore milk from clinically affected cattle has been tested by bioassay in mice and no evidence of infectivity has been found.

TREASURY

Labour Statistics (Scotland)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people were in (a) full-time and (b) part-time employment in each constituency in Scotland (i) in May 1997 and (ii) at the most recent available date. [58340]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Tony Worthington, dated 10 November 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on full-time and part-time employment in each constituency in Scotland.

The statistics you request are derived from the ONS Annual Employment Survey (AES). However, the latest results are for September 1996, and before then at September 1995. This information can be obtained from the Nomis database which is accessible by the House of Commons Library.

The figures for September 1997 are planned to be available from NOMIS from May 1999.

Unemployment

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what number of unemployed people has been assumed for each of the next three years for the purpose of calculating social security spending plans in the Comprehensive Spending Review. [58507]

Mr. Byers: In line with the convention adopted by previous governments we do not publish forecasts for unemployment.

Abortions

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of abortions in Clwyd, South were funded by the NHS in the last year for which figures are available. [58719]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Martyn Jones, dated 10 November 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your parliamentary question on abortions.

Information on the number of abortions performed on residents of each parliamentary constituency is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

ONS routinely publishes abortion statistics by regions and health authorities (HA). In 1997, the latest year for which provisional figures are available, 86 per cent. of abortions performed on residents of North Wales HA were funded by the NHS.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the percentage of abortions funded by the NHS for women living in Harrow, West in each of the last five years. [58833]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Gareth R. Thomas, dated 10 November 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your parliamentary question on NHS abortions in Harrow West.

Information on the number of abortions performed on residents of each parliamentary constituency is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The ONS routinely publishes abortion statistics by regions and health authorities (HA). The following table shows the percentage of abortions funded by the NHS for residents of Brent and Harrow HA.

Euro

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps his Department has taken to advertise the benefits of the United Kingdom Government's decision not to join the euro to potential inward investors. [58680]

Ms Hewitt: The Treasury's assessment of the impact on inward investment in the UK of the Government's decision not to join the single currency in the first-wave was set out in the five economic tests assessment published in October 1997. The UK currently attracts a significantly larger share of inward investment than other countries in the EU. This reflects a number of important benefits that we offer including low taxes, the English language, a flexible and adaptable workforce and a commitment to lasting economic stability.

The Government believe that, while the UK remains insufficiently converged with the other European economies, there would be risks for stability, and hence for inward investment in the UK, if the UK joined EMU. The Government have set in place new frameworks for fiscal and monetary policy which will help to deliver the economic stability which international investors look for in making their decisions.

The Government continue to promote in all major international markets, the inherent strengths which have made, and will maintain, the UK as the most attractive European location for inward investment.

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the terms of reference of the Committee on Implementation of the Euro which he is establishing and on its accountability to the House. [58872]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 9 November 1998]: The Cross-Party Advisory Group on Preparations for EMU is an informal group which will act as a channel for the exchange of information and develop cross-party awareness of the continuing preparations for the euro. It will also play an advisory role in relation to the Standing Committee on preparations for EMU.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will reply to the letter of 6 July from the right hon. Member for Wells requesting that he give estimates for the change-over costs of joining a single European currency. [59100]

Mr. Gordon Brown: Shortly.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the number of people in the Tynemouth constituency who will benefit from the introduction of the minimum wage. [59007]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Alan Campbell, dated 10 November 1998:

As the Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on the introduction of the minimum wage.

The national minimum wage (NMW) will become effective in April 1999 and has been set at £3.60 for workers aged over 21. A development rate of £3.00 per hour will apply for those aged 18 to 21. Workers aged 16 and 17 and all those on apprenticeships will be exempt.

The Low Pay Commission, in arriving at their recommendations, had to adjust 1999 pay rates to 1998 values. Their methodology produces £3.50 and £2.90 as the 1998 values of the government's preferred rates.

The preferred method for assessing the coverage of the proposed NMW is to present adjusted NES and Labour Force Survey (LFS) data for the number of employees earning less than the proposed NMW rates. This method adjusts for the fact that the NES is based on a one per cent. sample of employees in the PAYE system and is therefore likely to under-represent relatively low paid staff, earning below the tax-threshold, and in particular those who work part-time. It is not possible to use this method for small areas, and information solely from the NES, has therefore been provided. Regrettably, NES cannot provide statistically reliable estimates for Tynemouth constituency, therefore information for Tyne and Wear Metropolitan County has been provided.

The latest available information from the 1998 New Earnings Survey shows that 4.5 per cent. of workers over 21 years of age in Tyne and Wear Metropolitan County earn less than £3.50 per hour and 4.7 per cent. of workers aged 18 to 21 years earn less than £2.90 per hour. The information is given as a proportion of workers because appropriate grossing factors for the NES sample are not available at very detailed levels of disaggregation.

The extent of the bias in the NES data may be estimated for the North East by using the adjusted NES and LFS data for all employees. This suggests that the estimate of the overall proportion of full-time employees aged over 21 years earning below £3.50 could understate the true position by as much as 5 percentage points. However, it is unlikely that the occurrence of lower paid jobs is uniform across the region, and so it would be wise to treat this figure as broadly indicative rather than as a precise estimate. I am unable to provide the bias for employees aged 18 to 21 years because the sample size is too small for a reliable estimate to be produced.

Marriage (Special Licences)

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people were married by special licence in (a) England and (b) Wales in each of the last five years. [59022]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Patrick McLoughlin, dated 10 November 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics, I have been asked to reply to your recent question on the number of people married by special licence in England and Wales.

The information required is as follows:

Tax Credits

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what estimate he has made of the number of people in the Tynemouth constituency who will benefit from the disabled person's tax credit; [59008]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of families in the Tynemouth constituency who will benefit from working families' tax credit. [59011]

Dawn Primarolo: I regret that estimates for individual constituencies are not available.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessments his Department has made of the risk of fraud and wage substitution in relation to the introduction of the working families tax credit; and if he will make a statement. [58277]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 9 November 1998]: The Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) will build on, and replace, Family Credit from October 1999 and it will help make more families better off in work than on benefit. WFTC will be administered by the Inland Revenue who have considerable experience and expertise in detecting and combating fraud.

The Revenue's compliance strategy is being designed with input from those currently involved in running Family Credit and countering fraud.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures are proposed to ensure that employers do not claim working families tax credit and then fail to pass it on to their employees. [58973]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 9 November 1998]: Employers will not be able to claim working families tax credit on behalf of their employees. They will pay the tax credit to their employees when notified by the Inland Revenue and they will generally set off the amount of tax credit against their tax and NICs liabilities. The Inland Revenue will put in place arrangements to monitor the operation of the new WFTC system.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer where a claim form for the working families tax credit is issued if it will be addressed to the principal carer or to the worker in the couple. [58976]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 9 November 1998]: Claim forms will be available from a number of sources but where they are sent out by the Inland Revenue they will generally be addressed to the person who requests it. In addition, claim forms will be sent to those who are approaching their renewal date.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the average weekly gain from the introduction of the working families tax credit; and if he will provide a separate estimate for (a) homebuyers, (b) renters and (c) non-householders. [58596]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 9 November 1998]: Estimates of the average weekly gain for those in receipt of the Working Families Tax Credit in Great Britain in 1999–2000 are given in the table. Estimates relate to gains in Working Families Tax Credit.

	Average gain, £ per week
Owner Occupiers	19.50
Renters	15.10
Non-householders	17.00
Total	17.20

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer where a family opts not to receive the working families tax credit through the pay packet, by what means it will be delivered if the claimant does not have a bank account? [58975]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 9 November 1998]: A couple will have the option of which one of them is to receive the Working Families Tax Credit. From April 2000, if the person who is to receive the WFTC is not in employment they will be paid directly by the Inland Revenue, who are looking at how this can best be done, including to those without bank accounts.

Fuel Excise Duty

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the current rates of excise duty per litre on (i) standard unleaded petrol, (ii) leaded petrol, (iii) standard diesel and (iv) low-sulphur diesel in each country of the European Union. [58705]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 9 November 1998]: The current rates of excise duty per litre on (i) standard unleaded petrol, (ii) leaded petrol, (iii) standard diesel and in each country of the European Union are:

	Leaded petrol pence per litre	Unleaded petrol pence per litre	Standard diesel pence per litre
Austria	n/a	28.34	19.81
Belgium	38.66	34.68	19.83

Spain	27.24	25.01	18.16
Sweden	n/a	33.69	20.14
United Kingdom	49.26	43.99	44.99

The excise duty rate in the United Kingdom for low-sulphur diesel is 42.99 pence per litre. Rates of excise duty on low-sulphur diesel are not available for the countries of the European Union other than the United Kingdom.

VAT

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when a decision will be made on the review of the VAT registration threshold. [58889]

Dawn Primarolo: The representations received by Customs to their consultation document on the Review of the VAT Registration Threshold are currently being evaluated. No decisions on the various proposals will be made until after this evaluation is complete.

Growth Forecasts

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the margin of error used in his growth forecast for the next financial year. [59295]

Ms Hewitt: Information on error margins surrounding the Treasury's growth forecasts was set out in table A7 of the Pre-Budget Report published on 3 November.

Alcohol and Tobacco Duty

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what rules will apply to (a) European commissioners, (b) members of the European Parliament and (c) accredited diplomats regarding the payment of excise duties on alcohol and tobacco products after 30 June 1999. [59269]

Dawn Primarolo: Diplomats who are accredited to the Court of St. James are entitled to certain privileges and immunities in accordance with the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations 1961. These privileges and immunities will continue after 30 June 1999.

The fiscal arrangements for officials and representatives of European institutions are determined by the host nation within which the institution is located.

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reason projected revenues from tobacco duty for 1998–99 have been reduced; and if he will make a statement. [59270]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs' forecast for tobacco duty receipts in 1998–99 has been reduced because receipts in the financial year to date have been lower than hitherto expected. It is too early to have a robust explanation for this decrease.

Disabled Tenants

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what amounts were allocated to housing associations for aids and adaptations for disabled tenants in each of the last five years; and what is the estimated amount for 1998–99. [59216]

Mr. Macdonald: The information requested is not held centrally. Since Scottish Homes is responsible for allocating funding to housing associations in Scotland, I have asked the Chairman, Mr. John Ward, to write to my hon. Friend with the relevant information.

Territorial Army

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if it is his policy to support the retention of a TA engineering presence in Scotland. [59250]

Mr. Dewar: I support a TA presence in Scotland that fulfils the modern role envisaged for the TA in the Strategic Defence Review. The detail of the structure of the TA is the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Defence.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he believes civil authorities in the North of Scotland will be in a position to respond effectively to electricity or telecommunications failures which may result from the millennium bug. [59242]

Mr. Dewar: I am aware that the wide range of authorities who have responsibilities for responding to such failures, from whatever source, are constantly at a high level of preparedness.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what provision he has made for civil emergencies in (a) Scotland and (b) the North of Scotland as a result of the millennium bug. [59248]

Mr. Dewar: A wide variety of means has been employed to raise awareness, in both the public and private sectors, of the potential for problems arising and to stimulate appropriate action. This has been on an all-Scotland basis.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if it will be his policy to request the use of TA engineering units in the event of civil emergency resulting from the millennium bug. [59243]

Mr. Dewar: Should any kind of civil emergency arise as a result of millennium bug problems, I am confident that the Scottish Executive would request military assistance if it considered that desirable. It would be for the armed services to determine whether any specific assistance was provided by the TA or otherwise.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what communications he has had with the Secretary of State for Defence regarding the provision of Territorial Army assistance to civil authorities in (a) Scotland and (b) the North of Scotland in the event of a civil emergency resulting from the millennium bug. [59249]

Mr. Dewar: I have emphasised to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence my concern that the ability of the Territorial Army in Scotland to provide military aid to the civil community should be maintained, and have drawn attention to the particular importance of this at a time when millennium bug problems could potentially pose a threat to key services. These points were made with respect to Scotland generally.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what extra resources (a) have been and (b) are planned to be made available to (i) local authorities, (ii) the NHS and (iii) the emergency services in Scotland to deal with millennium bug compliance. [59247]

Mr. Dewar: An additional £10 million is being made available to local authorities in Scotland for 1999–2000, to help them respond to demands placed on them by the millennium date change issue. Local authorities have discretion in the use of this money; they may use it to support action across any of the services they provide, including emergency services.

The Government have provided £151 million of new money for 1998–99 for the National Health Service in Scotland (NHSiS) on top of the £98 million which was already planned. Action in the NHSiS on the Millennium Date Change problem is being funded from within these increased general resources.

I do not expect to have to make further additional resources available. However, the situation remains under constant review.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which minister in his Department has responsibility for millennium bug compliance in Scotland. [59246]

Mr. Dewar: My noble Friend Lord Macdonald of Tradeston is responsible for Scottish Office action on the Millennium date change issue. That includes oversight of progress in the public sector in Scotland generally. However, primary responsibility for ensuring that particular public services in Scotland are not materially affected by the Millennium date change lies with senior managers of the services concerned.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Public Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish the names of those people he has appointed to public bodies since 1 May 1997, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed and whether they receive remuneration. [56824]

Mr. Denham: The information has been placed in the library.

Children Support

Mr. Bradshaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the number of children in the UK living in families dependent on supplementary benefits or income support in each year since 1979, and for each year these as a proportion of all children in the UK. [58297]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the form requested. Such information as is available is set out in the tables.

Disability Working Allowance

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the number of people who have ceased to receive incapacity benefit or severe disablement allowance and who are drawing the disability working allowance who will gain a two year cover to return to benefit should they be forced to give up their job because of ill health. [58302]

Mr. Timms: Everyone who moves on to Disability Working Allowance from Incapacity Benefit or Severe Disablement Allowance can take advantage of the two-year linking rule which allows them to return to their former benefit, should they be forced to give up work because of ill health.

At April 1998, the latest date for which figures are available, there were 1,261 people who qualified for Disability Working Allowance via receipt of Severe Disablement Allowance, and 2,383 people who qualified via receipt of Incapacity Benefit.

Cyclical Benefit Payments

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total spent on cyclical benefit payments for each month from May 1997 to September 1998. [58506]

Angela Eagle: The information is set out in the table.

Estimated outturn of cyclical social security on a monthly basis for the financial year 1997–98

Notes:

1. Final outturn figures will be published in the 1999 Departmental Report
2. Figures on a similar basis for 1998–99 will not be available until November 1999 when the Appropriation Accounts are published
3. Cyclical Social Security has been defined as Jobseeker's Allowance and Income Support to the under 60s

Expenditure Forecasts

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimates he has made of future social security expenditure if the growth in output of the United Kingdom economy is (a) 0 per cent. for 1998–99 and 1 per cent. for 1999–2000 and 2000–01, (b) 0.5 per cent. for 1998–99, 1 per cent. for 1999–2000 and 1.5 per cent. for 2000–01 and (c) 1 per cent. for 1998–99, 1.5 per cent. for 1999–2000 and 2 per cent. for 2000–01. [58508]

Mr. Darling: Forecasts of future Social Security expenditure was published as part of the Pre-Budget Report (CM 4076) on 3 November 1998.

Disability Income Guarantee

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which parts of the disability income guarantee will be means-tested. [58510]

Mr. Timms: The disability income guarantee will provide extra help for the poorest disabled people with the highest care needs. It will be paid as part of Income Support, Jobseeker's Allowance (Income Based), Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit and will take the form of a new, higher rate of disability premium and a new, higher rate of disabled child premium for those getting the highest rate of the care component of Disability Living Allowance.

Family Credit

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the estimated expenditure on family credit for the current tax year. [58554]

Angela Eagle: The estimated expenditure on Family Credit for the current tax year is £2,498 million.

Note:

This figure is consistent with that in the Pre-Budget Report of 3 November 1998.

National Insurance

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what steps were taken to publicise the consultation paper on the draft regulations to bring non-cash vouchers into Class 1 National Insurance liability; and what specific steps were taken to consult those organisations affected; [58480]

(2) if he will assess the impact on jobs in the UK catering sector of the proposal to bring luncheon vouchers into Class 1 National Insurance liability; [58481]

(3) what assessment he has made of the weekly cost to those employees in receipt of luncheon vouchers of the proposal to bring them into Class 1 National Insurance liability; [58511]

(4) to what extent the procedures outlined in the "Better Regulation Guide", published on 10 August, have been followed in respect of the draft regulations to bring non-cash vouchers into Class 1 National Insurance liability. [58479]

Mr. Timms: The Government proposals were announced during the passage of the Social Security Bill, 22 July 1997, Official Report, column 786 and 25 November 1997, Official Report, columns 468–69, and in DSS Press Release 97/127. The proposals are intended to introduce greater fairness in the National Insurance treatment of cash and non-cash earnings. The technical detail of the regulations were subject to a public consultation exercise which ran from 14 August to 14 September. Over 100 businesses and representatives were contacted, about 50 organisations or individuals replied.

An explanatory and financial memorandum, and a regulatory appraisal, were published alongside the Bill in July 1997. The regulatory costs and impact of the proposal to make non-cash vouchers liable for National Insurance in the same way as cash vouchers was set out in the Social Security Compliance Cost Assessment published in December 1997. A copy of that regulatory appraisal accompanied the consultation paper on the draft regulations issued in August.

The Better Regulation Guide gives Departments discretion to adopt an approach best suited to the scale of the proposal and the data available.

The weekly cost to those employees in receipt of luncheon vouchers will vary depending on the value of the voucher and the level of earnings. On current standard rates, the extra National Insurance liability will be 50 pence a week for an employee receiving a £5 a week luncheon voucher and earning between the lower and upper earnings level. Some employers may choose to meet the costs of their employees' National Insurance contribution liability on vouchers.

Residential Living Allowance

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has to equalise the residential living allowance between local authority residential care homes and private residential care homes; and if he will make a statement. [58664]

Angela Eagle: The Government have established an independent Royal Commission to consider the future funding of long-term care and to make recommendations. Issues such as benefit provision for people in long-term care fall within the Royal Commission's deliberations. The Royal Commission will report at the end of the year.

Officials in the Department have been asked to consider whether Residential Allowance is meeting the objectives of community care. This is not a formal review with specific terms of reference, and it is too early to give a commitment on whether, or when changes will be introduced.

Benefit Entitlement

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures his Department plans to introduce to place a responsibility on claimants to report improvements in their medical condition which may affect benefit entitlement. [58572]

Mr. Timms: We want to ensure that disabled people on Incapacity Benefit get the benefits to which they are properly entitled and that they receive the advice they need to help them achieve independence. Equally we want to reinforce the principle that the right to benefit is balanced by responsibilities. Currently many people, once they get Incapacity Benefit, have no further personal contact with their social security office, and often do not realise that changes in their medical condition may affect their benefit entitlement. We intend to make it clear in legislation that improvements are changes that should be reported and will explore ways of keeping in closer contact with claimants to ensure that the information held is up to date.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to exempt carers from the contributions requirement in respect of incapacity benefit. [58578]

Mr. Timms: Carers currently have to pay a minimum amount of National Insurance contributions at some point prior to the claim, in order to qualify for Incapacity Benefit. This will continue to be the case in the future. However, as we made clear in our consultation paper "A New Contract for Welfare: Support for Disabled People" we are planning to modify the proposed new contribution test so that carers who received Invalid Care Allowance are not disadvantaged because they were unable to pay contributions due to their caring responsibilities in one of the two tax years before the claim.

Welfare to Work

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what funds his Department plans to make available for each of the three stages of pilot schemes for the introduction of a single gateway. [58674]

Angela Eagle: Final decisions have still to be taken on the amount of additional resources to be made available to fund the single gateway pilots. Detailed work on costs is still being undertaken. An important reason for piloting the single gateway is to measure costs in order to inform decisions about national implementation.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many examinations for disability living allowance and incapacity benefit have been processed by the Glasgow office of the Benefits Agency medical services in each of the last 12 months. [58270]

Mr. Timms: The administration of Social Security benefits is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Brian H. Donohoe, dated 9 November 1998:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many examinations for Disability Living Allowance (DLA) and Incapacity Benefit (IB) have been processed by the Glasgow office of the Benefits Agency Medical Services (BAMS) in each of the last 12 months.

A decision to contract BAMS out to the private sector was announced by the Secretary of State on 31 July 1997. This decision was in line with the Government's commitment to modernising the delivery of Social Security to make it better, simpler, and more efficient. On 19 February it was announced that the BAMS contract had been awarded to the Sema Group for the next five years. They continue to use the Glasgow Medical Services Centre for medical examinations.

Information about the number of DLA and IB examinations carried out at the Glasgow Medical Services Centre is given on the attached table.

Number of DLA/IB examinations performed at the Glasgow Medical Services Centre

Month	DLA	IB
October 1997	1,635	4,082
November 1997	2,503	4,672
December 1997	1,548	4,388
January 1998	2,108	4,548
February 1998	1,974	4,175
March 1998	1,882	4,879

Figures provided by Medical Services on behalf of Sema Group

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what evidence was evaluated by his Department prior to determining the age limit of three years for the mobility component of disability living allowance. [58569]

Mr. Timms: The Government took account of the views of medical advisers as well as research by the then Office for Population, Censuses and Surveys, by the Disability Alliance and by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many children are expected to benefit from the extension of the mobility component of disability living allowance to children of three and four years old; and what estimate he has made of the number who would benefit if it was extended to children below the age of three years and of the cost to his Department of that extension. [58573]

Mr. Timms: 8,000 children a year are expected to benefit from the extension of the higher rate mobility component of Disability Living Allowance to children of the ages of three and four. The cost of extending this to disabled children under three is difficult to estimate given that the current criteria for help is based primarily on an inability or virtual inability to walk, and that all children under three are unable to walk any substantial distances.

Guaranteed Pensioner Income

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of people in the Tynemouth constituency who will benefit from the introduction of a guaranteed pensioner income. [59012]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested. As at May 1998, there were approximately 8,000 pensioners in receipt of Income Support in the area covered by North Tyneside Local Authority. The above-inflation increase in the Income Support rates, providing a guaranteed minimum income of not less than £75 per week for a single pensioner and £116.60 for a couple, will benefit pensioners entitled to Income Support from April 1999.

Notes:

1. Estimate rounded to the nearest thousand, and based on a 5 per cent sample of Income Support claimants.

2. "Pensioners" are defined for Income Support purposes, as single persons aged 60 or over, or couples (married or unmarried) where one or both members are 60 or over.

Income Support

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in receipt of income support in the Warrington, North constituency had weekly deductions paid to (a) British Gas and (b) North West Water for each of the past five years. [58316]

Angela Eagle: The administration of Income Support is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Helen Jones, dated 9 November 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Peter Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many people in receipt of Income Support in the Warrington North constituency had weekly deductions paid to (a) British Gas and (b) North West Water for each of the past five years. As Mr Mathison is away from the office on leave, I am replying.

The information is not available in the format requested. The Benefits Agency (BA) collate Income Support (IS) statistics by BA District which do not correspond to Parliamentary Constituency boundaries. The BA North Cheshire District with offices at Warrington and Widnes is one such District. Information for this District is shown on the attached table.

It has not been possible to list payments solely to British Gas nor North West Water. Direct payment statistics record a deduction as either "fuel" or "water". No distinction is drawn between gas and electricity suppliers, or between the different water suppliers.

I hope this reply is helpful.

Number of IS recipients in the North Cheshire BA District having weekly deductions for fuel and water 1993–98

Year	Fuel deductions applications accepted	Water deductions applications accepted
1993–94	1,799	1,745
1994–95	1,901	1,922
1995–96	2,117	1,843
1996–97	1,484	1,684
1997–98	1,470	1,097

Benefit Integrity Project

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he plans to meet the Disability Benefits Forum to discuss his plans for replacing the Benefit Integrity Programme. [59230]

Mr. Timms: We value the help provided by the Disability Benefits Forum as we take forward our plans to reform disability benefits and we meet them regularly. Yesterday, at our most recent meeting, we discussed the latest position on the Benefit Integrity Project and we announced further administrative improvements in its operation. From 16 November 1998, the Project will no longer contact people receiving the highest rate of the Disability Living Allowance (DLA) mobility component with either the highest or middle rate of the DLA care component, where the award pre-dates April 1992. Nor will it contact people receiving both components of DLA at the highest rates whose main disabling condition is recorded (on the DLA computer system) as Parkinson's Disease, Multiple Sclerosis, Neurological Disease or Mental Subnormality.

Cases in action will be finalised but no new cases will be selected from these groups. This change builds on other improvements that have been made since we inherited this Project which ensure that it operates in a way that is both sensitive and cost-effective. At the same time, we invited the Forum to continue to work with us and officials as we develop a new fairer way of reviewing people's entitlement to DLA, which will replace the Benefit Integrity Project. A special working group will be set up to take this forward.

Lone Parents

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of calculating housing benefit and council tax benefit for lone parents using the applicable amounts used for couples. [59156]

Angela Eagle: The estimated cost of calculating Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit for lone parents using the applicable amounts used for couples would be £185 million in Housing Benefit and £25 million in Council Tax Benefit.

Notes:

1. Information drawn from the 1995/96 Family Resources Survey, uprated to 1999/2000 prices and benefit levels.
2. Estimated caseloads adjusted using May 1997 administrative data and calibrated in line with the Department's forecasts consistent with the Comprehensive Spending Review (CSR).
3. Estimates are at 1999/2000 prices and are rounded to the nearest £5 million.
4. The reply assumes that the lone parent rate of the Family Premium will continue for those who qualify for it.

DEFENCE

Head of Defence Export Services

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the contract of the current Head of Defence Export Services finishes; who his successor will be; and what the salary of the post is. [58963]

Mr. George Robertson: I am announcing today that the Prime Minister has approved the appointment of Mr. Tony Edwards as the next Head of Defence Export Services in succession to Sir Charles Masefield. Mr. Edwards, who will be seconded to the Ministry of Defence from TI Group plc., will formally take up appointment on 14 December 1998 when Sir Charles Masefield, who has been seconded to the Ministry from British Aerospace, will take up a new appointment in industry.

Mr. Edwards will receive a salary from the Ministry of Defence of £165,000 a year plus an annual performance related bonus of up to £15,000. In addition, the Defence Industries Council, acting on behalf of the defence industry as a whole, will provide a top-up element so that Mr. Edwards' basic remuneration package will remain on a par with what he is currently receiving from TI Group plc.

White Fleet Contracts

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will issue an invitation to negotiate on the white fleet contracts for Scotland, Central, London and Southern regions; and if he will make a statement. [58331]

Mr. Spellar: Invitations to submit proposals for MOD 'white fleet' requirements for the Scotland, Central Britain, London and Southern projects are expected to be issued shortly.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the target dates for the award of white fleet contracts outstanding; and if he will make a statement. [58332]

Mr. Spellar: The target date for contract award of the Scotland, Central Britain, London and Southern 'white fleet' contracts is August 1999. That for the South Western project is December 1999.

Challenger II Tanks

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the contracts will be awarded in respect of the new transporters for the Challenger II tanks; and if he will make a statement. [58333]

Mr. Spellar: We are currently considering industry's proposals for this programme and hope to make an announcement shortly.

Mechanical Handling Equipment

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will let the contract for tri-service mechanical handling equipment; and if he will make a statement. [58334]

Mr. Spellar: If a PFI solution is adopted it is estimated that a contract will be awarded in February 2000.

Military Bands

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many military bands each of the armed services had in (a) May 1979 and (b) May 1997; how many each has at the present time; and what proposals he has to alter the number. [57174]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The number of bands of the Armed Forces, in each of the years specified, is as follows:

	May 1979	May 1997	October 1998
Royal Navy	9	5	5
Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve	0	0	0
Army	[1]79	30	30
Territorial Army	24	24	24
Royal Air Force	5	4	3

[1] This figure is based on a study undertaken in 1981, but is believed to be representative of the number of bands which existed in May 1979.

We have no plans to alter the present number of regular Service bands.

Military Bases (Land Quality)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those occupied and unoccupied sites of military bases that his Department has identified as areas of environmental concern, indicating the principle causes of environmental problems on those sites; and if he will place copies of the relevant land quality statements in the Library. [56295]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 3 November 1998]: The need for more information on the extent to which the Defence Estate might have been contaminated through being used for military purposes was recognised, and a programme of Land Quality Assessments was initiated in 1996. The scope of this programme is extensive and, given the capacity of specialist firms to undertake this work, it is estimated that this programme could take up to 10 years to complete. Accordingly, effort is being concentrated in the first instance on those sites allocated for disposal.

The provision of LQAs is the responsibility of the unit or organisation occupying the site. No central record of these documents has been maintained. However, arrangements are now being put in place to ensure that the Defence Estate Organisation will, in future, receive copies of all LQAs produced.

At any one time, there are approximately 400 sites in disposal, many of them very small and handled by local offices. It would not be practical to put a copy of every land quality statement in the Library of the House; statements related to specific sites, could, however, by made available on request.

Territorial Army

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what date the consultation document on the restructuring of the TA was first made available to the TA command; and on what date it was first made available to the Secretary of State for Scotland. [59239]

Mr. George Robertson: Initial proposals on the restructuring of the TA were first circulated internally within the Army chain of command and to Territorial, Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Associations on 21 July; and were subsequently provided to officials of the Scottish Office on 20 August.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Scotland concerning the proposed disposition of TA infantry and engineering units in Scotland. [59238]

Mr. George Robertson: I have discussed the proposals for the TA in Scotland with the Secretary of State for Scotland on a number of occasions as they have developed.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what discussions he has had with other Ministers concerning the anticipated role of the Territorial Army in contingency planning for the millennium bug; [59235]

(2) what assessment he has made of the potential role for Territorial Army units in cases of civil emergency as a result of the millennium bug. [59236]

Mr. George Robertson: My Ministerial colleagues and I have participated fully in the Government's work in addressing the Year 2000 problem. Long-standing arrangements exist under which local authorities can request military assistance, whether from the regular or the volunteer forces, in the event of a civil emergency. As yet, we have received no requests which would indicate any major requirement for military assistance to the civil authorities over the millennium period.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what provision he has made for availability of Territorial Army or regular army units in the north of Scotland in case of civil emergency as a result of the millennium bug. [59237]

Mr. George Robertson: The arrangements for providing military assistance in the event of civil emergency are long standing, well understood by local authorities and apply to the whole of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what date he will announce his proposals for the restructuring of the Territorial Army. [59240]

Mr. George Robertson: I hope to do so next week.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to retain a TA engineering presence in (a) Scotland and (b) the Highlands. [59241]

Mr. George Robertson: This will be subject to decisions on the future structure of the Territorial Army as a whole, on which I hope to make an announcement next week.

HEALTH

Long-term Care

16. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of long-term care. [57365]

Mr. Hutton: The report of the Royal Commission on Long-term Care is due at the turn of the year. Other publications in the coming months include the Social Services White Paper and the Long Term Care Charter.

NHS (Best Practice)

17. Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to identify and spread best practice in the NHS. [57366]

Mr. Milburn: We are taking positive action to disseminate best practice throughout the National Health Service, including establishing the National Institute for Clinical Excellence and a database of good practice on the National Health Service web. We are making available £10 million a year to identify and promote 100 beacon local health services. And we are abolishing the internal market which created such obstacles to sharing best practice in the NHS.

NHS Direct

18. Jacqui Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has for extending NHS Direct in the west midlands. [57367]

Mr. Milburn: We will be extending NHS Direct to cover the Black Country from the beginning of January 1999 and Birmingham from April 1999.

22. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the number of people to be covered by NHS Direct by April 1999. [57372]

Mr. Milburn: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson), Official Report, column 140.

Chiropody Services

19. Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals he has to improve the provision of chiropody services in East Sussex. [57368]

Mr. Hutton: Provision of chiropody services is a matter for the health authority. The hon. Member will be pleased to know that the targeting of resources on those with clinical need has reduced podiatry waiting lists from 14 to 2 weeks and resources have been released for other county-wide priorities such as cancer care.

Acute Beds

20. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to identify the number and use of acute beds in the NHS. [57369]

Ms Jowell: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie), Official Report, column 141.

Free Eye Tests

21. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the number of senior citizens who are eligible to benefit from free eye tests. [57371]

Mr. Milburn: We estimate that, from 1 April 1999, some 7 million more people aged 60 and over will become eligible for free National Health Service sight tests.

Global Warming (Health Effects)

23. Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what studies he has made of the effects of global warming on health. [57373]

Ms Jowell: The Government, through the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions (DETR), support research on the global impacts of climate change on human health at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine. The Department of Health itself has not yet commissioned any studies directly related to the effects of global warming on health. However since the Climate Change Impacts Review group of the DETR identified possible health effects we are in discussion about research areas with the Environmental Change Unit at the University of Oxford.

NHS Resources

24. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the effect of the availability of resources on (i) nurses' and midwives' pay and (ii) the rationing of drugs or procedures in the health service. [57374]

Mr. Milburn: The Comprehensive Spending Review produced a settlement which can accommodate fair pay rises for nurses and midwives and will ensure that cost effective drugs and procedures are available in the National Health Service. The Government are determined to ensure that patients receive the full benefit of this new investment so pay review bodies will need to strike a careful balance between fairness and affordability.

Breast Screening

25. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the value for money of the breast screening programme. [57375]

Mr. Hutton: The National Health Service Breast Screening Programme is based on the recommendations of the 1987 Forrest report. This report included an economic appraisal of the costs and benefits of breast screening, including a comparison against other health service activities.

Over one million women aged 50–64 are screened each year in England at a cost of around £35 million. In 1996–7 over 6,500 cases of cancer were detected.

Booked Admissions

26. Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to promote booked admission pilots in the NHS. [57376]

Mr. Hutton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster), Official Report, column 137.

32. Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to promote booked admission pilots in the NHS. [57382]

Mr. Milburn: On 29 September 1998, my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State announced that 24 sites had been selected to pilot innovative systems to enable patients to book hospital admission dates convenient to them. £5 million has been made available this year, with £20 million next year to enable the programme to be extended.

Children's Services

28. Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on special grants for children's services and their relationship with "Quality Protects" action plans. [57378]

Mr. Hutton: On 5 November, we published the Government response to the report of the Children's Safeguards Review. This set out our plans for a new children's services special grant, which will amount to £375 million over three years, and its link to our "Quality Protects" programme. We shall be publishing, later this week, a circular to all local authorities, copied to National Health Service bodies and the voluntary sector, giving them further information about the special grant and its relationship with Quality Protects action plans.

Acheson Report

29. Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he plans to take in response to Sir Donald Acheson's report on the causes of health inequalities. [57379]

Ms Jowell: Sir Donald's report will be published shortly.

The Government are committed to taking action to redress the effects of health inequalities. This is one of the key aims of the Green Paper "Our Healthier Nation", published in February this year. Action is already being taken through a broad range of Government initiatives, notably the Social Exclusion Unit's report "Bringing Britain Together". Cutting health inequalities is one of the top priorities for local health and social services, as identified in "Modernising Health and Social Services: National Priorities Guidance 1999/2000–2001/02", issued recently. Early next year we will publish our White Paper on a health strategy for England with further proposals for action.

Health Visiting

30. Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to promote health visiting in the NHS. [57380]

Mr. Milburn: On 22 October my right hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health announced that an Innovation Fund of up to £1 million will be set up to explore new ways of working, new partnerships and new roles for health visitors. The health visitor will be key to delivering "Our Healthier Nation" objectives.

Heart Attacks

31. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to shorten the average time taken to deliver treatment to victims of heart attacks. [57381]

Mr. Milburn: The Department has introduced various initiatives to reduce the time taken to treat people who have heart attacks. There is now considerable evidence that delays in providing emergency treatment have been reduced and more patients are receiving early thrombolytic therapy.

However, more remains to be done. This is why the first National Service Framework on coronary heart disease includes the management of heart attack. The Emerging Findings Report, which will be published shortly, contains draft standards which include the pre-hospital care of people who suffer heart attacks as well as emergency treatment in hospital.

Out-patient Consultations

33. Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of people awaiting out-patient consultations on (a) 1 May 1997 and (b) 1 May 1998. [57383]

Mr. Milburn: Information is not collected centrally in the form requested. Available data on outpatient appointments are collected and published quarterly in a statistical bulletin. Copies are available in the Library.

Accident and Emergency Departments

34. Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to improve conditions for patients and staff in accident and emergency departments. [57384]

Mr. Hutton: As part of the National Health Service Modernisation Fund, the Government have announced an extra £30 million to modernise Accident and Emergency Departments next year.

Hip Replacements

35. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in the reduction of the waiting lists for hip replacements; and if he will make a statement. [57385]

Mr. Milburn: Information on waiting lists for individual procedures is not available nationally. However, the £417 million additional resources made available this year will enable the National Health Service to make progress in tackling waiting lists for hip replacements.

Metal-based Amalgams

36. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent research his Department has undertaken to evaluate the risks involved in using metal-based amalgams in dentistry; and if he will make a statement. [57386]

Mr. Milburn: Two projects have been commissioned this year. These are a pilot study of the incidence of adverse reactions associated with dental materials and a study of neuropsychological functioning of dentists exposed to chronic low levels of mercury.

Hospital Beds (National Inquiry)

37. Mr. Pond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made on the national inquiry into hospital beds, which he announced on 30 September. [57387]

Mr. Milburn: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 30 September 1998 the establishment of a national inquiry into hospital beds. The findings of that inquiry will be published next Spring.

Waiting List (Orthopaedics)

38. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the waiting list size for orthopaedic consultants nationally relative to the average waiting list size for all NHS consultants. [57388]

Mr. Milburn: At the end of June 1998, the number of patients waiting for elective admission to trauma and orthopaedics was 254,470. This represents 20 per cent. of the total list.

Waiting Lists

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the investment he is making to reduce NHS waiting lists over the next three years. [57377]

Mr. Milburn: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham), Official Report, column 133.

Midwives

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of midwives are on (a) D, (b) E and (c) F grades (i) nationally and (ii) by region for each of the last five years. [56929]

Mr. Milburn: The table shows the percentage of registered midwives in the National Health Service in England for the years 1993 and 1994, broken down according to grade and region. Figures are not available for 1995–97 as the Department's non-medical workforce census, the source of this statistic, does not collect information by clinical grade. In addition, the NHS Executive has gathered information from trusts about how the grading guidance is being applied to midwives.

Palliative Care

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of demand over the next five years for (a) in-patient, and (b) respite and day care provision for palliative care; and if he will make a statement. [58178]

Mr. Hutton: In Executive Letter (95)22 regional health authorities were asked to ensure that health authorities should agree service contracts for specialist palliative care to meet the needs of their resident populations. This was followed by Executive Letter (96)85 which gave further advice on epidemiologically based needs assessment for palliative and terminal care.

We are committed to ensuring that the principles and practice of palliative care are adopted in the care of all people with life threatening illnesses in all settings. Significant advances have been made in pain and symptom control and there is greater emphasis on maximising the quality of life of patients.

In June this year we issued Health Service Circular 1998/115 pointing out the need to integrate the principles and practice of palliative care for all those facing life threatening illnesses into the whole of National Health Service practice. To support this, with the circular the Government also circulated three documents published by the National Council for Hospice and Specialist Palliative Care Services which provide guidance on key issues facing those who are dying and those caring for them in the NHS. These were:

(i) Guidelines for Managing Cancer Pain in Adults

(ii) Changing Gear—Guidelines for Managing the Last Days of Life in Adults

(iii) Palliative Care in the Hospital Setting.

Nursing Homes

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to review inspection and registration standards for nursing homes; and if he will make a statement. [58181]

Mr. Hutton: We are committed to reforming current regulatory arrangements for social services, including nursing homes, to create independent arrangements that are tough, transparent and accountable. As part of this process we are aiming to develop national required standards to ensure greater consistency in the work of the different regulation authorities. Details of our reforms will be included in the Social Services White Paper to be published shortly.

Cervical Screening

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 19 October 1998, Official Report, columns 975–76, for what reasons health authorities in England are unable to report average time taken for patients to receive results of cervical smear tests: and how methods of data collection on waiting times for cervical smear tests in English health authorities differ from those in (a) Wales, (b) Scotland and (c) Northern Ireland. [57869]

Mr. Hutton: None of the four health departments routinely collect information about the length of time women wait for the results of their cervical smear tests. However, information on the length of time laboratories take to read smear tests was collected centrally in England until March 1997.

As the Welsh Office have only five health authorities, and Northern Ireland Office only four health boards, both Departments were able to collect information about waiting times for smear results on an ad hoc basis. The Scottish Office were also able to contact each of their 11 health boards, but provided information only on reporting times. As there are over 100 health authorities in England the information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Information about waiting times for results will be included as part of the current review of data collection on the cervical screening programme.

Joint Procedures (NHS and Personal Social Services)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consultations took place with users and carers and their representative organisations when drawing up the Joint Procedures Guidance for the NHS and Personal Social Services. [57785]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 3 November 1998]: No formal consultation was undertaken with any organisations before the publication of "Modernising Health and Social Services: National Priorities Guidance 1999–2000–2001–02".

Dietary Supplements

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to issue further guidance to the Medicines Control Agency about the classification of products containing blends of herbal, vitamin and mineral supplements; and if it is his policy that dietary supplements should be available on general retail sale provided that they are safe. [58731]

Ms Jowell: The Medicines Control Agency acts on behalf of the Licensing Authority in accordance with Medicines Act 1968. The Agency classifies products on a case by case basis in accordance with European Community and United Kingdom law, legal precedent and published guidance, and there are no plans to change this. Whether a product is subject to food or medicine legislation is a matter of law not policy. Products which are not medicinal products and fall within the definition of food must comply with the law relating to food. Amongst other things, this effectively requires that products are safe.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if a product containing a blend of herbal, vitamin and mineral supplements may require a medicine's product licence in cases where different elements of that blend could each be sold separately without such a licence. [58536]

Ms Jowell: A product containing a blend of herbs, vitamins and minerals whose different elements could be sold separately under food law is not considered a medicinal product by the Medicines Control Agency, unless it is presented for treating or preventing disease or it may be administered with a view to restoring, correcting or modifying physiological functions in humans. However, where a herbal product—whether or not it includes non-herbal substances—is classified as a medicinal product it will be subject to medicines legislation. Herbal remedies, accordingly, require a marketing authorisation (product licence) unless they are exempt from licensing under the terms of Section 12 of the Medicines Act 1968. Section 132 of the Act makes it clear that the exemption for herbal remedies does not extend to products which contain active non-herbal substances.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what criteria are used by the Medicines Control Agency in classifying a blend of herbal, vitamin and mineral supplements as a medicine; whether the criteria include the availability of the product on general retail sale in other states in the European Union; and if it is the practice of the Agency to provide manufacturers of such blends with a statement of the reasons for so classifying a product. [58537]

Ms Jowell: In assessing whether a product is a medicine, the Medicines Control Agency (MCA) has regard to the definition of a medicinal product found in Pharmaceutical Directive 65/65/EEC. It also has regard to legal precedent, and its guidance, (including assessment criteria), which it has published in its leaflet Medicines Act Leaflet 8: "A guide to what is a medicinal product". On a case by case basis, the MCA decides whether a product is presented for treating or preventing disease, or may be administered with a view to restoring, correcting or modifying physiological functions in humans. If either or both, the product is a medicine. The MCA does regard a product's status in other member states as a relevant factor when coming to a decision on its classification in the United Kingdom.

When notifying a manufacturer that it has classified a product as a medicinal product, the MCA explains the grounds for its decision.

Dementia

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the future levels of demand for respite provision for those caring for people with dementia; and what policies he has in place to meet that demand. [58571]

Mr. Hutton: The Royal Commission on Long-term Care of the Elderly has been asked, in its terms of reference, to have regard to the number of people likely to require various kinds of long-term care in the future. The National Carers Strategy will draw together existing work within Government that impacts on carers, assess whether any of their key needs have been overlooked and set out an integrated strategy for future action by Government.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of research funded by his Department into ME and Chronic Fatigue Syndrome has been carried out by psychologists and psychiatrists. [58742]

Ms Jowell: Management of much of the research supported by the National Health Service research and development levy is devolved and details are not collected routinely by the Department. Information which is available centrally shows that the NHS R&D Programme has been funding a research project entitled "Should GPs manage chronic fatigue syndrome? A controlled trial", which has now reported. The lead researcher for this project was a General Practitioner. Further work is about to be commissioned through competitive tender on the topic of "Management Strategies for Chronic Fatigue Syndrome".

The Medical Research Council funded one study in relation to myalgic encephalomyelitis which has recently been completed. The work was undertaken at the University of Manchester and the project was entitled "The role of noradrenaline in the neuropsychological pathogenesis of the chronic fatigue syndrome". This project was led by a psychiatrist.

Health Authorities (Revenue Allocations)

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will announce the 1999–2000 revenue allocations for health authorities. [59480]

Mr. Dobson: The 1999–2000 unified revenue allocations for health authorities are given in the table. Unified allocations cover spending on hospital and community health services, general medical services (cash limited) and prescribing.

Pay Review Bodies

Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the terms of reference of the doctors' and dentists' and the nurses' review bodies. [59481]

Mr. Milburn: Earlier this year, I set out proposed terms of reference for the Doctors and Dentists Review Body (DDRB) and the Nurses, Midwives and Professions Allied to Medicine Review Body (NPRB). The Government have listened very carefully to the points made in consultation. As a result, we have been able to finalise the terms of reference. These are set out as follows.

Doctors and Dentists Review Body: Terms of Reference

The Review Body on Doctors' and Dentists' remuneration is independent. Its role is to make recommendations to the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for Health, the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Secretary of State for Wales on the remuneration of doctors and dentists taking any part in the NHS.

In reaching its recommendations, the Review Body is to have regard to the following considerations:

the need to recruit, retain and motivate doctors and dentists;

the Health Departments' output targets for the delivery of services, as set out by the Government;

the funds available to the Health Departments as set out in the Government's Departmental Expenditure Limits;

the Government's inflation target.

The Review Body may also be asked to consider other specific issues.

The Review Body is also required to take careful account of the economic and other evidence submitted by the Government, staff and professional representatives and others.

Reports and recommendations should be submitted jointly to the Secretary of State for Health, the Secretary of State for Scotland, the Secretary of State for Wales and the Prime Minister.

Nurses, Midwives, Health Visitors and Professionals Allied to Medicine Review Bodies: Terms of Reference

The Review Body on Nursing Staff, Midwives, Health Visitors and Professions Allied to Medicine (NPRB) remuneration is independent. Its role is to make recommendations to the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for Health, the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Secretary of State for Wales on the remuneration of

(i) Nurses, Midwives and Health Visitors employed in the NHS;

(ii) Physiotherapists, Radiographers, Remedial Gymnasts, Occupational Therapists, Orthoptists, Chiropodists, Dietitians and related grades employed in the NHS.

In reaching its recommendations, the Review Body is to have regard to the following considerations:

the need to recruit, retain and motivate nurses, midwives, health visitors and staff in the Professions Allied to Medicine;

the Health Departments' output targets for the delivery of services, as set out by the Government;

the funds available to the Health Departments as set out in the Government's Departmental Expenditure Limits;

the Government's inflation target.

The Review Body may also be asked to consider other specific issues.

The Review Body is also required to take careful account of the economic and other evidence submitted by the Government, staff and professional representatives and others.

Reports and recommendations should be submitted jointly to the Secretary of State for Health, the Secretary of State for Scotland, the Secretary of State for Wales and the Prime Minister.

Pharmacists' Bills

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what sum is currently owed on bills submitted by pharmacists to the Government; [58757]

(2) what the average length of time taken is for the Government to pay bills submitted by pharmacists. [58758]

Mr. Milburn: Pharmacies do not submit bills to the National Health Service for payment. Instead they submit prescription forms to the Prescription Pricing Authority (PPA) for pricing and payment in accordance with established procedures. Prescriptions may be dispensed at any time during a particular calender month. At the end of the month, prescriptions are batched and sent to the PPA for interpretation and the calculation of the payment due. Some 80 per cent. of the estimated sum due is paid at the end of the month in which the prescriptions are received, with an adjusted balance, paid at the end of the following month. Each month on average over £380 million is paid to pharmacies.

Car Park Charges

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what further guidance he has issued to health authorities and trusts concerning the levying of charges for car parking for staff and visitors. [59245]

Mr. Milburn: A guide to the implementation of car parking charges was issued in January 1996. Copies are available in the Library. No further guidance is planned.

Children's Services Grant

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has for payment of the Children's Services Grant after 2001–02. [59226]

Mr. Hutton: We will review the future of the Children's Services Grant in 2000, as part of the overall review of the Government's spending plans.

Surgical Instruments (Sterilisation)

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what (a) instruction or (b) guidelines his Department has (i) issued and (ii) intends to issue to require hospitals to amend the sterilisation procedure for surgical instruments in respect of (a) the temperature and (b) the duration of the autoclave cycle. [59155]

Ms Jowell: The Department issued guidance on hospital sterilization in "Health Technical Memorandum 2010" and in "Guidance on Decontamination". Copies are available in the Library.

In addition, updated and extended advice was issued in April 1998 by The Advisory Committee on Dangerous Pathogens and The Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee on handling surgical instruments used on patients known to have, or suspected of having, Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease (CJD). Having taken into account the available scientific evidence on both CJD and non variant CJD, this revised guidance recommends disposal of all instruments used on patients with clinical symptoms of any type of CJD. This advice also recommends temperatures and autoclave cycle durations appropriate for use in decontamination processes in certain other situations.

The advice is kept under constant review.

School Nurses and Health Visitors

Mr. Salter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the Minister of State's recent letter to North Thames and South Thames health authorities regarding school nurses and health visitors. [58737]

Mr. Milburn: The Department recently conducted a national survey in line with its agenda in relation to school nurses and health visitors which showed no uniform planned reduction in community nursing staff.

As a result of this survey my right hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health wrote on 19 October to the regional chairmen of those regions proposing reductions (which included North and South Thames) asking that they discuss with the relevant health authorities the reasons for, and the nature of, the reductions. Regional chairmen in North and South Thames in conjunction with the regional directors of nursing have contacted the relevant health authority chief executives to discuss the issues raised by my right hon. Friend's letter.

Waiting Times

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of typical waiting times between GP referrals and NHS consultant appointments. [57370]

Mr. Milburn: Data on waiting times for outpatient appointments in England are collected and published quarterly. Figures for the quarter ended 30 June 1998 showed that 96 per cent. of patients attending first out-patient appointments had waited under 26 weeks since general practitioner written referral, 82 per cent. had waited under 13 weeks and 38 per cent. had waited under 4 weeks.

Maternity Unit (Maldon)

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to reach a decision on the appeal by Mid Essex Community Health Council against the proposed closure of the maternity unit at St. Peter's Hospital, Maldon. [59271]

Mr. Milburn: We will announce our decision when we have given full and proper consideration to the proposals.

Hospital Unit Closures

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many appeals by community health councils against proposals to close hospital units are currently awaiting determination by him. [59273]

Mr. Milburn: There are eight contested proposals currently with Ministers.

Women's Issues

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish a report on the progress made on issues affecting women since May 1997. [59446]

Ms Jowell: We have published our report, "Delivering for women: Progress so far". This charts what has been achieved in the first 18 months of this Government to improve the lives of women. Copies of this report have been placed in the Library of the House, together with two research documents, "Researching Women's Attitudes" and "Tackling Violence Against Women", and it summarises reported action already taken by local authorities to protect women from violence. In addition the right hon. the Baroness Jay has, together with her right hon. Friends the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, issued new guidelines on Policy Appraisal for Equal Treatment to relevant officials throughout government. Copies of this have also been placed in the library of the House.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 11 November 1998

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Government Property Lawyers

Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Attorney-General, pursuant to his answer of 14 November 1997, Official Report, columns 683–84, concerning the Quinquennial Review of Government Property Lawyers, if he is able to report on the outcome of that review. [59646]

The Attorney-General: I am able to report that, following an evaluation of Government Property Lawyers and a further Prior Options Study, I have concluded that against the background of a declining work load the business of the GPL Agency has become non-viable and is likely to remain so and there is no longer a requirement to maintain a central conveyancing function in the public sector. Accordingly, the Government Property Lawyers Agency will close by 30 September 1999. I recognise that this announcement will come as a disappointment to the staff of the GPL. I should like, however, to pay tribute to their hard work and their commitment to the agency over the years.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Swanwick

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the steps taken to establish that no conflict of interest arose as a result of the Chairman of the DERA audit of Swanwick being also Chairman of EHI and Megitt. [58220]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 3 November 1998]: Before his appointment in June as Chairman of the DERA Audit, Sir Donald Spiers told my Department about those companies with which he was then involved and which had a connection with Lockheed Martin, namely EHI and Meggitt.

EHI is a trading company concerned with the provision of the EH101 helicopter. The MOD selected this helicopter for a Royal Navy role, and then separately selected Lockheed Martin to provide systems for it. Meggitt has a contract to supply military aircraft parts to a different part of the Lockheed Martin organisation from that which is working on the Swanwick centre.

We have also examined Sir Donald's involvement with Siemens Plessey Electronic Systems (SPES). Sir Donald ceased to be a non-executive director of SPES some two months before undertaking the DERA audit, and was unaware of the links between SPES and Lockheed Martin since he was concerned only with the defence interests of SPES.

We are satisfied that these links do not give rise to a conflict of interest with Sir Donald's chairmanship of the DERA audit.

Single Regeneration Budget

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of single regeneration budget money was given to schemes in seaside towns in each of the previous four SRB rounds. [58783]

Mr. Meale: As SRB funding is allocated to comprehensive schemes which may cover whole local authority districts or even counties, rather than specific towns within these areas, precise figures for the funding given to schemes in seaside towns are difficult to produce. However, of the total resources allocated under Rounds 1–3 of the Single Regeneration Budget, 4 per cent. (or £126.5 million) was targeted on schemes in 35 local authority districts classified as 'resort, retirement and port areas' by the 1991 Office for National Statistics (ONS) classification of districts. In SRB Round 4 a further £9.2 million, or 2.9 per cent. of the total, was allocated to schemes in the 'resort, retirement and port' category of the 1991 ONS classification.

Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to amend the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. [58789]

Mr. Meale: Proposals for improving the protection afforded to Sites of Special Interest (SSSI) are currently under consideration. Also, the Joint Nature Conservation Committee is reviewing the rationale behind the listing of threatened species on the Schedules associated with the Act. If appropriate, specific proposals for amending the Act will be put forward.

Airport Security Alerts

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many security alerts have occurred at (a) Heathrow, (b) Gatwick and (c) Stansted airports in each of the last three years. [58740]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The number of security alerts reported to the Department which involved the closure of all or part of the airport or pro-active response by the police, security staff or explosives officers is as follows:

	1996	1997	1998 (to end of October)
Heathrow	21	23	13
Gatwick	13	16	2
Stansted	3	3	2

Railfreight Link

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if his Department will give Government grant towards the proposed piggyback railfreight project to link the West Coast Main Line with mainland Europe. [58966]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Full grade piggyback would need considerable investment in infrastructure improvements and significant Government grant support. Railtrack has been in discussion with DETR officials for many months about the scheme.

Ministers are aware of recent press speculation that Railtrack is minded not to got through with the scheme and instead to propose an alternative freight upgrade to a smaller gauge but over more of the network. We have yet to receive a grant application from Railtrack. Any such application will be treated on its merits.

Red Fox

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the density of the red fox per square kilometre in each region of Great Britain. [59040]

Mr. Meale: Information in this form is not available.

The latest estimate (1994) for Great Britain of a total pre-breeding population was about 240,000. These comprised 195,000 in England, 23,000 in Scotland and 22,000 in Wales.

Sellafield

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the recent Environment Agency proposed decision concerning the MOX plant at Sellafield. [58780]

Mr. Meale: The Agency's draft determination was received in my Department on 2 November. Requests have been made to Ministers to call in the application for their own determination. These requests are being considered carefully and my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will announce their decision as soon as they are able to do so.

Cetaceans

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment the Government have made of the importance of the waters of the Atlantic Frontier as a habitat for whales and dolphins. [59020]

Mr. Meale: The Joint Nature Conservation Committee has carried out surveys for cetaceans in this area since 1985. The data point to these waters as being important in a UK context for large whales.

Welsh Highland Railway

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the proposed Welsh Highland Railway Order. [59307]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The public local inquiry into the application by the Ffestiniog Railway for this Order close on 28 January. The inquiry Inspector's report is being considered by the Secretary of State. A decision will be made as soon as possible.

Water Supply (Parasites)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals his Department has to protect the United Kingdom's water supply from being infected by parasites which are resistant to current water treatment process. [58714]

Mr. Meale: Water companies in England and Wales are under a duty to supply only drinking water that is wholesome. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Northern Ireland are answerable for similar provisions relating to Scotland and Northern Ireland.

My right hon. Friends the Minister for the Environment and the Minister for Public Health announced on 3 November 1998 that the Government have accepted in full the recommendations of the Expert Group, chaired by Professor Ian Bouchier, on Cryptosporidium in Water Supplies. These recommendations were drawn up following a thorough review of the measures necessary to protect drinking water supplies against contamination by the Cryptosporidium parasite and we expect water companies and other authorities to implement them. My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment also confirmed his intention to make Regulations in England and Wales that will ensure that water companies take proper precautions against Cryptosporidium contamination.

Emissions (Kyoto Summit)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has to introduce measures to ensure that the emission levels agreed at the Kyoto summit are achieved. [58717]

Mr. Meacher: On 26 October the UK became one of the first developed countries to launch a consultation paper on policy options for meeting its Kyoto commitment. The paper lists the steps the Government have already taken to reduce their emissions of greenhouse gases and sets out in detail further options. It demonstrates that the UK is well placed to meet both its legally binding Kyoto target to cut greenhouse gas emissions to 12.5 per cent. below 1990 levels by 2008 to 2012 and the domestic goal of a 20 per cent. cut in CO_2 emissions by 2010. Following the consultation exercise, we shall develop a new climate change programme in good time for ratification of the Kyoto Protocol.

Drinking Water

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the different sources of drinking water used in the United Kingdom; and what proportion each source contributes to the annual water supply. [58841]

Mr. Meale: In England and Wales about one third of drinking water is taken from groundwater sources; one third from upland surface water sources, such as reservoirs, lakes, impoundments and streams; and one third from lowland river sources, direct, or via short term bankside storage or long term storage reservoirs. There are, however, considerable variations in these proportions across the country. The position in Scotland and Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Northern Ireland.

Railtrack

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with Railtrack about its moratorium on spending on its track and signalling renewal programme. [58843]

Ms Glenda Jackson: None. Railtrack has assured the Department that there is no such moratorium. Railtrack's Network Management Statement sets out the company's expenditure forecasts for track and signalling renewal—£340 million and £200 million respectively for 1998–99 (1997–98 prices)—and the Government expect Railtrack to meet these targets.

Economic Instruments for Water Pollution

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many responses he received to his consultation document, "Economic Instruments for Water Pollution"; if he will list the respondents; and what arrangements exist for the responses to be viewed. [58967]

Mr. Meale: 134 organisations responded to the consultation paper "Economic Instruments for Water Pollution". I have placed a list of these in the Library of the House. Responses were also received from 26 individuals. These responses, except those from organisations or individuals who asked for their comments not to be made public, are available to be viewed through the library of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions.

Maritime Services (Charges)

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has to issue a consultation paper on a policy for charging for maritime services currently provided free by his Department; and if he will make a statement. [59092]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Within Government, we are currently undertaking a review of policy on charging for maritime services and infrastructure. If we decide to propose new initiatives we shall consult publicly before taking any final decisions.

Shared Ownership

Ms Dari Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he has any plans to continue the Do-It-Yourself shared ownership scheme. [59553]

Ms Armstrong: I announced plans on 30 July 1998, Official Report, column 417, to replace Do-It-Yourself Shared Ownership (DIYSO) and the Tenants Incentive Scheme (TIS) with Homebuy. The Housing Corporation has since been consulting on proposals for the new scheme.

I have received representations that some potential DIYSO purchasers will be unable to afford Homebuy in certain areas. To reflect these concerns I have decided that local authorities should continue to have the option to offer DIYSO through the Local Authority Social Housing Grant mechanism, initially for a further two years, after which I will review the position.

I believe that there is a strong case for rationalising the home ownership schemes funded through the Housing Corporation's Approved Development Programme (ADP). Local priorities are likely to result in a higher proportion of the ADP being allocated to rental schemes. With a smaller home ownership programme it makes sense to concentrate resources on a smaller range of schemes which will be simpler for tenants to understand and for landlords to administer.

The Housing Corporation's conventional shared ownership scheme will continue to be available in its present form. This provides opportunities for low cost home ownership and encourages the development of housing schemes with a mix of tenures.

We remain fully committed to promoting sustainable home ownership. I am confident that the schemes provided through the Housing Corporation will continue to make an effective contribution to this objective.

Groundwater

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to protect groundwater. [59640]

Mr. Meacher: I have today laid before the House new Regulations (the Groundwater Regulations 1998) which will provide additional protection for groundwater. The Regulations cover England, Wales and Scotland.

The Regulations introduce controls over disposals to land which could pollute groundwater, prohibit discharges of List I substances to groundwater, and provide powers for the environment agencies to control activities which may pollute groundwater. Activities already controlled by a waste management licence are excluded from the scope of the Regulations since groundwater protection is, where appropriate, already taken into account in waste management assessments.

Groundwater is an increasingly important good quality resource for drinking water as well as a vital element of the aquatic environment. By affording additional protection to groundwater, the Regulations should help to contain water undertakers' costs where it is necessary to clean up aquifers. There should also be longer term environmental gains through enhanced protection of water quality.

The Regulations apply to all groundwater and their scope is potentially wide, but the sectors most likely to be affected are those where discharges or disposals to land which could affect groundwater have not been regulated as a matter of course, such as the spreading of used sheep dip.

The Regulations have been subject to wide public consultation as a result of which my officials and the environment agencies have sought to develop a simplified approach to implementation. The Environment Agency has also issued a consultation paper on a revised charging scheme. This provides for reduced charges for applications for authorisations relating to small and infrequent disposals to land, such as those arising from agriculture. A similar approach is likely in Scotland.

The Department intends in due course to consult on draft guidance on implementation of the Regulations.

Radioactive Waste

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to the oral Statement by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence of 2 November 1998, Official Report, column 540, if he will make a further statement on the timetable for the issue of a consultation paper on radioactive waste management. [59641]

Mr. Meacher: The House of Lord Select Committee on Science and Technology's inquiry into "The Management of Nuclear Waste in the UK" is currently taking evidence from interested parties. The inquiry is expected to be completed by the end of the year. The Government will respond to the Committee within two months of its report. The Government aim to issue a consultation paper on radioactive waste management about six months after that.

Policy Appraisal

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he plans to publish the work commissioned to follow-up the Policy Appraisal and the Environment initiative. [59642]

Mr. Meacher: DETR commissioned a report, from consultants EFTEC under the leadership of Prof. David Pearce, which is published today under the title "Review of Technical Guidance on Environmental Appraisal". This important report surveys the range of environmental appraisal guidance methodologies available internationally and points the way to the right technique for appraising different types of decisions. The report concludes that considerable guidance is available, but identifies areas where more guidance would be useful to practitioners. DETR is therefore commissioning work in these areas to make good this gap.

First, more technical guidance is needed in some areas. The Government will initiate projects with private sector contractors to provide guidance material on Undertaking Multicriteria Analysis and on Undertaking Contingent Valuation, which should be of potential use in both DETR and other Departments.

Secondly, most existing guidance relates to projects, and somewhat different techniques are needed to help decision makers screen policies and programmes for potential environmental impacts. The Government agree with this finding, and may develop further the guidance that has already been made available to staff.

The report from professor David Pearce makes a highly constructive contribution to the pursuit of better environmental appraisal in decision making. Through its analysis of existing guidance, it will be of use not just to the UK Government, but to all who want to consider the environmental impacts of decision making. The Government accept the conclusions about the areas where further work would be useful—Green Ministers are discussing the best way to address these, notably in the area of policy appraisal.

Copies of the report have been sent today to the Chairman of the Parliamentary Environmental Audit Committee, and placed in the House Library.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Voluntary and Community Sector

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on relations between Government and the voluntary and community sector in England. [59608]

Mr. Straw: A Compact setting out a framework for relations between Government and the Voluntary and Community Sector in England will be published on Thursday 12 November. Copies of the document will be placed in the Library. Separate Compacts have been developed in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to receive the further report referred to in his letter to hon. Members dated 30 July, on the operation of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement on the Government's intention to appoint a Royal Commission on animal experiments. [59028]

Mr. George Howarth: I understand that the Animal Procedures Committee is currently working to finalise a further report on its review of the operation of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

With regard to the Royal Commission, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones) on 3 November 1998, Official Report, columns 473–74.

Pre-Marital Counselling

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the Society of Registration Officers on the provision of premarital counselling to those who marry in registry offices; and if he will make available extra resources to (a) train existing staff in pre-marital counselling skills and (b) recruit and train the extra staff required. [58764]

Mr. Boateng: My officials have met members of the Society of Registration Officers, together with other registrars. They were interested in, and broadly supportive of, the Government's proposals concerning the role of registrars.

The consultation document "Supporting Families" proposes that registrars might offer information to couples about marriage and the pre-marriage support services available. This might take the form of a marriage preparation pack produced by experts in the field. Counselling of couples by registration officers is not proposed.

The consultation period of "Supporting Families" runs to 31 January 1999. The Society of Registration Officers has been invited to comment on the Government's proposals. The Government will decide on the allocation of resources once the consultation exercise is completed and decisions have been taken on what should be implemented.

Police Forces (Ethnic Composition)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the numbers of police officers in each police force area broken down by grade and indicating for each grade how many are of Asian origin. [59073]

Mr. Boateng: The information is set out in the table. Further information on ethnic minority staff in the police service can be obtained in Home Office Statistical Bulletin "Police Service Personnel" (Issue 17/98) issued on 3 September 1998, a copy of which is in the Library.

Asylum Seekers

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of scurvy have been reported each year over the last five years in hostels for asylum seekers in the Greater London area. [58955]

Ms Jowell: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested is not held centrally.

TREASURY

Agriculture (Revenue)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what amount of revenue for the Exchequer has been generated by the agriculture sector for each of the last 10 years (a) in cash terms, (b) in current prices and (c) as a percentage of total revenue. [57508]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 2 November 1998]: The information is not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

GDP Growth

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the GDP growth required in each of the next three financial years to satisfy the golden rule. [58837]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 10 November 1998]: The projections set out in the Pre-Budget published on 3 November 1998 show that the Government expect to meet both their fiscal rules over the economic cycle. Paragraph 2.56 of that report explains how these projects are robust to errors in short-term growth forecasts.

Pensioners (Fuel Bills)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his oral statement of 3 November 1998, Official Report, columns 681–88, if he will provide a breakdown of his estimate of the savings made by (a) single pensioners and (b) the poorest pensioners on their fuel bills. [58991]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 9 November 1998]: The table provides a breakdown of the real term savings on pensioners' fuel bills between price reductions and winter fuel payments. The fuel bills include VAT.

Pensioners' real term savings on fuel bills: 1997–99

	Savings from VAT reduction, regulation and competition[1]	Average winter fuel payment[2]	Total
Average pensioner household	62	46	108
Pensioner household on Income Support[3]	50	90	140

[1] Assuming annual gas consumption of 18,000kwh, electricity consumption of 3,300kwh.
[2] Weighted average, 1995 prices.
[3] A lower gas consumption of 12,000kwh is assumed.

Correspondence

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Financial Secretary will provide a substantive reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Taunton ref. DC/3867, dated 9 September. [59150]

Dawn Primarolo: I have replied to the hon. Member.

Euro Notes

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) for what reasons euro notes are printed by the Bank of England at Debden in Essex; [58017]

(2) how many euro notes have been printed by the Bank of England at Debden in Essex; at what cost; of what denominations; for what purpose; and who will bear the cost; [58079]

(3) if euro notes printed by the Bank of England at Debden, Essex display the Queen's head. [58287]

Ms Hewitt: Since the European Monetary Institute (EMI) was established in 1994, the Bank of England has been closely involved, along with other EU central banks, in the technical preparation of the euro banknotes. As part of this work, the Bank has agreed to participate in a trial of notes to be introduced in 2002 in countries joining the single currency on 1 January 1999 to ensure consistency of paper quality, colour etc., across different types of banknote printing machines. The designs are therefore in accordance with the European Central Bank's announcement on euro note designs of 11 September. The notes being printed are for analytical and comparative purposes and will not be issued in the UK.

The trial will involve the Bank printing some 2 million of each of the 20 and 50 euro notes, and 5 million of the 5 euro note. The total cost of this exercise will be approximately £300,000 and will be paid out of the proceeds of the note issue.

Economic and Monetary Union

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the outcome of the most recent meeting of the Standing Committee on Preparations for EMU. [59576]

Mr. Gordon Brown: The Standing Committee on preparations for EMU met for the third time on 27 October. A copy of the minutes of the meeting has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The Committee was informed of the success of the Government's national information campaign and received reports on public and private sector preparations.

Breast Cancer

Ms Perham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many cases of breast cancer have been diagnosed in women aged 65 years and over in the last year; and how many resulting fatalities there have been in women aged 65 years and over in each of the last five years. [59146]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Ms Linda Perham, dated 11 November 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent question on the cases of breast cancer in women over 65 years.

Provisional figures show that there were 12,708 newly diagnosed cases of breast cancer in women aged 65 years and over in England and Wales in 1994 (the most recent year for which data are available); the numbers of deaths in 1993–1997 are given in the table below.

Deaths from breast cancer in England and Wales, 1993–1997

Year	Number
1993	8,172
1994	7,998
1995	7,829
1996	7,748
1997	7,579

CABINET OFFICE

Public Appointments (Ethnic Origins)

Helen Jones: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what plans he has to change the Government's policy on non-disclosure of information on the ethnic origin of individuals appointed to public bodies. [59575]

Mr. Kilfoyle: In line with the Government's commitment to greater openness in public appointments, a new policy is being introduced with effect from 1 April 1999. This will require all departments to collect ethnic origin data for their public appointees, on the understanding that such information will be made publicly available on request, subject to the consent of the individuals concerned. The policy will apply to new appointments and re-appointments made from that date.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Aid

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the percentage of the population of England and Wales eligible for green form advice and assistance (a) with no contribution and (b) with a contribution, in each of the last 10 years. [58322]

Mr. Hoon: We do not collect information on eligibility for non-contributory legal advice and assistance under the green form scheme. Contributory green form advice and assistance was abolished on 12 April 1993.

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the percentage of the population of England and Wales eligible for (a) criminal legal aid and (b) civil legal aid (i) with no contribution and (ii) with a contribution, in each of the last 10 years. [58321]

Mr. Hoon: There is no upper financial limit for criminal legal aid so the question of an eligible population does not arise.

For civil legal aid, the percentage of households in England and Wales eligible in each year for 1992/93, being the earliest year for which figures are readily available, was as follows:

Percentage

Year	Non contributory	Contributory
1992–93	29	24
1993–94	23	25
1994–95	24	26
1995–96	24	26
1996–97	23	25
1997–98	23	25

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the percentage of people in receipt of (a) family credit and (b) housing benefit, entitled to civil legal aid (i) with no contribution and (ii) with a contribution, in each of the last 10 years. [58323]

Mr. Hoon: We do not collect the information requested.

PRIME MINISTER

Area Cost Adjustment

Q13. Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to reform the area cost adjustment. [57842]

The Prime Minister: We expect to announce our proposals for Standard Spending Assessments for 1999/2000 in due course.

Electoral Reform (Referendum)

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer of 4 November 1998, Official Report, column 868, when he expects to announce the date of the referendum on the voting system. [59292]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 10 November 1998]: The date has not been decided. It had always been envisaged that the referendum would take place before the next election. It should be held at the earliest moment it is sensible to do so, in the light of all the constitutional changes we anticipate and the recommendations of the Jenkins Commission. If it proves impossible to do so before the election for sound practical reasons, then it should be held at the earliest moment it is appropriate to do so.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 11 November. [58839]

The Prime Minister: Earlier today, together with Madam Speaker and right hon. and hon. Members and millions of people across the country, I observed a two-minute silence to commemorate the sacrifices made by so many on behalf of us all.

Later today in addition to my duties in the House I will have meetings with Ministerial colleagues and others.

Government Service Delivery

Mr. Webb: To ask the Prime Minister if it is the Government's policy to promote the concept of a single account which would handle most financial transactions between Government and the individual. [59145]

Mr. Kilfoyle: I have been asked to reply.

The concept of a single account is one of a number of ideas, which are being considered as possible ways of simplifying the delivery of Government services for the citizen.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

World Bank

9. Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she last met the President of the World bank to discuss the impact of world financial affairs on international development; and if she will make a statement. [57809]

Clare Short: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor and I met the President of the World Bank during the Annual Meetings in Washington in early October. During our discussions, and at the meetings themselves, we stressed the importance we attach to addressing the social implications of the current financial crisis. This is important because the poor had no part in causing the crisis and should not be left to bear the brunt but also because national consensus is needed to carry through some of the reforms needed to overcome the crisis. This is unlikely to be reached in highly divided societies. The communiqués of the Interim and Development Committees reflected our concerns, noting the need to mitigate the most harmful effects of the crisis on the poor.

Child Labour

10. Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress has been made on measures to ensure that companies work to eliminate the use of child labour in countries where they operate or are supplied from. [57811]

Mr. Foulkes: We support the Ethical Trading Initiative (ETI) whose members—companies, development NGOs and trade unions—are developing best practices in implementing voluntary supplier codes. Among other things, these codes aim to eliminate child labour in supply chains. ETI is part of a consumer-led movement against child labour to which many companies have responded.

We are also supporting ILO programmes for the elimination of child labour which are supported by the unions, Governments and employers representatives that make up the ILO governing body. In addition we are examining the scope for increasing the effectiveness of the OECD Guidelines for Multinational Enterprises and will be pressing for the incorporation of the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, of which the effective abolition of child labour is a crucial part.

Non-governmental Organisations

11. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the current role of (a) NGOs and (b) the private sector in the delivery of aid using resources from the UK Government. [57812]

Clare Short: Where possible we work to strengthen local capacity in developing countries to manage and deliver improvements in health care, education, governance and economic management. Frequently NGOs and private sector consultants assist these efforts. We have established a Business Partnership Unit in DFID in order to work with the private sector to encourage and facilitate beneficial investment in developing countries. We are currently consulting NGOs and civil society world wide on how NGOs can best assist the implementation of the international poverty eradication strategy.

Debt Relief

12. Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her Department's debt-reduction programmes. [57813]

Clare Short: My Department supports debt reduction programmes where these help eradicate poverty and has obtained agreement at the annual meeting of the World Bank and IMF that the HIPC initiative will be reviewed to ensure that debt relief contributes to poverty elimination. My Department has written off £1.26 billion of debt since 1978. We are seeking to speed up the implementation of the HIPC initiative to ensure that all eligible countries are on track for debt relief by 2000. We are currently providing £100 million to help some HIPC countries meet their debt service payments in advance of receiving debt relief.

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent steps the Government have taken to alleviate the adverse effects of the burden of debt repayments of the poorest countries of the world. [59005]

Clare Short: Over the past eighteen months, the Department for International Development (DFID) has cancelled some £30 million of bilateral aid debts, and provided some £36 million to help the African Development Bank meet its share of the cost of implementing the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) debt Initiative. In addition, we are providing around £100 million to help a number of developing countries meet their debt service payments to the international financial institutions; we have committed $10 million to help meet Mozambique's residual financing gap under the HIPC Initiative; and we have contributed £400,000 to Debt Relief International, a London based organisation, which delivers technical assistance in debt management to poor countries. We are also funding research on the key issues of debt sustainability and internal debt.

As well as providing direct financial support to help relieve poor countries of their debt burdens, we are taking action to ensure that the forthcoming comprehensive review of the HIPC Initiative looks at whether sufficient levels of debt relief are being provided to developing countries. We are pressing for the review to examine in more detail the relationship between debt relief and poverty reduction, to make certain that debt relief will help developing countries achieve the international development targets. And the Chancellor and I have just proposed a new initiative, calling on bilateral and multilateral creditors to find ways of providing debt relief to countries which have been struck by natural disasters, thereby freeing urgent resources to fund emergency relief and reconstruction.

22. Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on action her Department is taking to relieve the pressure of chronic debts for the poorest developing countries. [57823]

Clare Short: The Chancellor and I are working to seek international agreement to speed up the implementation of the Highly Indebted Poor Countries Initiative so that all eligible countries will be on track for debt relief by 2000. In addition over the last eighteen months, the Department for International Development (DFID) has cancelled some £30 million of bilateral aid debts, and provided some £36 million to help the African Development Bank meet its share of the cost of implementing the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) debt Initiative. We are also providing around £100 million to help a number of developing countries meet their debt service payments to the international financial institutions. We have committed $10 million to help meet Mozambique's residual financing gap under the HIPC Initiative; and we have contributed £400,000 to Debt Relief International to provide technical assistance in debt management to poor countries. We are also funding research on the key issues of debt sustainability and internal debt.

We are also taking action to ensure that the forthcoming comprehensive review of the HIPC Initiative looks at whether sufficient levels of debt relief is being provided to developing countries. We are pressing for the review to examine in more detail the relationship between debt relief and poverty reduction, to make certain that debt relief will help developing countries achieve the international development targets.

St. Helena

13. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to visit the island of St. Helena to discuss future aid provision. [57814]

Mr. Foulkes: There are no immediate plans for a Ministerial visit to St. Helena.

Multilateral Agreement on Investment

14. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent representations she has received in relation to the impact of the proposed multilateral agreement on investment on future development needs. [57815]

Clare Short: I have received a large number of letters from members of the public, Members of Parliament and non-governmental organisations about the proposed Multilateral Agreement on Investment (MAI). My Department is in regular contact with non-governmental organisations taking an interest in the MAI. Officials from my Department and the Department of Trade and Industry met a group of experts from the academic community in September to discuss the development implications of the MAI.

19. Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the impact of the multilateral agreement on investment on future development needs. [57820]

Clare Short: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) on 28 October 1998, Official Report, column 203.

Bangladesh

15. Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the situation in Bangladesh following the recent floods. [57816]

Clare Short: Monsoon flooding in Bangladesh this year was the most prolonged this century, lasting more than 10 weeks in some areas. Waters began to recede from central districts in mid-September, and broadly returned to normal by the end of the month, though waterlogging persists in some areas. The Government of Bangladesh, in partnership with the World Band and the Asian Development Bank in particular, have moved rapidly to begin repair of roads, bridges, railways and flood protection embankments. Major communications are fully restored, though very considerable work remains to be done on many rural roads and other infrastructure.

Although many people are short of food, often for want of immediate employment, and there have been outbreaks of diarrhoeal disease, there is at present no famine or unusual epidemic of diseases as suggested by some media reports. However there has been an almost complete loss of seasonal crops in some areas, and many people have lost homes, assets and livelihoods. Millions of people require assistance to restart rural livelihoods, rebuild their homes, and earn a living. The Government of Bangladesh are distributing food to vulnerable people, and the gap in food supply is being managed through increased public and private sector imports. They are managing the food supply jointly with the World Food Programme, and providing small cash grants. The UK has contributed £11 million to ensuring food availability over the coming months. NGOs are also helping with small grants and loans to restore homes and livelihoods.

Much of the restoration of infrastructure will be done through cash of food for work schemes to give people an income. DFID is contributing a further £10 million in projects to rehabilitate agriculture, essential infrastructure, and to support NGO projects which help the poor rebuild their lives. In parallel with urgent work which has already started, donors, including the UK, are working in sector sub groups jointly with Government and some NGO partners, to establish the full extent of priority rehabilitation needs. The situation is expected to appear to return to normal in around five months, but continuing attention to the longer term, unseen impacts on the economy, financial institutions and peoples' assets will be needed for some time to come.

20. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what help she is giving the Government of Bangladesh to remove arsenic from subterranean water supplies. [57821]

Clare Short: The Department for International Development (DFID) has been assisting efforts to understand the causes of arsenic in ground water in Bangladesh and developing plans to address the problem. Arsenic occurs naturally as a result of geochemical processes. It can be tackled only by avoiding contaminated sources or treating water at the surface. The World Bank is co-ordinating assistance, and has allocated $30 million to helping counteract arsenic contamination. DFID has provided £0.5 million to fund the technical research needed to implement this, working through the British Geological Survey with the Department of Public Health in Dhaka. We are also appraising a larger project which would pilot community schemes for the treatment of polluted water and the medical care of those affected by arsenicosis. The project would also study why the problem affects some individuals and not others. It is hoped that the pilot, if effective, may form a model for replication by others.

Commonwealth Development Corporation

16. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the future of the Commonwealth Development Corporation. [57817]

Clare Short: We intend to put legislative proposals to Parliament as early as possible to pave the way for the creation of a public/private partnership with the Commonwealth Development Corporation which will benefit from both its association with Government and the participation of the private sector, and which will enable CDC to contribute more effectively to the sustainable development of poor countries.

Genetically Modified Organisms

17. Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the potential impact on poor farmers of terminator gene technology. [57818]

Clare Short: My Department is currently undertaking a wide-ranging review of the implications of all aspects of genetically modified organisms for poor farmers in developing countries.

This study will assess the impact of specific technologies, including terminator gene technology, and will be made publicly available.

Fraud

18. Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what priority her Department gives to countering fraud in its aid programmes. [57819]

Clare Short: My Department gives a high priority to preventing fraud. To ensure regularity, propriety and value for money in the expenditure of aid funds, Departmental staff and aid recipients are required to follow detailed procedures and to keep comprehensive financial records. Our control systems are under constant review by our internal auditors and are subject to examination by the National Audit Office.

Full details of the Department for International Development's (DFID) procedures for authorising and accounting for expenditure are set out in the Department's Office Instructions, copies of which are in the Library of the House.

Tanzania

21. Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her recent visit to Tanzania to discuss development. [57822]

Clare Short: I had a very useful and constructive visit to Tanzania in late August. I was able to discuss a range of development issues affecting one of the poorest countries in the World and one of Britain's main development partners. In meetings with the President, ministers, politicians, officials and donor, private sector and civil society representatives I outlined Britain's policy for international development, which matches closely with Tanzania's own poverty eradication strategy. I urged progress on corruption and speedy reform of the health and education sectors to improve the quality of services. I was impressed by DFID-supported projects helping to improve family health and to improve people's livelihoods in poor rural areas. I also signed an agreement to provide £60 million budgetary support over the next two years. This includes up to £50 million in multilateral debt relief, which will be used to release Tanzania's revenues for expenditure on pro-poor areas of the budget.

Romania

23. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions her Department has held in the last 12 months with the Government of Romania on the issue of the welfare and protection of children. [57824]

Clare Short: Discussions and collaboration have continued with the Romanian government through the European Children's Trust on a project to strengthen the capacity of local government to improve the welfare of vulnerable children and families.

Our assistance has included:

advice on the responsibilities and structures of local authorities to enable them to own and manage services to vulnerable children and families; advice on systems and models within which integrated social work services can operate, and support for the establishment of Centres for Family Support and Child Protection in five countries.

We are also supporting 2 small projects, both based in Arad, which will strengthen the capacity of the local government to help young people from orphanages.

So far we have spent £360,000 on these projects.

Aid Disbursement

24. Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will take steps to increase the accountability of the way in which EU aid money is disbursed. [57825]

Clare Short: We consistently support measures to improve the financial management and control of the Community budget. In particular we support measures to strengthen the role of the European Court of Auditors which were agreed at the Amsterdam Intergovernmental conference last year. Improving financial management and strengthening the fight against fraud were priorities of the UK Presidency of the EU.

26. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the proportion of the UK aid programme which is disbursed through multilateral organisations. [57827]

Clare Short: In 1997–98 nearly one half of the UK aid programme was disbursed through multilateral organisations.

Jubilee 2000

25. Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what support her Department is giving to the Jubilee 2000 project. [57826]

Clare Short: My Department gives no financial support to Jubilee 2000. But we share the objective of early cancellation of the unpayable debts of the poorest, most heavily indebted countries. I was pleased to have been able to address the Jubilee 2000 rally in Birmingham in May, attended by some 50,000 people from all over Britain lobbying for the cancellation of debt to the poorest countries. This helped to ensure that debt was on the agenda of the G8 Summit. We are clear that debt relief is a necessary but not a sufficient condition for consistent poverty reduction. Some very poor countries have managed to pay their debt but need assistance to support poverty reduction and some countries such as Uganda which have received debt relief need continuing development assistance if they are to meet the international poverty eradication targets.

Kosovo

27. Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment her Department has made of the assistance needs of the people of Kosovo. [57828]

Clare Short: The most pressing need is to provide emergency assistance to the displaced, and in particular to those without adequate shelter, to enable them to survive the winter. My Department has allocated £3 million to UNHCR, ICRC and to UK NGOs, such as Oxfam and

Save the Children Fund, primarily to meet these winterisation needs through the provision of materials to repair homes and construct shelters, clothes and blankets, and stoves and fuel.

UN Funds for Population Activities

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will seek to persuade (a) the United States Government to reinstate its funding for United Nations Funds for Population Activities for the coming year and (b) other EU Governments to increase their contributions to United Nations Funds for Population Activities. [57951]

Clare Short: The quinquennial review of the International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD) is an opportunity for all Governments to review their support to population and reproductive health programmes, including the work of the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA). We are doing all that we can to ensure that resources to implement ICPD are forthcoming.

Rain Forests

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what measures her Department has taken to encourage tropical nations to maintain the size and diversity of their rain forests. [58715]

Clare Short: My Department's aim is the elimination of poverty through the promotion of sustainable development, including conservation of the environment. Our approach towards the conservation of rain forests and the problem of deforestation is to support work with our country partners bilaterally and multilaterally to improve management of forest resources in ways that lead to a range of benefits to poor communities as well as helping to secure the global environmental benefits that forests offer. These activities positively encourage partner countries to protect and maintain the size and diversity of their forests.

Our approach to forests, encompasses a wide range of interventions from policy and sector planning, institutional development, education and training, through to forest information systems, forest management, forest conservation and research. The current portfolio of projects represents a commitment of £128 million.

In the past year, DFID has also supported a number of important new initiatives, for example:

- a grant of £3 million to the Guyana Sustainable Human Development Project, which will benefit forest-dependent communities encircling the Iwokrama Rain Forest.
- a grant of £2 million to the UNDP's Global Programme on Forests: Forest Management to Support Sustainable Livelihoods Project, which will promote public and private sector partnerships for sustainable forest management.
- a grant of £400,000 to the FRA 2000 project—FAO's global assessment of the status and condition of forest resources.

DFID also played an active part in the development and implementation of the Action Programme on Forests which was approved by Foreign Ministers and endorsed by Heads of Government at the G8 Birmingham Summit. This commits G8 Members to a range of specific measures at domestic and international levels designed to support sustainable forest management. DFID is also actively involved in the UN Intergovernmental Forum on Forests, whose remit is to promote and facilitate the implementation of the Intergovernmental Panel on Forests (IPF) proposals for action, and reviewing, monitoring and reporting on progress in the management, conservation and sustainable development of all types of forests. The UNDP Global Programme on Forests to which DFID has provided a substantial contribution will concentrate on the implementation of the IPF's proposals for action. DFID also continues to support the work of the International Tropical Timber Organisation, which is dedicated to promoting the conservation, sustainable management and rational utilisation and trade of the world's tropical forest resources, through international co-operation.

Details of my Department's forestry activities are set out in our publications: forests MATTER and our DFID Forestry Sector Projects, both of which are in the Library of the House and are available from DFID's Environment Policy Department.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Police Interviews (Audio Recording)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the differences between the draft code of practice on audio recording of police interviews with terrorist suspects and those which apply elsewhere in the United Kingdom [58319]

Mr. Ingram: There is no formal arrangement in Great Britain for the audio recording of police interviews with terrorist suspects. The recently published Draft Code of Practice under Section 53A of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996 has been largely modelled on the equivalent Code of Practice made under the Police and Criminal Evidence legislation, with some differences. Following consideration of comments made during the current consultation exercise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State may modify the Draft Code, and will then lay it in Parliament for approval by both Houses.

Integrated Education

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money has been saved by the Government as a result of its decision not to fund the education of the children of Oakwood Integrated Primary School, Strangford Integrated College and Ulidia Integrated College, since they opened; and if she will make a statement. [58555]

Mr. McFall: The source information required to establish accurately the recurrent budget the above schools would have received if they had been grant-aided is not currently available to the Department of Education. Based on an average per capita allocation it is estimated that their budgets would have totalled about £1,270,000 had they been grant-aided since they opened.

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what plans she has to support the Integrated Education Fund in achieving their stated target for children in Northern Ireland attending integrated schooling by 2008; and if she will make a statement; [58551]

(2) what plans she has to remove matters of opinion from the criteria applied in assessing a school in Northern Ireland for integrated status; and if she will make a statement; [58549]

(3) when the Integrated Education Working Group will publish its report; and if she will make a statement; [58553]

(4) when she will announce her decision on whether she will recognise Oakwood Integrated Primary School, Strangford Integrated College and Ulidia Integrated College; and if she will make a statement; [58557]

(5) what objectives she has set for the Integrated Education Working Group; and if she will make a statement; [58552]

(6) what plans the Government have to make a financial contribution to the running of Oakwood Integrated Primary School, Strangford Integrated College and Ulidia Integrated College; and if she will make a statement; [58556]

(7) what is the Government's target for the percentage of children attending integrated schools in Northern Ireland by 2008; and if she will make a statement; [58550]

(8) what criteria need to be met to enable a school to be formally recognised as an integrated school; and if she will make a statement. [58558]

Mr. McFall: Government do not set targets for the expansion of Integrated schools. Government policy is to encourage and facilitate integrated education and in responding to parental demand the DENI will continue to support robust proposals for both new and transforming integrated schools.

The Integrated Education Working Group has been considering how all schools might contribute to the promotion of a culture of tolerance, concentrating initially on integrated schools and integration within schools. A Progress Report from the group has been received very recently and I will wish to take time to consider its findings and conclusions before arranging for its wider publication. However, I expect the report to provide the strategic context within which the Integrated Education Fund, which is represented on the Working Group, can take forward its 10-year Development Plan.

Proposals for new integrated schools are considered against well-established criteria which include intake and enrolment viability, religious balance, availability of alternative integrated provision, impact on other schools, availability of a suitable, cost-effective site, affordability, and consideration of objections. There are no plans to change the existing criteria.

Development proposals for Oakwood Integrated Primary School, Strangford Integrated College and Ulidia Integrated College are currently under consideration and it is hoped to announce decisions before Christmas. If the proposals are approved, the schools will be eligible for 100 per cent. recurrent funding with effect from September 1999 and, when longer term viability has been established, will also be eligible for capital grant towards accommodation needs.

Marriages (Special Licence)

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people were married by special licence in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years. [59024]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The information requested above in relation to total marriages by special licence is set out in the table.

Marriages by special licence

Industrial Development Board

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures she proposes to improve the (a) accountability, (b) targeting of investment, (c) stricter adherence to investment criteria and (d) development of performance indicators for the Industrial Development Board's overseas offices. [59181]

Mr. Ingram: All these issues have been considered by the Comptroller and Auditor General for Northern Ireland in his report on inward investment which was presented to the House of Commons on 27 October. As the report may be the subject of consideration by the Committee of Public Accounts of this House, it would not be appropriate for me to pre-empt such consideration by commenting on these matters.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the Northern Ireland Audit Office report into the operation of the Industrial Development Board's inward investment programme from 1987 to 1997. [59179]

Mr. Ingram: As this Report has been presented to the House of Commons and may be the subject of detailed consideration by the Committee of Public Accounts of this House it would not be appropriate for me to comment on the Report at this point in time.

Inward Investment

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps she will take to attract inward investment projects to the 11 designated areas of social need in Northern Ireland. [59180]

Mr. Ingram: The Industrial Development Board (IDB) for Northern Ireland continues to promote the excellent business opportunities for investment in Northern Ireland through initiatives such as the recent North American Roadshow. Higher levels of assistance are available to projects located in or adjacent to areas of social need, and the IDB seeks to achieve its targets of 75 per cent. of all first time projects to be located in or adjacent to these areas.

SCOTLAND

Chefs

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had on the provision of chefs in the Scottish tourism industry with the Scottish Tourist Board; and what plans he has to bring forward initiatives to encourage more students to train as chefs. [57066]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 5 November 1998]: There are already several initiatives in place to promote and develop career opportunities in the hospitality sector. These are being undertaken by Scottish Enterprise, Highlands and Islands Enterprise and their local enterprise companies. An assessment of the scope for further action, particularly in relation to the provision of chefs, will be informed by a meeting which Scottish Enterprise is expected to have shortly with the Scottish Chefs Association. While the Scottish Tourist Board and I have not so far discussed this matter, we may do so in the future if it appears appropriate.

Teachers

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many new teacher posts have been created in each of the last five years in the secondary phase. [58292]

Mrs. Liddell: The information is not available in the format requested. Information is collected on the overall number of teachers employed in publicly funded schools. These data cannot be used to determine the number of new "posts" created in any year.

City Status

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if the process by which the Government will draw up their advice to Her Majesty the Queen for the awarding of city status will be the same in Scotland as in the rest of the United Kingdom; [58734]

(2) what arrangements his Department proposes to make in order to select candidates to propose for city status to mark the millennium celebration and the Queen's Golden Jubilee. [58690]

Mr. Dewar: Awards of city status in any part of the UK will be made by Her Majesty The Queen acting under the Royal Prerogative, on the advice of the Government of the day. I shall make an announcement in due course that will explain the procedure to be followed by Scottish towns wishing to be considered for a grant of city status.

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the education budget for each prison in Scotland. [59219]

Scottish Enterprise

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the financial implications of the recent reorganisation of Scottish Enterprise. [58840]

Mr. Dewar: The Government's policy for public sector pay continues to underline our commitment to increasing the efficiency of the public sector with any pay and price increases being offset by efficiencies and other economies. Scottish Enterprise's (SE) administration budget is set with due regard to the minimum consistent with efficiency and effectiveness; however, it is for SE to determine its staffing structure and requirements within these parameters. SE's administration budget for 1998–99 is £61.290 million.

British Army (Complaints)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) criminal complaints and (b) informal non-criminal complaints were made against the British Army based in (i) Northern Ireland and (ii) Germany in each of the last four years. [56399]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 3 November 1998]: The information is as follows:

Northern Ireland

In Northern Ireland complaints against the Army are categorised as criminal or non-criminal; non-criminal complaints are categorised as formal or informal.

Northern Ireland

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British service personnel were injured during the last 30 years during service in Northern Ireland. [58853]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The numbers of British Service personnel who were injured during the last 30 years, from any cause, during service in Northern Ireland are detailed in the table.

[2] Figures are from 1 January 1976—31 October 1998

The figures relate primarily to injuries which were incurred whilst on duty; however, the manner in which data have historically been compiled means some injuries incurred whilst off duty may also be included.

The figures exclude injuries resulting in death.

Compensation Claims

Mr. Townend: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total cost to public funds of claims by employees and the public for compensation in respect of (a) personal injury and (b) employment protection in the latest year for which figures are available. [59052]

Mr. Spellar: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

WALES

Rural Development Grants

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much matching funding has been made available by the Welsh Office in the current financial year for the taking up of European rural development grants in Wales; and what sum he has ear-marked for the next financial year for this purpose. [58663]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: £1 million has been made available for the current financial year. Funding for future years is being considered as part of the Internal Review.

BSE

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the amount of Government money spent in Wales to date on measures relating to BSE; and if he will make a statement. [58821]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The total amount of Government money spent in Wales on measures relating to BSE during the period 1 April 1996 to 30 September 1998 is estimated at £137 million.

Farmers

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many deputations he has received from farmers' organisations in the last six months; and if he will make a statement. [58820]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Welsh Office Ministers have met with both the farming unions and farmers' deputations on several occasions during the last 6 months. These meetings are part of an ongoing, constructive dialogue with the farmers leaders and the industry about developing long term strategies for Welsh agriculture so that it can meet the demands of the twenty first century.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the average age of farmers in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [58819]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The average age of principal farmers, growers or partners on Welsh farm holdings is estimated to be 55.

Food Prices

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the relationship between the prices paid by the customers in supermarkets and the prices paid to beef, sheepmeat and dairy producers; and if he will make a statement. [58818]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The issue of prices and competition in the market is a matter for the competition authorities. The Office of Fair Trading is currently conducting an inquiry into the overall profitability of the major supermarkets in the grocery sector. The Welsh Office is continuing to keep abreast of available research on this issue.

Drugs Awareness

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what drugs awareness programmes his Department is planning to introduce in 1999; and how much funding they will receive. [58888]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The Welsh Drug and Alcohol Unit (WDAU), which operates on contract to the Department, has developed a prevention campaign to focus public attention on drug and alcohol misuse, particularly among younger people.

Phase three of this campaign will be launched in 1999 and will concentrate on new target groups, namely young people who are considered high risk and hard to reach; young people in the 16–18 age group; and children aged 9–14 in the primary and secondary school setting. Funding for this campaign will be subject to the Secretary of State's decisions on the allocation of the resources available to him in 1999–2000.

Television and Film Production

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures his Department has taken to promote television and film production in Wales. [58887]

Mr. Hain: Film is an important industry in Wales and the Department is working together with Sgrin—Media Agency for Wales and the Wales Film Commissions to further its development. Financial support is currently provided to Sgrin through the Arts Council of Wales, the Welsh Development Agency and the Cardiff Bay Development Corporation. In addition, the Welsh Development Agency has contributed to the establishment of the British Film Office in Los Angeles set up to encourage inward investment into film production in the UK. Ministerial responsibility for television lies with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport.

Tenancy Agreements

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans his Department has to promote the new tenancy agreement launched recently by the Welsh Federation of Housing Associations. [58886]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The tenancy agreement recently launched by the Welsh Federation of Housing Associations is designed to be an example of an easy-to-read agreement which Registered Social Landlords may follow and adapt if they so wish.

The Welsh Office will seek to ensure all Registered Social Landlords do indeed utilise tenancy agreements which are easy to read.

Agricultural Subsidies

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to simplify the administration of agricultural subsidy claims; and if he will make a statement. [59319]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: On 16 March 1998, Official Report, column 459, the then Secretary of State announced that the Department was inviting consultants to tender for a study to assess the options for securing improved and simplified administration of Common Agricultural Policy payments to farmers within Wales. A number of options were analysed by the consultants and their report was submitted to the Welsh Office on 24 July 1998.

We are carefully considering the options and consulting with farming organisations, Welsh MPs, Welsh Office Trade Unions and staff, to seek their views, before reaching a final decision.

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans his Department has to assist farmers who are experiencing difficulties in accurately completing paperwork relating to the claiming of farming subsidies and financial assistance; and if he will make a statement. [59320]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Comprehensive Guidance is issued with every claim form. That guidance and the scheme claim forms are routinely passed to the industry for comment before issue, and efforts are made to annually update and improve scheme literature.

Officials from the Welsh Office are on hand to offer guidance as appropriate.

Millennium Stadium

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 31 July 1998, Official Report, column 363, if he will make a statement on progress on the Millennium Stadium at Cardiff Arms Park. [59332]

Mr. Hain: Progress on the Stadium itself is a matter for Millennium Stadium plc Discussions associated with the Government's contribution to the funding of the River Walk project are at an advanced stage and I expect the documentation to be finalised shortly. A further announcement will be made in due course.

Cardiff Airport

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the future of Cardiff Airport. [59511]

Mr. Hain: Cardiff International Airport is owned by TBI plc, who have invested heavily in new and improved facilities to create one of the most modern regional airports in the United Kingdom. The Airport's future prospects appear excellent, but I will be considering this further as part of an air services study for Wales which is currently under way. This study will focus on the scope for new and enhanced services as well as the role of airports in economic development.

Strategic Rail Authority

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made as to the benefits likely to accrue to Wales from a strategic rail authority. [59513]

Mr. Hain: The Strategic Rail Authority will provide clear, coherent and accountable regulation of the network, ensuring that the railways are run in the interest of passengers and freight customers. The shadow SRA, which will be operational by next spring, will be an important first step in making sure that the railway companies deliver the service the public have a right to expect. There will be Welsh representation on both the shadow SRA and its statutory successor.

Roads (Strategic Policy)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received concerning his strategic policy on roads. [59512]

Mr. Hain: The future strategy for and role of the trunk road network in Wales was set out in the report "Driving Wales Forward" published on 28 July. A number of representations have been received following publication of the report although it is not possible to give an exact number. In general terms, the report has been well received and welcomed as a positive contribution in the overall context of attempts to deliver an integrated approach to transport in Wales.

Badgers

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the badger population in Wales, and if he will make a statement. [59516]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: We have made no direct estimates of the badger population in Wales. A report to the Joint Nature Conservation Committee (1995) based on surveys carried out in 1988 for the Nature Conservancy Council suggested a pre-breeding badger population size of 35,000 in Wales. A report by the People's Trust for Endangered Species (1997) suggests that badger activity in Britain increased by 77 per cent. between 1988 and 1997. I understand those responsible for producing these figures are reviewing them, although no revisions have been published yet.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

London Theatres

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of the contribution of London theatres to inward tourism into the United Kingdom. [57176]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Government welcomed the publication earlier this year by the Society of London Theatre of The Wyndham Report on the economic impact of London's West End Theatre. It estimated that, of the total of £679 million spent by West End theatregoers in 1997, £226 million was spent by overseas visitors.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Brewing Industry

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress he is making in the evaluation of vertical agreements in the brewing industry. [59163]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 10 November 1998]: The new Competition Act 1998 enables vertical agreements to be excluded by order from the prohibition of anti-competitive agreements. The Government expect to consult formally on a draft order shortly.

The order will be of a general nature, applying to vertical agreements across the economy. There are no plans to make an exclusion order applying specifically to the brewing sector.

The Supply of Beer (Loan Ties, Licensed Premises and Wholesale Prices) Order 1989 and the Supply of Beer (Tied Estate) Order 1989 will remain in force to regulate this market.

Power Generators

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has to monitor and publish performance on emissions from power generators on a basis of less than 12 months intervals. [59164]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 10 November 1998]: Annual figures for emissions of greenhouse gases and other pollutants, including those from power generation, are published by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. Figures relating to 1996 were published in a DETR News Release in July this year. At the same time, the Department of Trade and Industry published provisional estimates of carbon dioxide emissions for 1997 based on energy consumption data. It is proposed that these provisional estimates will continue to be published on an annual basis.

Information on fuel use in power generation is published by the DTI on a regular basis in the monthly statistical bulletin Energy Trends. Data for fuels used in electricity generation by major power producers are published on a monthly basis and data for all generators are published on a quarterly basis.

Post Office

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has to ensure protection of the interests of postal users in connection with moves to greater commercialisation of the Post Office. [59267]

Mr. Ian McCartney [holding answer 10 November 1998]: The interests of postal users are being fully considered in the context of the Government's Review of the Post Office. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Review has considered public sector options for giving the Post Office greater commercial freedom while continuing to provide a universal postal service under a uniform tariff structure with a nationwide network of post offices. We hope to announce our conclusions shortly.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to make an announcement about his review of post office services, with particular reference to Crown post office closure; and if he will make a statement. [57745]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Work on the Government's Review of the Post Office (including the future of the Crown conversion programme) has proceeded well. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Review has considered public sector options for giving the Post Office greater commercial freedom while continuing to provide a universal postal service under a uniform tariff structure with a nationwide network of post offices. We hope to announce our conclusions shortly.

Secure Electronic Commerce

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has to facilitate electronic commerce with regard to changes in restrictions in the use of cryptography. [59225]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 10 November 1998]: The Government are committed to making the UK the best environment in which business can trade electronically and thus we do not have any plans to restrict the use of cryptography, which is seen by many as a vital technology for confidence and trust. We do, however, have plans to introduce legislation, when parliamentary time permits, to set voluntary standards for those bodies providing electronic signatures and encryption services.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many responses he has received following the publication of the proposals for secure electronic commerce on 27 April 1998; and if he will list them. [59087]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 10 November 1998]: Since the April Statement, which was intended to provide information rather than solicit responses, the Department has discussed its proposals on secure electronic commerce with a number of different organisations. We would expect more formal, and quantifiable, responses from industry when we launch a consultation paper on the planned legislation on electronic commerce.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has for further consultations with industry on the proposals for secure electronic commerce announced on 27 April 1998. [59086]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 10 November 1998]: The Government are committed to making the UK the best environment in which to trade electronically. We will bring forward legislation to help achieve this as soon as parliamentary time is available. The Government intend to develop the detail of the legislation in consultation with industry and other interested parties.

British Nuclear Fuels

[illegible]hidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade [illegible] what tender process was undertaken for the re[illegible] Nuclear Fuels prior to the appointment of [illegible]ntants; and if he will list the firms which su[illegible]s. [59089]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 10 November 1998]: KPMG were chosen following a competitive tender process. Six firms were invited to participate in the tender. KPMG were selected after interview of the four firms which submitted tenders. It is not normally the Department's policy to disclose the names of firms participating in such competitive tendering exercises.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the terms of reference are for KPMG accountants' review of British Nuclear Fuels. [59090]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 10 November 1998]: KPMG were engaged to carry out an initial review of the options for BNFL's future structure including, but not restricted to, some form of Public Private Partnership, having regard to the Government's objectives, which are as follows:

Safety and environmental impact to ensure that the highest standards of safety are applied throughout BNFL's operations and that regulatory standards on environmental impact are fully complied with.

Efficient management of liabilities to ensure that the nuclear liabilities created by past, present and future operations are discharged safely and as cost effectively as possible including the possibility of sharing risks and rewards in management of liabilities with the private sector.

Efficient management of company and employee involvement to ensure effective incentives and disciplines are in place to deliver efficient management of the company, while ensuring employee commitment to the success of the company.

Maximise the value of the business subject to the points above, to provide a framework in which BNFL can get the best out of its assets and maximise its value as an international business by making best use of its expertise and taking advantage of commercial opportunities as they arise.

Full value for taxpayer to ensure that any deal involving a full or partial sale of assets provides full value for the taxpayer consistent with the degree of risk passed on to the private sector.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the cost of the review of British Nuclear Fuels being carried out by KPMG; and when the review will be completed. [59088]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 10 November 1998]: My department is paying KPMG a fixed fee of £100,000 for this work. The review will be completed by the end of this month.

Indonesia (Debt)

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if Indonesia has resumed payments on its debt to the United Kingdom since it negotiated a rescheduling of this debt with the Export Credits Guarantee Department; [58432]

(2) if the rescheduling agreement with Indonesia on its debt repayments to the United Kingdom contains provisions relating to future loan guarantees for military equipment; [58435]

(3) if he will make a statement on the rescheduling of Indonesia's debt to the United Kingdom. [58433]

Mr. Wilson: The UK, together with Indonesia's other major creditors, agreed on 23 September 1998 to reschedule Indonesia's sovereign and sovereign guaranteed public sector debt falling due for payment between 6 August 1998 to 31 March 2000. The rescheduling covers principal repayments only and Indonesia continues to meet its interest payment obligations on the original maturities. The rescheduled debt is to be paid over eleven years including a three year grace period. Moratorium interest at the appropriate market rate will accrue from the dates of the original maturities. The first and subsequent payment dates for this moratorium interest will be specified in the bilateral agreement.

The bilateral debt agreement being negotiated between the UK and Indonesia covers debt in relation to both civil and military contracts signed prior to 1 July 1997 and the debt to be restructured over the period to 31 March 2000 amounts to some £240m.

The bilateral debt agreement, as is usual, will make no reference to future ECGD cover. Bearing in mind that this is to be limited rescheduling involving principal payments only, ECGD remains on cover whilst monitoring developments very closely. New commitments will be considered on a case by case basis, taking account of prevailing circumstances at the time, but priority would be given to contracts likely to contribute to Indonesia's economic recovery.

Coal

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list for each year from 1979 to 1997 what sums of compensation have been (a) paid to individual coal miners as a result of pit closures and (b) invested in regions of the United Kingdom to compensate for the closure of coal mines. [57329]

Mr. Battle: The information is as follows:

(a) The Department does not have information on total compensation paid to individual coal miners solely as a result of pit closures initiated by the previous Government. The table sets out the restructuring costs of British Coal Corporation since 1979. In addition, the Government made payments to individual mineworkers under the Redundant Mineworkers Payments Scheme (RMPS) which was introduced in 1967. This Scheme closed to new entrants after March 1987, but payments continue until the last beneficiary reaches the age of 65 in 2002.

' British Coal Corporation Annual Report and Accounts (various)

(b) The Department does not collect information on amounts invested in regions of the United Kingdom solely as a result of pit closures. The Coalfield closures programme in 1992 was expected to cost the Government £1 billion in redundancy payments and measures to help communities affected, and in 1993 the previous Government committed £200 million in regeneration funding. However, this sum fell below what was needed. This Government set up the Coalfields Task Force to investigate how the Government can best help regenerate the Coalfields Communities and draw together support offered to them. We will shortly be reporting on the implementation of the Task Force's recommendations.

Vibration White Finger

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress made by his Department towards establishing a compensation scheme for the condition known as vibration white finger. [59006]

Mr. Battle: I fully understand the frustration of miners with VWF who have been waiting for their compensation and I am keen to start assessing claims and making payments quickly. We need to ensure that full and fair compensation is paid, but both sides have to work within the legal framework.

My priority has always been to agree arrangements with the claimants' solicitors to allow claims to be processed. We recently served our proposed handling arrangements on the plaintiffs' solicitors, revised in the light of the Court of Appeal judgment. We hope to agree arrangements with the claimants' solicitors as soon as possible. We are also proposing to the plaintiffs a single medical assessment process as a means of expediting the handling of the claims objectively. Following a meeting on 2 November, they have agreed to participate in a pilot of the medical process, this is due to commence on 1 December.

In the meantime, further work is being done to minimise any further delay once a final agreement has been reached. For instance, sets of testing equipment have already been purchased and work is in hand to identify organisations able to deliver the single medical assessment.

HEALTH

Civil Servants (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his private office, as at 1 October 1997; [56804]

(2) if he will provide a breakdown, in numerical and percentage terms, of the ethnic origin of civil servants in his Department, by grade, as at 1 October 1997. [56802]

Mr. Milburn: I refer my hon. Friend to the replies given to him by the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 5 November 1998, Official Report, columns 666–70.

North Essex Health Authority

Mr. Ivan Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many appeals were heard by his Department against proposals put forward by North Essex Health Authority between 1979 and 1997; [58425]

(2) if he will list the occasions when facilities at Clacton and Harwich hospitals were retained following a successful appeal against North Essex Health Authority proposals between 1979 and 1997; [58427]

(3) if he will list the facilities at Clacton and Harwich hospitals that were the subject of reviews carried out by North Essex Health Authority between 1979 and 1997; [58428]

(4) if he will list the lengths of time taken by his Department to determine each appeal against proposals put forward by North Essex Health Authority between 1979 and 1997; [58426]

(5) how many reviews were conducted by North Essex Health Authority between 1979 and 1997. [58424]

Mr. Milburn: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Employment of Children Review Working Group

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if the research sub-group of the Employment of Children Review working group has been set up; and what its terms of reference are; [59065]

(2) how many times the Employment of Children Review working group has met to take evidence from interested organisations and individuals; and from whom evidence has been taken; [59068]

(3) what is the current membership of the Employment of Children Review working group; [59069]

(4) how many children who are employed have been consulted by the Employment of Children Review working group; and on how many occasions; [59066]

(5) how many times the Employment of Children Review working group has met; and on what dates; [59067]

(6) when the Employment of Children Review working group is expected to report; and if he will make a statement on its progress. [59064]

Mr. Hutton: The Employment of Children Review working group has met on three occasions, 9 February, 21 July and 17 September. Membership of the working group comprises officials from the Departments of Health, Trade and Industry, Education and Employment, the Cabinet Office, the Health and Safety Executive and the Health and Social Services Executive, Northern Ireland. Membership also includes two representatives from the National Child Employment Network. Evidence has been taken from interested parties on two occasions. Those parties were, Save the Children, National Children's Home Action for Children, the Child Poverty Action Group, the Children's Rights Office, the Child Accident Prevention Trust and the British Film Commissioner. The working group will report early next year. The Research sub group will be meeting shortly; its purpose is to review the existing research, and to make recommendations to the main group based on its findings, both on any proposed changes to existing legislation and on any further research deemed necessary. The views of working children have not yet been sought, but it is intended to do so.

Prescribed Nicotine Replacement Therapy

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to make nicotine replacement therapy treatment available on prescription; [58960]

(2) if he will estimate the cost of making nicotine replacement therapy available on prescription. [58959]

Ms Jowell: We will set out our comprehensive proposals to tackle smoking in the forthcoming tobacco White Paper.

Asylum Seekers (Medical Accreditation)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps he is taking to assist medically qualified asylum seekers to obtain training or take courses to gain recognised British medical qualifications; [58957]

(2) what steps he is taking to facilitate the recognition of qualifications held by medically qualified asylum seekers. [58956]

Mr. Hutton: The recognition of medical qualifications is the statutory responsibility of the General Medical Council (GMC) in respect of primary qualifications, and the Specialist Training Authority and the Joint Committee on Postgraduate Training for specialist qualifications.

No specific action is being taken to assist medically qualified asylum seekers to obtain training or to take courses to gain recognised British medical qualifications.

Medically qualified asylum seekers who have been given permission to work in the United Kingdom by the immigration authorities and who meet the GMC's requirements for Registration are free to apply for advertised posts in the medical training grades on the same basis as other non-United Kingdom/European Economic Area doctors. Approaching 30 per cent. of all medical trainees in the National Health Service qualified outside the United Kingdom.

Earlier this year the Department revised and reissued its guidance on the Immigration and Employment of Overseas Medical and Dental Students, Doctors and Dentists in the United Kingdom to make it clear that doctors who have sought asylum may be accepted into formal training programmes once permission to work in the UK has been granted by the immigration authorities.

Comprehensive Spending Review

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he is in a position to give details, by health authority, of the allocation of moneys arising from the Comprehensive Spending Review for the year 1999–2000. [58987]

Mr. Milburn: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) on 10 November 1998, Official Report, columns 180–82.

Health Visitor Services

Mr. Salter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the impact of reductions in health visitor services for the elderly on (a) bed blocking in hospitals and (b) hospital waiting lists; and if he will make a statement. [59047]

Ms Jowell: We have undertaken no such assessment.

This month, on 3 November 1998, Official Report, column 688, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced a further £250 million for the National Health Service (£209 million for England). This money provides further investment for the long-term as well as additional help for this coming winter.

We are committed to improving the quality of life for older people and recently announced that the next national service framework will be for older people. Our better services for vulnerable people initiative requires health and local authorities to develop joint investment plans, recuperation and rehabilitation services for older people and improved procedures for multidisciplinary assessment of older people. Our review of hospital discharge guidance will include consideration of how we can resolve the difficulties around delayed discharge.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Croatia (Arms Embargo)

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what embargoes on the export of defence equipment, with particular reference to anti-tank weapons, existed in the case of exports to Croatia in (a) 1989, (b) 1990 and (c) 1991. [59049]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: There was no embargo on the export of defence equipment to Croatia in 1989 and 1990. The European Union and its Member States decided on 5 July 1991 to impose an embargo on armaments and military equipment applicable to the whole of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY). UNSCR 713 (1991) established a general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to the SFRY with effect from 25 September 1991. The embargoes included anti-tank weapons for export to Croatia. The EU embargo remains in force in respect to Croatia.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Winter Fuel Payments

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many cheques, and of what total value, have been returned by post and sub post offices as unclaimed by eligible pensioners for winter fuel payments. [57407]

Angela Eagle: The administration of Winter Fuel Payments is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Eric Pickles, dated 10 November 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent parliamentary question about how many cheques, and of what total value, have been returned by post and sub post offices as unclaimed by eligible pensioners for winter fuel payments.

The making of Winter Fuel Payments to almost 10 million pensioners, in over seven million households, before the end of March 1998, was a challenging task for the Benefits Agency (BA). This was achieved whilst maintaining normal benefit business.

During March this year, five million Winter Fuel Payment girocheques were sent to the Post Office for collection by those pensioners who receive a state retirement pension or widow's benefit and are paid by order book. Arrangements were made for the Post Office clerk to identify the relevant customers, as they called to collect their pension, hand them the envelope containing their girocheque, and a letter explaining the reason for the payment.

Post Offices were instructed to return any uncollected girocheques to the nearest BA office on 1 May 1998. Approximately two percent of the total number of girocheques, with a value of either £10 or £20, were returned. The information on the total value of all payments returned is only available at disproportionate cost.

It may be helpful if I explain the action that was taken on receipt of each undelivered payment. An investigation was undertaken to establish the reason why the payment had not been collected. Where it was confirmed that the pensioner was still alive a replacement payment was issued. Where the pensioner had recently died but nevertheless there was entitlement to a payment, the BA took action to pay the amount due to the next of kin or executor of the deceased's estate.

About 98% of girocheques issued to the Post Office were collected. Of the remainder, around half were returned because there was no entitlement (for example, because the customer was abroad, in hospital for an extensive period, or had died). Many of the other girocheques were not collected because of short or medium term hospitalization or spells abroad, or customer's death during or after the qualifying week. In these cases, entitlement remained, and the girocheques have now been replaced except in a very small number of cases (for example, where further evidence is required).

In making this year's Winter Fuel Payments, around the same number will be sent to the Post Office for delivery during January 1999. The Post Office have been asked to ensure all their staff are proactive in issuing the payments the first time the pensioner calls after the Post Office receive the pensioner's giro payment. The Winter Fuel Payment leaflet also advises pensioners whose payment has been sent to the Post Office to ask the clerk in the office they normally collect the payment from, if they have not been given their payment by the end of January 1999.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Benefit Recovery

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many cases of repayments of benefit to the Compensation Recovery Unit involving asbestos-related diseases there were in the past five years; and what were the levels of those repayments. [58411]

Mr. Timms: The administration of the Compensation Recovery Unit is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Mr. Tony Worthington, dated 10 November 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Mr. Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions asking, how many cases of repayments of benefit to the Compensation Recovery Unit involving asbestos-related diseases there were in the past five years; and what were the levels of those repayments. As Mr. Mathison is away from the office on leave, I am replying.

The information requested is given on the table. The figures relate to asbestosis cases (the system is not designed to identify asbestos-related diseases).

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will estimate the level of benefits repaid to the Compensation Recovery Unit as a result of the Social Security (Recovery of Benefits) Act 1997; [58408]

(2) if he will provide a breakdown of the levels of repayment to the Compensation Recovery Unit in each of the past five years; [58412]

(3) what were total repayments to the Compensation Recovery Unit in the current year and each of the five previous years. [58409]

Mr. Timms: Reform of the Compensation Recovery scheme took place on 6 October 1997. The compensator is now liable for the repayment of benefits paid as a consequence of an accident, injury or disease. The reforms also mean that compensation for pain and suffering will not be recovered.

The questions ask about the level of benefits repaid to the Compensation Recovery Unit as a result of the Social Security (Recovery of Benefits) Act 1997, a breakdown of the levels of repayment in each of the past five years, and what were the total repayments in the current and the last five years. As Mr. Mathison is away from the office on leave, I will reply.

It is estimated that £159 million has been repaid to the Compensation Recovery Unit as a result of the Social Security (Recovery of Benefits) Act 1997.

A breakdown of the levels of repayment and the total repayments is given in the table.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants will be affected by his proposed claw-back of incapacity benefit from those with private insurance cover in the first five years after the reform is introduced. [58291]

Mr. Timms: It is not possible to identify the number of people with permanent health insurance payments arranged by their employer, who will have this income taken into account against Incapacity Benefit in the first five years after the change is introduced. However, the number is expected to be small. No existing Incapacity Benefit recipient will be affected.

Disability Income Guarantee

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much extra he estimates will be spent on the disability income guarantee in the first two years of its operation relative to what would have been spent on the current equivalent disability benefits. [58509]

Mr. Timms: The estimated additional cost for 2001–02 will be in the region of £60 million. In the longer term we estimate that the cost will rise to £70 million per year.

Widows' Benefits

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many new claimants of widows' benefit are currently being awarded initial or emergency payments only as a result of the difficulties in implementation of the NIRS2 system. [59284]

Mr. Timms: All new claims to Widows' Benefit (WB) where there is potential entitlement to a weekly Widows' Pension (WP) or Widowed Mother's Allowance (WMA) should be receiving emergency payments as the NIRS contributions record is not available. There are about 4,000 new claims to WB each month. 28,000 claims have been received from April to October of which about 21,000 have entitlement to WP or WMA.

Sources:

Central Data Unit

Annual WB claims 1996–97 = 47,435 of which 37,910 have WP/WMA.

Annual WB claims 1997–98 = 45,291 of which 36,539 have WP/WMA.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if receipt of a compensation payment made on a monthly basis to a person not receiving an occupational pension prevents that individual from being granted jobseeker's allowance when all other application criteria are met; [58531]

(2) if those in receipt of (a) a redundancy compensation payment and a continuing annual payment and (b) a continuing annual payment only, are eligible for job seekers allowance; [58532]

(3) if those in receipt of a redundancy compensation payment and a continuing annual payment are eligible for unemployment benefit; [58533]

(4) if his Department classifies continuing annual payments as (a) a redundancy payment and (b) an occupational pension. [58534]

Angela Eagle: Jobseeker's Allowance replaced Unemployment Benefit and Income Support for the unemployed in October 1996 as the main benefit for this group. Jobseeker's Allowance has two elements: a contribution-based allowance for those who have paid sufficient National Insurance contributions and an income-based allowance for those who either do not qualify for, or whose needs are not met by, the contributory element.

Prior to October 1996, for people aged over 55, Unemployment Benefit was reduced by 10p for each 10p of occupational pension received in excess of £35 a week. Other periodic payments from ex-employers made on account of the termination of employment by way of redundancy were treated as income other than earnings and did not affect entitlement to Unemployment Benefit. Lump sum redundancy payments up to the statutory limit did not affect the amount of Unemployment Benefit payable. Any sum paid in excess of this limit removed entitlement to benefit for a period, the length of which depended upon the sum involved.

Contribution-based Jobseeker's Allowance is reduced, for all people receiving occupational pension payments, on a penny for penny basis for any excess over £50 a week. Income-based Jobseeker's Allowance is reduced by an amount equal to the total pension payment received. Other periodic payments from ex-employers made on account of the termination of employment by way of redundancy do not affect entitlement to contribution-based Jobseeker's Allowance. Income-based Jobseeker's Allowance is, however, reduced by an amount equal to the total payment received.

Lump sum redundancy payments up to the statutory limit do not affect the amount of contribution-based Jobseeker's Allowance payable as they are treated as capital. Income-based Jobseeker's Allowance is not affected by capital under £3,000 but entitlement is reduced by £1 for each £250, or part of £250, over that amount up to a limit of £8,000. Benefit is not payable if a person's capital is over that limit. Any sum paid in excess of the statutory limit will remove entitlement to both elements of Jobseeker's Allowance for a period, the length of which depends upon the sum involved.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Teacher Training

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many students were recruited to PGCE courses in each subject area for each of the years 1992 to 1998. [56198]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The following table shows the number of students recruited to PGCE courses in each subject area for each of the years 1992 to 1997. Recruitment for 1998 is not yet available, but latest figures for acceptances are shown in the table. A package of new measures to boost teacher recruitment was announced on 27 October and details of this have been placed in the Library.
